Mr. JENCKES. I rise to oppose the amendment. There is a conclusive answer to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Maine. Oaths taken before a justice of the peace are not within any statute of the United States subject to the penalty of perjury. If an oath should be required by this act to be taken before such a justice it would amount to nothing but a certificate of a third person to the correctness of what the collector says, without any penalty upon the collector for false statement or upon the justice for improper administration of the oath. Until the statutes in relation to perjury are revised it is not safe to allow oaths of this kind to be taken before officers of the States. It amounts to nothing. A restriction, qualification, or duty imposed by the law would be entirely evaded if a justice of the peace should be allowed to administer oaths.

The amendment of Mr. PETERS was disagreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That assessors shall each be allowed and paid a salary of $1,500 per annum, payable quarterly; and, in addition thereto, where the receipts of the collection district shall exceed the sum of $100,000, and shall not exceed the sum of $200,000, annually, one half of one per cent. upon the excess of receipts over $100,000; where the receipts of a collection district shall exceed $200,000, and shall not exceed $400,000, one fourth of one per cent. upon the excess of the receipts over $200,000; and where the receipts shall exceed $400,000, one tenth of one per cent. upon such excess. And in determining the compensation to be allowed to any assessor the commission shall be computed on one half of the tax on any articles which shall have been transported from his district in bond, and on only one half of the tax on any articles received in his district in bond where such transportation has been by shipment from one district to another. Each assessor shall be allowed and paid the sums actually and necessarily expended by him, with the approval of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, for office rent; but no account of such rent shall be allowed or paid until it shall have been verified in such manner as the Commissioner shall require, and shall have been audited and approved by the proper officers of the Treasury Department. And these several assessors shall be paid, after the account thereof shall have been rendered to and approved by the proper officers of the Treasury, their necessary and reasonable charges for clerk hire; but no such account shall be approved unless it shall state the name of each clerk employed, the time of his service, and the rate of compensation agreed upon; and every such account shall be accompanied by an affidavit of the assessor, stating that such service was actually required by the necessities of his office, and was actually rendered, and also by the affidavit of such clerk, stating that he has rendered the service charged in said account on his behalf, the compensation agreed upon, and that he has not paid, deposited, or assigned, or contracted to pay, deposit, or assign, any part of such compensation to the use of any other person, or in any way, directly or indirectly, paid or given, or contracted to pay or give, any reward or compensation for his office or employment, or the emoluments thereof; but no such account for clerk hire shall in any case be presented or received at the Treasury Department for examination and allowance until after it shall have been approved by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and his approval indorsed thereon. And there shall be allowed and paid to each assistant assessor five dollars for every day actually employed in collecting returns and making valuations, the number of days necessary for that purpose to be certified by the assessor, and three dollars for every hundred persons assessed contained in the tax list, as completed and delivered by him to the assessor, and twenty-five cents for each permit granted for making tobacco, snuff, or cigars; and the said assessors and assistant assessors, respectively, shall be paid, after the account thereof shall have been rendered to and approved by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and the proper officers of the Treasury, their necessary and reasonable charges for stationery and blank books used in the discharge of their duties, and for postage actually paid on letters and documents received and sent, and relating exclusively to official business, and for money actually paid for publishing notices required by this act; but no such account shall be approved unless it shall state the date and the particular item of every such expenditure, and shall be verified by the oath or affirmation of such assessor or assistant assessor. The compensation herein specified shall be in full for all expenses not otherwise particularly authorized: Provided, That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may fix such additional rates of compensation to be made to assessors and assistant assessors in cases where a collection district embraces more than a single congressional district, and to assessors and assistant assessors in the States of California, Nevada, and Oregon, and in the Territories, as may appear to him to be just and equitable, in consequence of the greater cost of living and traveling in those States and in the Territories, and as may, in his judgment, be necessary to secure the services of competent officers; but the compensation thus allowed shall not in any case exceed the rate of $5,000 per annum.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move as an amendment from the committee to strike out all after the word "rent," in line twenty-three, down to and including the word "account," in line thirty, and to insert in lieu thereof the words "and have his necessary and reasonable charges for clerk hire; no account for clerk hire."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move further to amend by inserting after the word "for," in line forty-five, the words "office rent or."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move further to amend by striking out in lines fifty-five and fifty-six the words "permit granted for making tobacco, snuff, and cigars," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "certificates of registration given to a cigar-maker on payment of his special tax."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move further to amend in line fifty-nine by striking out the words "and the proper officers of the Treasury."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLAINE. I move to amend by inserting in line sixty-nine, after the word "authorized," the following:

Provided, That an assistant assessor who, by reason of a vacancy in the office of assessor, is discharging the duties of assessor, shall receive the full pay and emoluments thereof while discharging such duties.

Mr. SCHENCK. That is provided for.

Mr. BLAINE. Not in the existing law. There is a great deal of controversy about it in the Auditor's office; but if it is provided for I withdraw it.

Mr. BECK. I move to amend by inserting in line twenty-three, after the word "rent," the words "and the office furniture actually necessary for the safekeeping of the papers pertaining to his office." I offer this amendment because I know that in many districts, and especially in my own, papers have accumulated to such an extent under previous assessors that it is indispensable to have the furniture necessary for their safekeeping. The assessor ought to be allowed to supply himself with such furniture. I make the suggestion because my attention has been called to the subject by several assessors, who say that it is indispensable that they should have some such allowance as this.

Mr. SCHENCK. We have not thought it advisable to extend the allowance to these officers beyond clerk hire, and for rent and books and stationery. But it is for the committee to determine whether any further allowance shall be made. I hope the amendment will not prevail. The next think asked for will be a safe to keep everything secure.

Mr. BECK. If the gentleman will examine the office of an assessor he will find that there are papers which no safe would be large enough to hold, papers that require a large book-case in which to keep them. These papers do not belong to the assessor, but to the office, and they are transmitted from one assessor to another; they are now lying about the office, subject to be destroyed, because no assessor feels that he has such a tenure of office as would enable him to provide proper furniture for the office.

The question was taken on Mr. BECK's amendment, and it was disagreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I move in line fifty to strike out the word "five" and insert "four" in lieu thereof, so as to provide that the compensation of assistant assessors shall be four dollars a day instead of five dollars a day, and I wish to say a word or two in support of my motion.

Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt but that in some of the large cities, where the expenses of living are great, and in the States of the Pacific and in some of the Territories, we ought to allow five dollars a day, and perhaps in some of them more, and I would be willing to make provision for all such cases as that. But I say to the committee that in nine tenths of all the districts of the United States five dollars a day is a greater compensation than is paid for equal talent in almost any other branch of business.

Now, sir, I undertake to say that in most of the States the pay of a mechanic does not exceed three dollars a day, and when the mechanics of this country are receiving only three dollars a day and are taxed to pay five dollars a day to gentlemen with no more capacity and for performing services not half as arduous, they have a right to complain, and they will complain. I say that five dollars a day is thirty-three and one third per cent. more than the compensation that is paid to the average of the preachers in the United States, and thirty three and one third per cent. more than is paid to the average of the principals of our Union schools in the State of Ohio.

Now, sir, I would be willing to pay a just compensation for this and for all services that may be rendered to the Government; but if there is any one subject upon which there is just complaint among the people it is this, that the expenses of collecting the revenue are too great, and that there are too many officers in the revenue service.

Mr. O'NEILL. I wish to ask the gentleman if he will not make an exception in the case of assistant assessors living in cities?

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I have just said that I would.

Mr. O'NEILL. Will he not do it in his amendment?

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Let it be provided for elsewhere. I have no doubt that you cannot make a uniform rule that will do justice by having the same compensation all over the United States.

Mr. BLAINE. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the assistant assessors in his district should be paid less than the assistant assessors in cities?

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. No, sir; I said no such thing. I said there were some assistant assessors in cities who ought to have a greater compensation. Will the gentleman say that the same compensation ought to be paid everywhere?

Mr. BLAINE. I am not for giving a single assessor in any State in the United States a dollar more out of the public Treasury than his services are worth.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. There are places in the United States where men must necessarily pay more to live than in other places. I am not proposing to increase the compensation of anybody. My proposition is to reduce it to four dollars a day; and if I had the power I would make it still less. I had hoped that the eloquent voice of my colleague, who came here upon the labor question, [Mr. CARY,] would have been heard upon this and similar subjects.

Mr. BLAINE. Your colleague cannot get a chance to come in.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. In the rural districts, which comprise a great deal of territory, though the expense of living there may not be so great as in cities, the assistant assessor is subjected to a great deal of expense in traveling over the district.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. He is paid his traveling expenses. My proposition now is to make the compensation uniform at four dollars per day. I will not commit myself upon the question whether I will be in favor of giving more to assessors in cities or not.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. O'NEILL. I asked the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] a question, and from his answer I found that he was willing to pay assessors in cities at the rate of five dollars a day. Now, I think these officers are entitled to the same compensation wherever they may be. And I know that in a city where the assistant assessor does his business thoroughly a compensation of five dollars a day is not too much.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. O'NEILL. Certainly.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I would ask the gentleman how much a good mechanic gets in Philadelphia?

Mr. O'NEILL. From four to five dollars a day.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Should the assessor in Philadelphia have any more than a good mechanic?

Mr. O'NEILL. I believe that the assessors should have just what their services are worth.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Yes; but are their services worth more than the services of a good mechanic?

Mr. O'NEILL. I was going on to say that I think these officers deserve just such compensation as their services are worth; and I will say that the duties of assistant assessors have been performed much better since they have been receiving their present compensation than they were before when the compensation was less. In our cities these officers are employed all the time.

Mr. BLAINE. But the city assessors have compact districts about which they travel on horse-cars at the rate of two or three cents a mile; while in the country they have to keep or hire a team at a much greater expense.

Mr. RANDALL. Let me correct the gentleman. In the cities they usually have free tickets on the horse-cars.

Mr. O'NEILL. Well, I do not object to their having that advantage. In the cities they are employed all the day, and in the evening they have to put the result of their day's work in writing.

I wish the assessors and collectors generally were as good men and as faithful to the interests of the Government as they should be. I wish the inspectors of the revenue were more generally good men. And I know one way in which we could get good men, at least as far as my district is concerned. If I was permitted to select the men in my district I would guaranty that the revenue would be properly collected. If the Department would act on my recommendation as to who should be the inspector or the assistant collector, or who should carry on the business in a subordinate capacity under the collectors of revenue in my district, I would guaranty to select such men as would collect it. And that would take from the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means the vast labor he is now performing in endeavoring to remodel the revenue system of the country.

We have been trying for years to perfect our revenue system, and I give due credit to the Committee of Ways and Means for their labors upon this subject. I shall stand by their bill. [Here the hammer fell.]

The amendment of Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, was not agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I move to amend by striking out in the eighth line of this section the word "five," and inserting "four," so as to make the last clause of the section read, "but the compensation thus allowed shall not in any case exceed the rate of $4,000 per annum."

I ask the Clerk to read the proviso of this section, so that the committee may understand the exact bearing of this amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may fix such additional rates of compensation to be made to assessors and assistant assessors in cases where a collection district embraces more than a single congressional district, and to assessors and assistant assessors in the States of California, Nevada, and Oregon, and in the Territories, as may appear to him to be just and equitable, in consequence of the greater cost of living and traveling in those States and in the Territories, and as may, in his judgment, be necessary to secure the services of competent officers, but the compensation thus allowed shall not in any case exceed the rate of $5,000 per annum.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, when I said a short time ago that I would be willing to give some additional compensation to the assessors in the Pacific States and the large cities, I did so out of deference to a provision already incorporated in this bill, and which has just been read by the Clerk. I was not sure of the propriety of the bill in this respect, or of the necessity of such increased compensation in particular localities; but I am very certain that in most of the districts of the United States the compensation provided in this bill is too great.

Now, sir, as the Committee of the Whole has voted down the amendment which I before offered, I hope it will pause before refusing to adopt that which I now submit. It will be seen that under this provision of the bill assessors and assistant assessors may have a compensation which reaches $5,000 a year. I undertake to say, Mr. Chairman, that this is more than ought to be raised by taxation from the people of the United States to pay for the services of these officers. I know something of the manner in which the duties of these officers are performed. I do not propose to disparage their merits or qualifications or the value of their services; but I do say that we are making by our laws too much difference between the compensation paid to officers of the Government and the compensation which can be earned by the men performing the labor of this country. The mechanics and laborers of the United States do not receive a compensation at all proportionate to that which is paid for official services. I want either that the wages of labor shall be leveled up or that the pay of public officers shall be leveled down.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment. In the first place, I desire to acquit the committee of any extraordinary transgression, by referring to the fact that this provision is precisely that contained in the present law, except that we have limited its operation to those States and Territories in which there is a gold currency.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Will my colleague let me ask him a question?

Mr. SCHENCK. Certainly.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Does my colleague think it right that men should be paid $5,000 in gold a year when they are only paid five dollars a day in Ohio in "greenbacks"?

Mr. SCHENCK. I will reply by saying that none of the salaries are payable in gold, but in "greenbacks," except the salaries of naval officers in foreign lands and officers in the diplomatic service. In Oregon, Nevada, and California, and in the Territories, while the salaries are paid in "greenbacks," their expenses are in gold, so that in fact the officers there receive only two thirds of the limitation of $5,000 instead of $5,000—less, in fact, than $4,000.

This limitation has not been abused. Efforts have been made to extend it, but they have not succeeded. We know no reason for making it larger or smaller, and therefore we have reported it as it is for the reasons I have stated.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE. Is there any provision in the bill that these assistant assessors shall have extra pay for traveling expenses?

Mr. SCHENCK. No, sir.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, and it was rejected, only thirty voting in favor thereof.

Mr. ELA. I move in line two, page sixteen, to strike out "fifteen," and in lieu thereof to insert "ten," so it will provide that assessors shall each be allowed and paid a salary of $1,000 per annum.

Mr. Chairman, I know something of this matter of assessing and collecting taxes, and I know that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] is correct. The greatest complaint of the people about taxation to-day, as it has always been, is in reference to the amount paid to officers engaged in the assessing and collection of the revenue; and so long as you shall continue to pay these officers more than they can get in any other avocation, so long will the people find fault and complain.

In regard to assistant assessors, gentlemen tell you that they have their horses to go over the district. If they do, the habit has been to charge a day for their horse as well as for themselves. In the cities they charge full time, which offsets all these advantages in favor of the country.

Under the old law the pay was four dollars a day. It was raised from three dollars to four dollars. Afterward they made an addition to men assessing out of their own town, and they received five dollars a day. This proposes to give five dollars a day indiscriminately.

In regard to the assessment of taxes I have no doubt the ability is greater than in the collection, for which higher rates are paid; but so long as you can get as good ability at a much less rate, and while the paying of these high salaries causes complaint on the part of the people, I think the best thing we can do is to bring down the pay of these officers to what they can get in other avocations and do away with the constant rush to get these offices where ever there is a vacancy.

Now, under this bill the committee have cut down the pay of assessors who assess over $1,000,000 from $3,800 to $3,100 a year, while they leave the pay of collectors where it is at present. Take the income taxes from all places. Take the income tax of this city, and you will find not three hundred people who get as much for their services with all the receipts from their investments as these officers. I took the income of a city of ten thousand inhabitants, and but one hundred people had an income exceeding $2,000, including not only receipts from personal exertions, but receipts from all their investments.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I wish to oppose the amendment. It seems to me it would have been better had the Committee of Ways and Means increased the salaries for assessors where the aggregate collected does not exceed $400,000. Now, I take it there is scarce any man of talent employed by private enterprise in the United States who does that amount of labor, controlling or handling that amount of capital, who is not better paid. The assessor is a more important officer in this Government than the collector. He is the man who lays the foundation upon which the revenue is collected. If you have a worthless assessor it matters not how good a collector you have.

Mr. MAYNARD. Do you propose any change?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I am not going to advocate any change. I am simply saying that I am surprised that the committee did not bring in a provision so that an assessor who returns an assessment upon which $400,000 should be collected should receive more than $2,500. In the eighth district of New York, where the assessment and collection amounts to some five million dollars, the officer receives for his compensation over seven thousand dollars per annum. He does less labor and has no more responsibility than the collector in a district where the collection does not exceed $400,000, and yet he gets nearly three times as much pay. Now, I cannot see the equity of that.

But I do not propose to disturb the bill. I am opposing the amendment of the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. ELA,] who proposes that the pay shall be $1,000. That may pay for talent in New Hampshire; but it will not pay a good assessor in Illinois. Anywhere in the country an honest man, capable of discharging the duties of this office, can get more than $1,000 a year in any kind of business.

A MEMBER. How about perquisites?

Mr. INGERSOLL. They would not amount to much, unless the officer does a large amount of business. The perquisites are at a decreasing rate above a certain amount, and they do not amount to much unless the collection is large. Now, if you want to get good and efficient collectors of the revenue, pay your officers a reasonable salary. Do not give them poor, niggardly pay. I am surprised that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] has proposed to reduce the pay to four dollars a day, especially when he does not himself do as much labor as the assessor in his district does, and yet he receives more than twelve dollars a day.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Reluctantly.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Reluctantly, yet the gentleman takes it. I hope the amendment will be withdrawn and the compensation will be allowed to stand where the committee put it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to insert "$1,100" instead of "$1,000." It seems to me that this amount ought to be adopted. The salaries of the assessors, on the basis established by this section, will average from $3,000 to $3,500, if the fixed compensation is reduced to $1,000.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I would ask the gentleman what is the greatest amount of revenue collected in any collection district of Indiana.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose about one million five hundred thousand.

Mr. BLAINE. In one district?

Mr. HOLMAN. In one district.

Mr. BLAINE. Have you a district that gives that?

Mr. HOLMAN. In my colleague's district the distilling interest paid $600,000 tax in one year.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I doubt if it amounted to one third of that.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not wish to be understood as speaking advisedly on the subject, but if you reduce the fixed compensation to $1,000, I believe, taking into consideration the nature of the duties performed, the entire amount of pay will exceed that generally given in the States for services requiring the same degree of ability and responsibility. I think nothing can be more unwise, nothing will be more calculated to exasperate the people against the whole revenue system, than an invidious comparison between the compensation paid to Federal officers and that paid to State officers for similar service. I think it is greatly to be deplored that the people now are able to point to manifest instances of extravagance by the General Government in connection with the revenue, while the present state of affairs calls for more severe and rigid economy. There is no responsibility, or scarcely any responsibility in connection with this office. The argument urged in favor of a large salary for the collector has no force in connection with the assessor. The real labor of his duties is performed by the assistant assessors, and I undertake to say, judging of this office, from the generality of the officers throughout the country, that a salary of $2,500 will secure the intelligence and integrity necessary for the performance of these duties in every district throughout the country. I hope that this amendment will be adopted.

Mr. SCHENCK. Before we get through I think it will be found very important that gentlemen should know what the present law is and what is proposed, and what it is that is sought to be amended in each instance.

Now, sir, what is the salary proposed by this bill for an assessor? How does it compare with the present law? The salary proposed is a reduction from the existing law on the subject. Under the existing law, after a salary of $1,500, the assessor receives an addition of half of one per cent. on his assessments up to $200,000, and one fourth of one per cent. after that for $200,000; that is, up to $400,000. We have retained the figures of $1,500 as the salary to start with for every assessor; but we have reduced the half of one per cent.; so that it shall only be counted above $100,000 and up to $200,000, and the quarter of one per cent. on the next $200,000, bringing it up to $400,000. How will that result? The man who assesses $100,000 or less—which is the case in a good many of the little districts throughout the United States—will receive $1,500, all the assessors starting from that point. The man who assesses $100,000 more will receive half of one per cent. on that, which will increase his compensation $500, and bring it up to $2,000. The man who assesses $200,000 more, and brings his assessment up to the average assessment throughout the United States, will reach $2,500. After that we have allowed one tenth of one per cent. to the man who assesses $1,000,000, which will bring his salary up to $3,100; and if he runs up to $5,000,000, that will give him $7,100. It may be assumed, then, that from two thousand to twenty-five hundred dollars will be the average salary; that is, an assessment of from $200,000 up to $400,000, or, perhaps, you might say that the average will run up to $2,500, which will be the compensation for the man who assesses to the amount of $400,000. Is this too much? I think not.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] differs from me, and, I think, from the general judgment on this subject, when he says that the assessor fills an office of no great responsibility. Why, sir, all through your internal revenue laws, the assessor discharges a most important function. It is not only upon him that we depend for determining what it is that shall be made the basis upon which we are to build up our whole system of collecting the revenue, but we make him, for a great many purposes, a judicial officer. He bears all his own expenses. He has no allowance for anything excepting clerk hire and office rent at his place of business. To whatever portions of the district he may be called, to whatever duty he may be required to turn his attention, for whatever he may do in the supervision of his assistants, he receives no additional compensation whatever. And I hold, in reference to all these internal revenue officers that we are providing for, that it is wise, while we are not extravagant and do not pay large salaries, to pay respectable salaries, so as to secure good services of good men, and at the same time lift those men at least above the ordinary temptations which they will be subjected to if we attempt to bring them down to some starving point.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. MILLER. I move to amend the amount named in the section by adding to it one dollar. I rise merely to say that I agree with the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. SCHENCK] that the assessors ought to be allowed a fair compensation. I agree that it is a very important office, and that none but honest men should be selected to fill the office, and they should receive a fair compensation. And if we give a fair compensation we can secure honest and competent men to discharge the duties. It is necessarily a responsible office.

I know that the complaint has heretofore been made that too many of these assessors have been appointed. In my district, with all small counties, two assessors were appointed to discharge the duties where one would have been enough. And notwithstanding they appointed two assessors, each charged for nearly his whole time.

It seems to me that the salary proposed by this section is sufficiently respectable. And if we would secure men of talent and integrity to discharge this duty we ought to pay them a fair compensation. If we do not pay a fair compensation we cannot expect to obtain the services of such men.

Gentlemen say that good men can be obtained for $1,000 a year. That may be the case in some places, but I deny that they can be got all over the country for that compensation. Perhaps the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. ELA] can find such a man in his district. But, as a general rule, you cannot secure good men to discharge these duties for a less compensation than that proposed here. I believe that so far as this matter of compensation is concerned the Committee of Ways and Means have given the subject careful consideration, and have come to a correct conclusion. And I believe it is the duty of the Committee of the Whole to sustain the Committee of Ways and Means in reference to this part of their bill.

Mr. ELA. It seems to me unfortunate that gentlemen should oppose the reduction of this compensation on the ground that it is necessary to give high pay to get honest assessors. If you will consult the records of the revenue department you will find that, as a general rule, the rascality and thieving has been in proportion to the amount of compensation paid. If the receipts of these assessors do not amount to $100,000 a year, they certainly cannot work more than one tenth part of their time. Then why give them a high compensation?

I have been an assistant assessor. I have assessed regularly in my district at the rate of $25,000 a month, at a cost never exceeding fifty or sixty dollars per month. I received four dollars per day for my services when employed. I thought I was a reasonably good assistant assessor, and I was well satisfied with my compensation. Now, when the expenses of collecting the revenue are diminished, it is proposed to increase the pay of assistant assessors a dollar a day.

Mr. SCHENCK. The Committee of Ways and Means do not propose any increase. This increase took effect in March, 1867, and I would remind the gentleman that we are not now considering the pay of assistant assessors.

Mr. MILLER. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I renew the amendment to the amendment for the purpose of giving some information that may enable some members to vote more understandingly than they otherwise would.

The gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] I think, comes from the third district of Indiana. Am I right?

Mr. HOLMAN. From the fourth district.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I asked the gentleman how much revenue was collected from his district; and he replied that he thought it was about one million five hundred thousand dollars per annum. I thought at the time that he had put it about three times too high. Since I asked the question I have examined the returns upon that subject, so as to be able to give some information to the committee. The fourth Indiana district returned, through its collector, to the Treasury of the United States for the last fiscal year, $739,000. That lacks about eight hundred thousand dollars of making the $1,500,000 to which the gentleman from Indiana referred.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman will allow me to explain. He knows very well that from districts in which spirits are largely manufactured and yield a large part of the taxation they are shipped in bond, and this may account for the figures which the gentleman has read. During the last fiscal year—the year ending with the 30th of the present month—the taxation paid by my district, instead of being $1,500,000, has been, I am confident, $2,000,000.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I am aware, Mr. Chairman, that much of the whisky made in the West is shipped in bond, and under the old law does not enter into the pay account of the assessor until it has been sold. Most of the whisky made during the last year in the gentleman's district, as well as in my own, is still in bond, and thus far has yielded no income to the assessors of the respective districts. I simply want to add, for the information of the committee, that the highest amount returned from any collection district in the State of Indiana for the last year was $739,000 and the lowest amount $92,000. The average in that State will not exceed $250,000; so that the highest salary for an assessor in the gentleman's district would not exceed $2,500, and the salaries would range from that down to $1,500.

Mr. MULLINS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to show the discrepancies in point of principle in the arguments of those who advocate these high rates of pay. In the first place it is declared that if we desire the successful collection of the revenue from distilled spirits we shall obtain more money by reducing the tax to seventy-five or fifty cents on the gallon than by retaining it at two dollars. This tax, it is said, is so heavy that it induces men to search out the loop-holes through which they can crawl with their liquor without paying tax. Reduce the tax, say gentlemen, to a certain standard, and you do away with the temptation to fraud. Now, sir, the same principle may be applied here. Reduce the standard of pay to that of mechanics and other honest men who are obliged to make their own living and are not ashamed to show their heads anywhere. So long as you discriminate as you have done, giving more pay to public officers who are the instruments of cheating the Government than can be earned by private citizens engaged in honest labor, you may expect to have frauds on the revenue. Reduce the pay to such a standard that the temptation will not be so great. Pay these officers no more wages than can be earned by honest men earning their living by the sweat of their brow.

I know what assessors are in my country. Instead of coming to us we have to go down to their offices and make our assessments. They do not ride over the country. They are too much the gentlemen to do that. Not one assessor in fifty goes out of his office to levy an assessment. They send out notices that if the assessments are not sent in at a certain time, within ten days, they will be levied at double of what they should be. They put you down double, and God only knows where it goes to. The double does not go to the Government; they double it into their own pockets. [Laughter.]

I think it is time to bring them down to the common standard; bring them down as you bring everything else down. They say that the clerks do all the work. Then they levy black mail on their masters. You decrease the labor, and you ought not to increase the pay. The Good Book says that "the laborer is worthy of his hire;" and the Government does not let the sun go down upon the laborer in its vineyard without his hire. When you reduce the work you ought to reduce the pay. In this way you will have a harmonious policy.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask unanimous consent to have debate terminate on this section.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. I object. I want to move an amendment in reference to cigar-makers.

Mr. SCHENCK. Then upon all but that portion.

Mr. CHURCHILL. I object. I want to move an amendment in reference to assistant assessors.

The question was taken on Mr. ELA's amendment; and there were—ayes 10, noes 30; no quorum voting.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chairman appointed Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. BLAINE.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 29, noes 66.

The Chairman voted in the negative.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. I move in line fifty-five to strike out "and twenty-five cents for each certificate of registration given to a cigar-maker on payment of his special tax."

Mr. SCHENCK. I rise to a point of order. That has just been put in on motion of the committee.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. This strikes out additional matter to that inserted by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. I observe, in a subsequent section, that it is provided, as follows:

Cigar-makers shall each pay one dollar. Every person whose business it is to make cigars for others, either for pay, upon commission, on shares, or otherwise, from material furnished by others, shall be regarded as a cigar-maker. Every cigar-maker employed in the making of cigars in any collection district other than the district where such special tax receipt shall have been issued to him, shall register his name and residence, without previous demand therefor, with the assistant assessor of the division in which such cigar-maker shall be so employed; and any cigar-maker who shall neglect or refuse to make such registry shall, on conviction thereof, be fined five dollars for each day that such cigar-maker shall so offend by neglecting or refusing to register.

Besides paying this special tax they are by this bill compelled to pay a tax for certificate of registration. If they shall neglect or refuse to make this registration they are to pay five dollars. I understand that cigar-making is an honorable occupation, as much so as any other, and I cannot conceive why they should be compelled any more than carpenters or shoemakers to pay a dollar tax. This is unjust legislation in regard to these cigar-makers, and I hope that it will all be stricken out of the bill. When we come to the other part of the bill I will also move to strike out the paragraph I have read.

Mr. SCHENCK. In the manufacture of cigars it is absolutely essential if you will collect the tax of the makers of cigars. They are made on shares and in shops, and this registration is resorted to for the purpose of keeping the run of the cigar-makers. The special tax is resorted to simply as a matter of police in order to identify the better and to know what is the work of the shops. The gentleman will perhaps be relieved by knowing that we propose to reduce the tax to fifty cents.

What the gentleman proposes to strike out is properly in this section. If the tax be abolished, then we can come back and strike this out.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. Let it be reserved for the present.

Mr. SCHENCK. Very well.

Mr. CHURCHILL. I move to amend in line fifty, by striking out five dollars and inserting $4 25. The committee have just refused to reduce this from five dollars to four dollars. From my observation, I believe the compensation as fixed by the report of the committee is greater than that which is allowed to State or local officers throughout the United States. I think it is considerably greater than the judgment of the country will sustain us in paying these men. I know in my own district the same men were engaged in performing the duties of assistant assessors when the compensation was four dollars a day who are now employed at five dollars, and they were just as anxious to hold the offices at the former compensation as they are now. I believe we shall be able to secure the same degree of business efficiency and trustworthiness by fixing the pay at $4 25 as by making it five dollars, and the saving will be over one hundred thousand dollars a year to the Treasury of the United States. In my own district the saving will exceed five hundred dollars, and multiplying that by the number of districts in the United States will make $125,000.

Mr. SCHENCK. The committee have made no change in this compensation. It is now five dollars, and has been so since March, 1867. Before that it was four dollars. The gentleman now proposes to make it $4 25. These assessors, I find by the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, are employed, on an average, one hundred and forty-four days in the year. That amounts, at five dollars per day, to $720 each. The gentleman is mistaken if he supposes these men are employed all the year round. I do not think they will be employed as much hereafter as heretofore, because we have taken away the assessment of manufactures and we have added certain penalties for false charges. I think hereafter one hundred days will be a fair average instead of one hundred and forty-four. I hope the amendment will not prevail, particularly considering that these men bear all their expenses traveling about the country.

The amendment of Mr. CHURCHILL was disagreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That the assessor of each collection district shall, on the first Monday of March in each year, and from time to time each month thereafter, direct and cause each assistant assessor to proceed through every part of his division, and inquire after and concerning all persons within his division owning, possessing, or having the care of management of any property, goods, wares, and merchandise, articles or objects liable to stamp or other taxes, including all persons liable to any special or other tax, under the provisions of this act, and to notify the owner or owners of such liability to tax, and to value and enumerate the said objects of taxation respectively, and to assess the taxes required to be assessed by law.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move, on behalf of the committee, to amend by striking out in the seventeenth line the words "each month."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 18. And be it further enacted, That in case any person shall be absent from his residence or place of business at the time the assistant assessor shall call for his annual return, and no annual return has been rendered by such person as required by law, the assistant assessor shall leave at such place of residence or business, with some one of suitable age or discretion being there present, or otherwise shall deposit in the nearest post office a notice addressed to such person requiring him to render to such assistant assessor the annual return, duly verified by oath or affirmation, within ten days from the date of such notice. And if any person, on being notified or required as aforesaid, shall refuse or neglect to render such return within the time designated, he shall, on conviction, be fined not less than $100 nor more than $1,000.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. I move to amend in line thirteen, by inserting after the word "designated" the words "and shall fail within a reasonable time to give a good and sufficient excuse for such neglect."

Mr. SCHENCK. What is a reasonable excuse?

Mr. PILLE. I suggest to the gentleman to give a definite limit, say ninety days.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. A reasonable time is, like any other legal fact, to be judged by the circumstances surrounding the case.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I suggest thirty days.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. Well, then, thirty days.

Mr. BEAMAN. I suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that the difficulty will be avoided by inserting before the word "neglect" the word "willfully."

Mr. VAN TRUMP. That will do. I accept that as a modification of my amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. If the gentleman from Ohio will withdraw his amendment and move to insert the word "willfully," I have no objection to it.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. I have done so.

Mr. VAN TRUMP's amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. JENCKES. I offer the following amendment:

In line seven of section eighteen, after the word "present," insert the words "and being of the household or in the employment of such person," and strike out the words "or otherwise," next following and insert the word "and" before "shall," and the word "also" after "shall," so that the section will read:

SEC. 18. And be it further enacted, That in case any person shall be absent from his residence or place of business at the time the assistant assessor shall call for his annual return, and no annual return has been rendered by such person as required by law, the assistant assessor shall leave at such place of residence or business, with some one of suitable age or discretion being there present, and being of the household or in the employment of such person, and shall also deposit in the nearest post office, a notice, addressed to such person, requiring him to render to such assistant assessor the annual return, duly verified by oath or affirmation, within ten days from the date of such notice, &c.

As this section now stands a person may be liable to the penalty just now the subject of consideration if the notification is left with any stranger at his house or office. The person leaving the notice is not bound to inquire whether the person with whom it is left is in the employment of the man to be assessed.

Mr. SCHENCK. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him? I do not like to spoil a good speech, but I hope his amendment will be adopted.

Mr. JENCKES. Then I have nothing more to say.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move to strike out "one hundred," in line fourteen of the section, and insert "ten" in lieu thereof; so that the clause will read:

And if any person, on being notified or required as aforesaid, shall refuse or neglect to render such return within the time designated, he shall, on conviction, be fined not less than ten dollars, nor more than $1,000.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Let me say a word with regard to this amendment. Here is a discretion running clear up to $1,000, and there may be many instances where the taxes are only small special taxes.

Mr. SCHENCK. The penalty is only imposed where the person refuses or willfully neglects.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Well, that presupposes a trial where willful neglect has been found against the delinquent. Now, why should you limit it to $100 when you leave a discretion running up to $1,000? If you leave the fine from ten dollars to $1,000 it will answer all purposes.

Mr. MULLINS. The Government does not run a one-horse machine; it runs a ten-horse machine.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Well, I would like to have it so that the fine imposed shall be not less than ten dollars nor more than $1,000.

The question was taken; and the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. JENCKES. I move to strike out "one hundred" and insert "fifty," and I do it for the purpose of asking the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means in what section of the bill provision is made for the manner in which these penalties shall be collected, whether by indictment, or in what manner?

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not recollect the number of the section, but there is a provision covering the proceedings.

Mr. JENCKES. I have looked for it in vain. It might make a very considerable difference in my view of the penalties to be imposed if I knew the manner in which they are to be collected.

No further amendments being offered to the eighteenth section, the Clerk read the nineteenth section, as follows:

SEC. 19. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of every person made liable to the payment of any tax imposed by law, when not otherwise provided for, under his management or control, any business, trade, or profession, goods, wares, and merchandise, articles or objects, removed, sold, or delivered, or in any mode liable by this act to any annual, monthly, special, or other tax, and however required by this act to be paid, on or before the first Monday of March in each year, and in other cases before the day of levy, to make a true and accurate return, verified by oath or affirmation, to the assistant assessor, of the proper division of the district in which he resides, of the amount of his annual income, the articles or objects owned or controlled by him charged with a specific tax, the quantity of goods, wares, and merchandise sold, or manufactured and sold by him, and charged with special or ad valorem tax, with the aggregate amount of all such sales, and all returns required in reference to any business under his control or management according to the respective provisions of this act, and according to the forms and regulations to be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, for which such person is liable to be assessed, or for which any other person whose business he controls or manages is liable to be assessed; and the person owning, possessing, or having the superintendence, management, or control of the business or profession, the goods, wares, or merchandise, articles or objects, liable to tax, shall be held by this act to be the person required to make all returns, and shall be deemed responsible for the correctness thereof. All returns for taxation shall, when not otherwise specially provided for, be made with reference to the time fixed by this act for the making of such returns; and any schedule, statement, enumeration, or description of any goods, wares, or merchandise, articles or objects, trade, business, or profession, required by this act to be made and delivered to an assessor or assistant assessor, shall be deemed to be a return.

No amendment was offered.

The next section was read, as follows:

SEC. 20. And be it further enacted, That any person having the care or management of property, goods, wares, and merchandise, articles or objects, not within the assessment district in which he resides, shall be permitted to make and deliver the returns thereof required by this act, stating therein the assessment district in which the said objects of taxation are situated, at the time and in the manner prescribed, to the assistant assessor of the assessment district wherein such person resides. And it shall be the duty of the assistant assessor who receives any such return to transmit the same to the assessor of the district in which such objects of taxation may be; and it shall be the duty of said assessor to cause an examination to be made and to send back the said return with his approval indorsed thereon, and with any alterations therein or additions thereto which may be found to be just and proper, to the assistant assessor from whom it was received, who shall proceed to make the assessment of the tax upon the said return in all respects as if the same had been made up by himself.

No amendment was offered.

The next section was read, as follows:

SEC. 21. And be it further enacted, That whenever there shall be in any assessment district any property, goods, wares, and merchandise, articles or objects, liable to be taxed, and not owned or possessed by, or under the care or management of, any person within such district, no return of which shall have been transmitted to the assistant assessor in the manner provided by this act, it shall be the duty of the assistant assessor for such district to enter into and upon the premises where such property is situated, and take such view thereof as may be necessary, and to make returns of the same, according to the form prescribed, which being verified by the said assistant assessor shall be taken as good and sufficient returns of such property, goods, wares, and merchandise, articles or objects, as aforesaid, for all legal purposes.

No amendment was offered.

The next section was read as follows:

SEC. 22. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of all persons required to make returns of income and articles or objects charged with an internal tax to declare in such returns whether the several rates and amounts therein contained are stated according to their values in currency or according to their values in coined money; and in case of neglect or refusal so to declare to the satisfaction of the assistant assessor receiving such returns, such assistant assessor is hereby required to make returns for such persons so neglecting or refusing, as in cases of persons neglecting or refusing to make any return, and to assess the tax thereon, and to add thereto the amount of penalties imposed by law in cases of such neglect or refusal. And whenever the rates and amounts contained in the returns as aforesaid shall be stated in coined money it shall be the duty of each assessor receiving the same to reduce such rates and amounts to their equivalent in currency, according to the value of such coined money in said currency for the time covered by such returns. And the returns required to be furnished to collectors by assessors shall in all cases contain the several amounts of taxes assessed, estimated, or valued in currency only.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to move to amend this section by striking out the words "coined money" where they occur in the section, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "coin."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am also instructed to move to further amend this section by inserting before the word "penalties" the words "penal taxes or," in the clause which now reads "and to add thereto the amount of penal taxes or penalties imposed by law in cases of such neglect or refusal."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER. I move to further amend this section by adding to it the following:

Provided, That the party aggrieved shall have the right of appeal from such decision to the district court of the United States, and it shall be the duty of said court to put the case so appealed in proper form in order to have the disputed facts tried by jury, subject to writ of error, as in other cases: And provided further, That the appellant shall enter into recognizance before the clerk of such court or a judge thereof in a sum sufficient to cover all costs in case of being unsuccessful upon the trial.

Mr. SCHENCK. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. SCHENCK. My point of order is that the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MILLER] proposes to regulate the manner of collecting the tax, &c., while the section under consideration refers to nothing in the world except to the form of money in which the returns shall be made.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, and rules the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania out of order.

Mr. JENCKES. I move to further amend this section by striking out the words, "and to add thereto the amount of penal taxes or penalties imposed by law in cases of such neglect or refusal." I consider it to be no part of the duty of the assessor to add to the assessment of taxes any amount of penalties that the party assessed may have incurred by reason of not fulfilling the requirements of the law preliminary to the assessment of the tax.

This is a grave question, and I believe this is the first place in this bill where this question arises. It arises also in section thirty, and in some of the intermediate and the subsequent sections. This clause in fact gives power to assessors to try and convict parties against whom any neglect is alleged, to impose upon them penalties, to determine the amount of the penalty, and also to provide the means of collecting it by adding it to the amount of tax they may assess against the parties. That is then given over to the collector, who will use the power with which he is clothed by this act to collect that penalty for the Government. I believe this is the first instance in the history of this Government, or in the history of any State government, in which judicial powers have been given to a collector of taxes.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman allow me to say that in my own State it has for a long time been the law that when a return is not made within a specified time it shall be the duty of the proper officer to add a certain amount of additional tax.

Mr. JENCKES. That is, a certain percentage; and if this were such a provision I would make no objection.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is precisely what we propose here.

Mr. JENCKES. No, sir; in this case the rate or amount is not fixed. If it were a percentage upon the tax it would be analogous to the penalties imposed in various States. But these are penalties for violating the provisions of the act or for non-conformity to its requirements; and before such a penalty can be imposed upon any citizen of the United States he must be tried, convicted, and sentenced by a court of competent jurisdiction in some proceeding known to the Constitution and laws of the United States.

The provision of this bill is entirely different from the provisions of State law to which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] has referred. I am as familiar, I think, with those statutes as the gentleman from Ohio. In all those cases there is a percentage to be added or a fixed sum to be paid for failure to make return or for non-payment by a given day.

But in no case do those statutes propose to inflict without a trial and conviction a penalty for an act in regard to which the party is entitled to the judgment of a court and jury. Every one of the penalties laid here is such as requires a trial and conviction before it can be imposed, such a trial and conviction as are provided for in section fifty-six of this bill. I would have no objection to a provision that if the fine be not paid in a court of competent jurisdiction, it shall be added to the assessment. But all our penal statutes provide a much more stringent remedy for the collection of penalties than placing them in the tax levy and authorizing them to be collected upon the collector's warrant. All such penalties must be collected by the marshal under a warrant from the court. The party must either pay them or suffer imprisonment.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Chairman, I wish there were no such thing as adding on a penalty and collecting it, because the other day, having omitted to pay a tax within the time allowed, I was obliged to pay a percentage, a heavy penalty, and costs in addition. I will try not to overlook such a matter again.

As to the provision of this bill, let me turn the gentleman to a precedent in the laws of the United States. I hold in my hand the internal revenue law as now in force, and upon this point the language adopted and repeated in two successive enactments is this:

"And in case of neglect or refusal so to declare to the satisfaction of the assistant assessor receiving such returns or lists, such assistant assessor is hereby required to make returns or lists for such persons so neglecting or refusing, as in cases of persons neglecting or refusing to make the returns or lists required by the act aforesaid, and to assess the tax thereon, and to add thereto the amount of penalty imposed by law in case of such neglect or refusal."

Mr. JENCKES. That is all proper enough, and if these penalties were fixed—if they were not left discretionary—

Mr. SCHENCK. They are all fixed. There are two classes of cases running through the law. One is what may be called a penalty by a percentage, as for instance adding twenty or thirty per cent. to the tax. The other is a specific penalty, a fixed amount. The only change we have made in the law is that instead of having only the word "penalty," we have inserted "penal taxes or penalties."

Mr. JENCKES. Confine it to penal taxes.

Mr. SCHENCK. I prefer to retain what is in the present law, adding the words "penal taxes." It will then cover both cases.

Mr. JENCKES. I move to strike out the word "penalty" and insert "penal taxes."

The CHAIRMAN. "Penal taxes" are already in the bill.

Mr. JENCKES. Then I move to strike out the word "penalty."

Mr. MILLER. It seems to me that it must be conceded by every lawyer in the House that a penalty of that kind cannot be enforced under the Constitution without a trial in court. Here it is proposed to do it without a jury, without a court, without a trial. It proposes to give the assessor extraordinary power. I say that we should not give to any assessor such a vast power of imposing penalties. It is against the Constitution. Gentlemen say that it is in the present law. I do not care if it is. It is an arbitrary power. It is one of the greatest outrages perpetrated upon the people. There is no trial before a court, no trial before a jury. The penalty is to be imposed without any remedy.

Mr. MAYNARD. This is simply the law as it now stands upon the statute-book. Has anybody been inconvenienced by it? Has the gentleman heard of anybody who has been inconvenienced by it? Has he brought in any bill to repeal it?

Mr. MILLER. I know of an assessor in my district who imposed upon a man five times what he ought to have done, and he would not give him a hearing.

Mr. MAYNARD. That is not the provision of this law. We do not give him any such power. The law fixes the matter. We do not give him any such discretion.

Mr. MILLER. The assessor fixed the penalty without giving the man a hearing.

Mr. MAYNARD. This refers to when a man does not make a return of his taxes on a particular day.

Mr. JENCKES. Is there any existing law which allows an assessor to fix the amount according to his discretion?

Mr. MAYNARD. This does not allow it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. PETERS. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. POMEROY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 1060) to reduce into one act and to amend the laws relating to internal taxes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. HOLMAN, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill (S. No. 320) for the relief of George Lynch, a soldier of the war of 1812; when the Speaker signed the same.

RIGHTS OF ADOPTED CITIZENS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a message from the President of the United States, transmitting a report from the Secretary of State, in relation to the trial of American citizens in Great Britain and Ireland for the last two years; which, on motion of Mr. JUDD, was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Indefinite leave of absence was granted to Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio; and leave of absence till Monday next to Mr. ALLISON.

SALE OF OSAGE INDIAN LANDS.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I ask unanimous consent to offer a preamble and resolution. Before the resolution is read I desire to state that I have this day received a letter which I present to the House, and which reads as follows:

LAWRENCE, KANSAS, June 2, 1868.

SIR: A treaty has just been forced from the Osage Indians, whereby they sell to the Leavenworth, Lawrence, and Galveston Railroad Company (a very feeble concern) all their diminished reserve and trust lands, embracing eight million acres, for $1,600,000, payable in thirty-two semi-annual installments. Three eighths thereof is the finest land in Kansas, while the remainder is inexhaustibly rich in mineral wealth. The intention of the conspirators now is to rush their treaty (so called) through the Senate hastily upon the false assumption that unless the Osages are at once removed bloody collisions with the whites will ensue. This treaty was drafted

* some time since at Washington. The settlers and those who shall desire to obtain cheap homes for many years to come can rely only on you and such of your associates as are opposed to the usurpations of monopolies for relief. Appreciating your previous efforts in this direction, I now write you in behalf of all poor men who shall desire cheap homes for many years to come, and in their name request of you to institute an inquiry as to the means whereby so iniquitous a treaty was obtained, and why actual settlers cannot by the terms thereof have said eight million acres of land instead of a monopoly engrossing the same at twenty cents per acre.

I am, sir, respectfully, your obedient servant,

HENRY C. WHITNEY.

Hon. WILLIAM LAWRENCE, Washington, D. C.

I have already given my views upon the treaty-making power, and of the right assumed to sell the public lands under its authority. I will not now repeat my arguments denying the constitutional validity of sales made under treaties. The particular ground upon which this treaty will be vindicated perhaps may be that it will aid a railroad enterprise. For one I will do all that properly may be done to aid railroads. But whatever is to be done should be done in pursuance of an act of Congress.

The President and Senate cannot, under cover of the treaty-making power, dictate the land policy nor the railroad policy of the United States.

In the name of the laboring and landless people of this country I insist that the public lands shall, except in special cases, and for the most urgent reasons, be reserved for homestead entries. Our public domain is rapidly being transferred into the hands of the few to the prejudice of the many. And I shall insist, in every proper way, that wherever lands shall be granted to railroad companies to aid in the construction of roads, that the companies shall be required by law to sell the lands to actual settlers at a price not exceeding $1 25 an acre. This should in all cases be required by law. The gentleman from Washington Territory, [Mr. FLANDERS,] in his speech of May 18, has given us the means of estimating the importance of the principle involved in such a provision. He says:

"According to the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office for 1867, Congress by different enactments have granted land in aid of railroad enterprises in different States, as follows:

Illinois.....	2,595,053
Mississippi.....	2,062,240
Alabama.....	3,720,130
Florida.....	2,360,114
Louisiana.....	1,578,720
Arkansas.....	4,804,271
Missouri.....	3,745,160
Iowa.....	6,751,207
Michigan.....	6,327,930
Wisconsin.....	5,878,360
Minnesota.....	7,783,403
Kansas.....	7,753,000
California.....	3,720,000

Pacific railroads 'estimated'.....57,588,578
124,000,000

Wagon-Roads.
Wisconsin.....	250,000
Michigan.....	1,718,613
Oregon.....	1,256,800

Total number of acres.....184,813,991

"Of these one hundred and eighty-four million eight hundred and thirteen thousand nine hundred and ninety-one acres of land granted to aid in building different lines of railroad but twenty-one million five hundred and sixty-one thousand six hundred and fifty-four acres have been certified under these grants. All the balance is to be certified to after the conditions upon which the grants are made to the different companies are complied with."

In other words, one hundred and sixty-three million two hundred and fifty-two thousand three hundred and thirty-seven acres of land authorized by law to be granted in aid of railroad enterprises remain yet to be actually granted or patented to railroad companies. Now, allowing one hundred and sixty acres for a homestead, the lands yet to be granted will furnish one million twenty thousand three hundred and twenty-seven homes, which, at five in each family, will give household happiness and independence to five million one hundred and one thousand six hundred and thirty-five people. And although each particular tract of one hundred and sixty acres may not be arable, yet in the coming time homesteads will be made in a less amount of acres, so that, practically, we are to determine whether a million of homes shall be secured to actual settlers or whether the earnings of a million men are to be made tributary to great land monopolies for more than a generation.

The Clerk read the preamble and resolution, as follows:

Whereas it is reported that a treaty has been concluded between the United States and the Osage Indians, by the terms of which eight million acres of the public lands of the United States are to be sold to the Leavenworth, Lawrence, and Galveston Railroad Company for $1,600,000, payable in thirty-two semi-annual installments; and whereas this House denies that the President and Senate, under the treaty-making power, can sell the public lands of the United States, and subvert the homestead and land policy of the Government, and deprive Congress of the power to control the disposition of said lands; and whereas sound policy requires that the public lands should be so disposed of by law as to secure them to actual settlers under the homestead laws; and whereas it is unjust and inexpedient to permit said lands to be owned in large tracts so as to be kept from occupancy and held for sale at high prices: Therefore,

Resolved, That the House of Representatives hereby declares that it is not competent for the President and Senate to dispose of the public lands by treaty without the authority of an act of Congress, and the Committee on the Public Lands are directed to inquire and report what measures are necessary to arrest the unconstitutional mode of disposing of the public lands by treaty.

Mr. BROOKS. I object. It goes into the Globe, and that is all the gentleman desires, I suppose.

BONDING OF IMPORTED GOODS.

Mr. RAUM, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1162) to amend the various acts relative to the bonding of imported goods, and to provide for the more speedy payment of duties thereon; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

THOMAS M'LEAN.

Mr. HOPKINS. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on the Public Lands a bill (H. R. No. 1033) for the relief of Thomas McLean, with a recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was read. It authorizes Thomas McLean to enter and purchase so much of lot No. 124 as has not been disposed of in the Stockbridge reservation in Wisconsin, used and occupied by him, at the price stipulated in the third section of the act of March 3, 1865, providing for the disposition of said reservation, and receive a patent therefor; the said McLean having cultivated and occupied the same for a long series of years.

Mr. RANDALL. Does the gentleman desire to pass that bill now?

Mr. HOPKINS. It is reported unanimously from the committee, and I desire to have it passed.

Mr. BROOKS. Oh, it is too late; let us adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill. The Chair hears none, and the bill is before the House.

Mr. JOHNSON. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at ten o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. HULBURD: The petition of C. P. Clark and others, citizens of Ogdensburg, New York, asking reduction of tax on cigars, &c.

By Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania: The petition of 54 tobacco growers, 121 journeymen cigar-makers, 36 dealers in cigars and tobacco, all citizens of Lancaster county, Pennsylvania, praying Congress to try the system of collecting the revenue on cigars by making the stamps a revenue stamp instead of an inspector's stamp, sold only to manufacturers, with suitable checks to prevent fraud and counterfeits, and leave the rate of taxation as now fixed by law.

By Mr. TAFTE: The petition of Willis & Andresen and others, citizens of the State of Nebraska, and cigar manufacturers, journeymen cigar-makers, dealers in cigars, growers of and dealers in seed-leaf tobacco, praying that the existing rate of internal revenue tax on cigars be not disturbed.

By Mr. UPSON: The petition of Anthony Kruger and 20 others, citizens of Detroit, remonstrating against the proposed increase of tax on cigars.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, June 6, 1868.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

SECRETARY OF THE SENATE.

GEORGE C. GORHAM, elected on the 4th instant Secretary of the Senate, appeared, and the oaths prescribed by law were administered to him by the President pro tempore.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a petition of the owners of the bonded warehouses, class B, for the storage of tobacco, snuff, and cigars in the city of Philadelphia, praying a reduction of the tax on manufactured tobacco; which was referred to the Committee Finance.

Mr. MORGAN presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, praying an appropriation for the removal of the wreck of the steamer Scotland on the entrance of the bar off Sandy Hook, and the removal of obstructions in the harbor of New York; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of Richard M. Hoe, praying an extension of his patent for an improvement in printing presses; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. WILSON presented the petition of Robert A. Hill, praying a removal of the civil disabilities imposed upon W. H. Bearden, of Mississippi, by acts of Congress; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. FERRY presented a petition of cigar manufacturers, journeymen cigar-makers, dealers in cigars, growers of and dealers in seed leaf tobacco, praying the adoption of the system of collecting the revenue on cigars by making the stamp a revenue stamp instead of an inspector's stamp, sold only to licensed manufacturers; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. DRAKE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 515) in aid of the Union Pacific railway, eastern division; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and ordered to be printed.

REPRESENTATION OF SOUTHERN STATES.

Mr. POMEROY. As there seems to be no further morning business, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1058) to admit the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, and Alabama to representation in Congress, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. WILSON to the amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary, to insert the word "Alabama" after "Georgia" in the fourth line of the first section of the committee's amendment.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I desire a few moments of the time of the Senate to reply to the remarks made yesterday by the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING.] That Senator was entirely mistaken in charging me with having voted for the proposition requiring a majority of all the votes registered to vote on the ratification of the constitutions in the rebel States. The proposition requiring that at least one half of all the registered voters should vote upon the question of ratification was made by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.] Twenty-four Senators voted for it and fourteen against it. My name is recorded against it. I repeatedly spoke against requiring a majority of all the registered voters to vote on the ratification of the constitution; I protested against it, and in committee of conference opposed it.

The original bill required for the ratification of the constitutions "a majority of the votes of the electors qualified." My colleague moved to amend it so that it would read, the constitutions should be "ratified by a majority of all the electors registered." It was thought by Senators that the provision, as proposed to be amended, would be construed so as to require a majority of all the registered voters to vote in favor of ratification.

I opposed the amendment, and maintained that only a majority of the votes given was required by the bill; that a majority of the votes given ought to determine the result; and I maintained that the "effect of the amendment will be to retard the adoption of these constitutions and to postpone the admission of these States." I declared that under the construction requiring a majority of the votes registered to be given for ratification "not one of these constitutions is sure of adoption;" and I protested against any vote or any legislation that tended to check or hinder the organization of these States.

On that occasion the Senator from New York wished to know of me if I was in favor of bringing in States without having any evidence that a majority of their people were in favor of their coming in. In reply to the Senator's questions I maintained that a majority voting on ratification ought to determine the result; that the more united the people were in favor of the constitution the fewer would be the votes given; that the contest would be on the choice of delegates, and I would not object to requiring a majority of the registered voters to vote for or against a convention on the day the delegates were elected. I closed my remarks by saying: "Therefore, sir, I think that we ought to leave the ratification of these constitutions to a majority of the people of these States who cast their votes. They will be registered; they will go to the ballot-box at the election for delegates. Then they will consider the great battle fought. When they elect delegates and when the constitutions are generally acquiesced in they will think the contest is all over. It is proposed that after all this, unless a majority of them go to the ballot-box and vote for these constitutions the work shall be lost. Why should that be? What is to be gained by it? Can we not trust the majority of the men who vote? I think we can, and I shall so vote."

The amendment of my colleague was rejected by a vote of 19 to 25, and my vote is recorded in the negative.

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] then moved that at least three fifths of all the registered voters should vote upon the question of ratification of the constitutions. Nineteen Senators voted for the proposition, twenty-one against it, and my name is recorded in the negative. The honorable Senator from Vermont then moved to amend the bill so as to require a majority of all the registered voters to vote upon the question of ratification, and this amendment was adopted—yeas 24, nays 14. My name is recorded in the negative. This amendment introduced by the Senator from Vermont thus became a part of the law, and under its operations the friends of reconstruction failed in Alabama, and would have failed in the other States if Congress had not hastened to repeal it by a vote approaching unanimity. It was that provision, requiring that a majority of the registered voters should vote for or against ratification, that I opposed by speech and vote, and which I have ever condemned both as a matter of principle and of policy.

The honorable Senator from Missouri [Mr. DRAKE] then moved so to amend the bill as to require that on the day for election of delegates the registered voters should vote for or against a convention. I supported that amendment, declaring that I saw a marked distinction between taking the sense of the people on the day of the election of delegates and taking the sense of the people called to adopt or reject the constitution. I maintained that the great struggle in each of the States would be on the day of election of delegates; I maintained that on that day there would be a struggle for the control of the conventions; I maintained that if the rebels were beaten, if they lost the conventions, they would, if we gave them the privilege of being counted, stay at home and keep everybody else at home. I illustrated my position by saying: "There is to be an election on the fourth Monday of April, I understand, in New York, to elect delegates to a constitutional convention. There will be a great struggle; there will be a large vote on that day; but let that convention meet and make a constitution, and let it be one on which parties agree generally, and then submit it to the people on a day on which there is no other election, and if it brings out two hundred thousand of the eight hundred thousand voters of New York it will be a miracle."

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] moved to add as a proviso to the section introduced on motion of the Senator from Missouri, "that such convention shall not be held unless a majority of all the registered voters shall have voted on the question of holding such convention." This amendment was adopted—yeas 21, nays 18. My name is recorded in the affirmative, in accordance with the views I had expressed. To gratify Senators who were anxious that a majority of the registered voters in each State should pronounce in favor of reconstruction, I was willing that the people should vote for or against the constitution on the day of the election of delegates. I so declared and so acted, and the result in the ten States vindicated my recorded opinions and votes. The people in the ten States voted for conventions by more than two hundred thousand majority. Alabama gave a majority of eighty-five thousand for the convention, casting a larger vote by more than twenty-five thousand on the day of the election of delegates than on the day for the ratification of the constitution.

I say to the honorable Senator from New York, who thinks I spoke with great emphasis, that I intended no reflection on him or on any other Senator. I said nothing about self-evident truths. I thought the provision requiring a majority of all the registered voters to vote for or against the ratification of the constitutions was a sad mistake when it was adopted. I believed that it endangered reconstruction; I so said, and I voted against it, and struggled against it in the committee of conference, and only acquiesced in it when I could no longer help myself.

Sir, I close with the expression of the hope that the Senate will adopt the pending amendment; that Alabama will be incorporated into the bill and receive the support of the Senate, and its support under any circumstances that may arise.

Mr. CONKLING. Like the Senator from Massachusetts, I shall take no time of the Senate. I beg him to understand that it was no part of my wish to fasten upon him an inconsistency or to impute to him any improper disposition toward other members of this body. I thought that his denunciation bore great emphasis; I think so now; and I am not willing to sit quiet under the statement of the Senator, that I have mistaken or misstated his position on the amendment to the vote on which I yesterday alluded. Now, Mr. President, with the record in my hand, I reiterate what I said yesterday, and I say to the Senator, if he will look at it, he will find that his opposition was to a different amendment; different in form and different in substance; and I will state to him what it was. It was an amendment requiring a majority of all the registered voters to be cast in favor of the constitution. That proposition, as I stated yesterday, he opposed. He did illustrate it, as he says now, and as I well remember, by an election which was about to occur in the State of New York; and he will find that that debate had no reference whatever to the provision as it stands in the law, but was directed against the provision which I have just now stated. I can scarcely see, if he has looked at the record, (as I think he has, because I handed it to him yesterday,) how, in the face of the list of the yeas and nays to which I referred, which was the test vote upon this proposition and nothing else, the vote which determined whether it should be added to the bill or omitted from the bill, and upon which question he voted in the affirmative, he ventures to say that I was wrong in the statement that I made, and that he knew I was at the time. I have no doubt he thought he knew I was.

I intended, without his interposing, to state his vote from the record, but as the Senator was a little quick in interposing that "of course he voted for the bill," and stating that he voted for it in spite of this proposition, and that he fought this all the way through, I admit I led him to assume his position about it to the end that I might read the record about it; but I beg him to understand that I had no malice in that. I thought that a fair and good-natured advantage which he chose to give me. But there is no doubt whatever that he voted for the amendment as a majority of his associates did; and however "self-evidently wrong" it may have been—because I beg the Senator's pardon—he did use that expression—

Mr. WILSON. No, sir; I have looked at my remarks, and it is not in them.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg pardon; I have not looked to see; but I am not the only Senator sitting quite near who misunderstood my friend if he did not use that expression. However clear I will say it may be to him now that this was fallacious, it was clear at the time to the majority of his associates that it was wise, and it was sufficiently clear to him to induce him to vote for it, as the record shows.

Mr. WILSON. I do not wish to take up time by continuing this controversy, but I repeat precisely what I have said, that the provision of law under which this failure took place, I voted against and opposed from the beginning to the end; while the provision of the third section, requiring a majority of the registered voters to vote on the day of the election of delegates for or against a convention, I voted for and spoke for, and that provision has executed itself and was entirely safe. We carried the conventions under it, obtaining a majority of nearly six hundred thousand. The provision of the other section under which we have lost the Alabama constitution, I was against from the beginning to the end, and opposed. That is the distinction.

Mr. CONKLING. Now, then, let me read the proposition upon which the yeas and nays were taken and see who was right:

"The constitution shall be ratified by a majority of the votes of the electors, qualified as herein specified, cast at said election, at least one half of all the registered voters voting upon the question."

The yeas and nays were taken upon that, and the Senator voted yea. Now, I want to know where it is in that proposition that anything is to be found about the choice of delegates?

Mr. SUMNER. As I see the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DOOLITTLE] in his place, I will now, with the permission of the Senate, complete the correction of an error into which he fell yesterday, and which I promised to do today. I do not do it, however, merely to correct the Senator, but because I think it important to establish a historical fact which is of great interest in the history of reconstruction, and also affects, as I think, criminally the President of the United States. The Senator from Wisconsin leaned upon Benjamin F. Perry, of South Carolina, as an authority, quoting him as a Union man. I replied that he was not a Union man, but that he was a rebel in the rebel service. The Senator denied it. I introduced then a speech which he made in the month of May, 1861, in which he said openly that he contributed a son and a negro to the confederate army, and that, if needed, he was ready to go forth into the war himself. I then said that I had at home further evidence showing that he held office under the rebel government. Now I produce it.

In the first place I mention that he became district judge for South Carolina, succeeding the traitor, A. G. Magrath, in the autumn of 1864. It may be said that that was merely a civil function; but he was at the same time in the discharge of other duties which connected him more intimately with the rebel government; and for what I am now about to state I give an authority which will not be questioned, it being an original copy of the tri-weekly Mercury of Charleston, South Carolina. I hold it in my hand, sir. You see it; but a half sheet, yellow, dingy paper, dated Charleston, South Carolina, Tuesday, December 13, 1864, and with the name of "R. B. Rhett, jr." at the top of its editorial column as the editor. In this paper I find an official document which is thus entitled:

"Schedule of prices established by the board of commissioners of the State of South Carolina under the act of Congress of the confederate States to regulate impressments."

And this is signed:

"B. F. PERRY,
"ALFRED M. MARTIN,"
"Commissioners."

And it is dated "Columbia, South Carolina, October 20, 1864." Therefore by this official paper it appears that B. F. Perry was a commissioner to regulate impressments for the rebel States. In the document which I have before me he furnishes a schedule of prices for different articles in the nature of supplies which were needed for the rebel army, and at the end of this long list, occupying nearly a column, he proceeds as follows:

"No doubt there are some who may think these prices too low, but they must remember that all must make great and trying sacrifices for their country while engaged in this great and destructive revolution. Honor, patriotism, and self-interest require it; our existence as a people demands it. If we fail in our death struggle all is lost—property, independence, liberty, honor, and life itself. Every one should, therefore, be willing to sustain the government by any sacrifice of property which may be demanded. They who are at home must consider that the soldier who is in the army is sacrificing his whole labor, the interest of his family, his comforts, and his life, while they are enjoying all their comforts with their families, and are only required to sell the surplus of their crops at low prices. This is a very small sacrifice when compared with that which the soldier is required to make. If the proper spirit shall continue to pervade the southern States, subjugation is impossible to a people scattered over a country thousands of miles in extent; but if that spirit is wanting at home, our ruin is inevitable, notwithstanding the gallantry and sacrifices of the army."

That is signed "B. F. Perry, Commissioner." Now, would you believe it, sir, within a little more than six months from the date of this document we find this same B. F. Perry commissioned by the President of the United States as provisional governor of South Carolina, in defiance of an act of Congress solemnly declaring that no person shall hold any office under the Government of the United States who has been engaged in the service of the rebellion. For that act of the President at the time I thought he ought to have been impeached. I think the Senate then would have done a proper duty if, taking notice of the act, it had solemnly charged the House of Representatives to take the necessary steps to bring the criminal to the bar. It was not done. There was a failure at that time of justice; but this act cannot be forgotten in the history of reconstruction, nor in the history of those transactions by which the President of the United States has thwarted the beneficent measures of Congress.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, I will ask the honorable Senator from Massachusetts if he has any evidence to show whether Governor Perry was or was not opposed to secession before the war began. What was his position on that point?

Mr. SUMNER. I regard that matter of supreme indifference.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Well, Mr. President, I think it a very different thing whether he was originally one who hurried the State into secession or one who may have yielded after the military power of the secessionists was established, as both moral law and the civil law make a very great difference on the ground of a man's treason, whether he acted himself originally in bringing about the treason or when a military force was once organized that compelled him upon pain of suffering death to engage in rebellion, he acquiesced.

Mr. President, I have not since the discussion of yesterday looked into this question, but I state to the honorable Senator that I will do so. It may be that he is correct in his view in relation to the course pursued by Governor Perry after the war commenced.

Mr. SUMNER. Here is the document.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. But I am quite sure, from the information I have received, that Governor Perry was one of those who before secession was opposed to the doctrine of secession, and resisted it.

Mr. SUMNER. So was Stephens.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. So was Alexander H. Stephens, certainly.

Mr. SUMNER. None the less a traitor.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, there is another thing to be said also, I will say to the honorable Senator from Massachusetts. It does not follow because Alexander H. Stephens and others in the southern States after this rebellion was commenced and military power was so organized that they were compelled to acquiesce submitted to it, that they or even that other gentlemen in the South who believed in the doctrine of secession, and who, believing that they had the right to secede, entered upon this rebellion against the Government of the United States, are therefore lost to all sense of truth, so that if called as witnesses to the stand or called upon to make a statement of facts transpiring within their knowledge no credit is to be given to their statements. I ask the honorable Senator from Massachusetts if he would distrust the statement made by Alexander H. Stephens of what occurs within his own observation? And, notwithstanding these gentlemen engaged in the rebellion, many of them believing they had a right, others believing that, after their States had gone into rebellion, they were compelled to acquiesce, does he believe from what he knows of them that they would voluntarily come forward and state falsehoods as to matters within their own observation? The bare fact that a man engaged in the rebellion by no means so demoralizes him that he may not be regarded as a competent witness to testify to facts within his own observation.

I think it is true—and that, indeed, accounts for the tremendous struggle which the people of the South made against us—that three fourths at least of the people of the South who engaged in the rebellion believed in the right of the States to secede, and were sincere in the belief which they entertained, that they had a right to withdraw themselves from the jurisdiction of this Government and set up a jurisdiction of their own. Why, sir, that doctrine was advocated by men who are now leaders of the Republican party. I may refer, for instance, to Mr. Greeley, the editor of the New York Tribune. Did he not for weeks and weeks during the last session of Mr. Buchanan's administration in 1860, in that great newspaper which leads the public opinion of the North, defend the right of these States to withdraw from the Union if a majority of their people believed that they had a right to withdraw? Indeed he did. I suppose that he was sincere in the professions that he made, just as there were hundreds of thousands in the South perfectly sincere. In the convention of Georgia which passed the ordinance of secession Robert Toombs carried the convention for secession against the appeals of Alexander H. Stephens against secession, reading to the convention the language of the New York Tribune and flourishing it in his hands.

Sir, the fact that men have entertained certain opinions upon this great question as to the right of a State to withdraw from the Union, and have fought for those opinions because they believed in those opinions, (for it was on account of their belief in them that they fought so long and so fiercely in the struggle to maintain themselves against the Government of the United States,) does not prove that they cannot tell the truth. There is no other way in which to account for the tremendous struggle they made but that the mass of that people were taught to believe and did believe that they were right in the struggle. But for that they never could have held out as they did hold out against the Government of the United States. I know they were wrong in the assertion they made; but a man may be as sincere sometimes in believing an error as he is in believing a truth, and from his sincerity he makes the struggle. If a man sincerely believed that his State had a right to secede, by acting upon that belief he did not become so demoralized that you could not call upon him as a witness to state any facts that transpired within his own knowledge. Therefore, sir, I protest, even if it be true that Governor Perry after this rebellion began took part with the confederates, that fact, if it be a fact, does not discredit him so that his statement of facts within his own knowledge is not to be relied upon.

Now, Mr. President, a single word more and I have done. I did not intend to go into this discussion this morning. My honorable friend from Nevada, [Mr. STEWART,] with a good deal of earnestness, condemned the doctrine for which I contended yesterday. Perhaps I may be pardoned, Mr. President, if I do not as readily advance in my opinions as my honorable friend from Nevada. He in 1866 certainly held to the same doctrine which I am contending for here now. My honorable friend shakes his head; therefore, Mr. President, it may be necessary for me to appeal to the record. Let us see. It is well enough to remember a little what we say on these questions as they come along in the progress of events. In reply to the honorable Senator who now occupies the chair, [Mr. WADE,] the honorable Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] said in January, 1866:

"The Senator from Ohio assumes that it is necessary for the security of the country that the right of suffrage should be granted to the negro; that the Government cannot be carried on without it. That is an assumption that is hardly warranted." * * * "I contend that it is not necessary to call in the aid of the black man to the government of this country. I do not pretend to say that he shall not at some future time have the right of suffrage under restrictions. But when he shall receive it, it will be for his benefit, not ours. I believe the Anglo-Saxon race can govern this country. I believe it because it has governed it. I believe it because it is the only race that has ever founded such institutions as ours. I believe it because we have a peculiar situation, peculiar education, peculiar qualifications which are not common to other sections of other races of the world. I believe the white man can govern it without the aid of the negro; and I do not believe that it is necessary for the white man that the negro should vote."

And again:

"I believe that if we were to reduce the southern States to a territorial condition, and hold them in that condition for the space of five years, it would not only destroy our form of government, but deprive us of our own liberties. I believe we can have the Union. I believe we can have it soon. We have got to trust somebody. I say we have got to trust the white people of the South. We cannot organize a government solely upon the negro population. There are seven million white people in the South. The time for exterminating them has passed. They are in the country. We did not exterminate them during the war. They are there, and are to remain there. If they are to be our enemies, and we attempt to hold them as vassals, it will necessitate the maintaining of a large military force that will endanger our own liberties. Not only that, but it will place in the hands of the Executive powers that will crush Congress and the liberties of the people; and not only that, but it will continue to engender among the people of the South additional hatred, and they will only wait the time when a foreign Power shall help them to rebel again."

These were very sound views expressed by my honorable friend from Nevada but a very short time ago, and he must pardon me if I have not advanced quite as rapidly as he. I believe what he then said was true; and my honorable friend from Massachusetts also stood on the same platform. He was then arguing the question of suffrage at the South, that it should be a voluntary thing and be left to the white people themselves to extend it to the negroes when they should be ready for it, with proper qualifications. He was utterly opposed to pushing it upon them by legislation of Congress—

Mr. SUMNER. I never took any such ground.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I am talking about the other Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON.] I will concede to the honorable Senator who sits nearest me, [Mr. SUMNER,] that he always has been in favor of pushing negro suffrage; he was the originator of that notion. He is the master in that new school of reconstruction. I have given him honor on that subject on another occasion. He has endeavored to force it in season and out of season, and my only regret is that he has succeeded in pushing so many more of my friends around me, that stood with me a short time ago, to follow his lead. I see them all around me. My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] said about the same time, indeed a little later than the declaration of my friend from Nevada:

"Force suffrage by positive law upon Virginia or the Carolinas, or any of these States to-day, and the negro would go to the ballot-box almost at the peril of his life; but let there be four or five years of discussion by liberal and just men in any of these States, and let them triumph and give the suffrage themselves, and they will make it as easy for the black men to vote without molestation as they vote to-day in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts."

My honorable friend from Massachusetts then stood very much on the same ground where I stand and for which I contend now, that this question of suffrage is a question which under the Constitution belongs to the States, and when Congress attempts to change their constitutions Congress violates the Constitution of the United States and tramples down the most important right of the State itself.

Mr. SHERMAN. Do you stand on the Chicago platform?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. One end of it, the north end, admits that it belongs to the States themselves to regulate the question of suffrage; but on the south end the Chicago platform maintains just what the honorable Senator from Nevada now maintains, that it is for Congress to force negro suffrage upon the States against their will. It would disfranchise a large number of the whites, put universal, unqualified suffrage into the hands of most of the negroes, hundreds and thousands of whom do not know the names by which they are registered, do not know the men for whom they have voted, vote blindly under the control of loyal leagues and secret societies that bring them up to the polls like cattle driven to the market. I say that the Chicago platform seems to recognize that as the true constitutional doctrine to apply to the States of the South. It is possible that my honorable friend from Nevada has made such great advances in his opinions over a year or two ago that he now believes in that; but certainly not long ago, as I have shown by the record, he no more believed in the right of Congress to force negro suffrage on the States of the South than I believe in it, and that is just the point, as it seems to me.

Mr. President, I had not intended to enter upon this debate this morning, and I shall not continue to occupy the time of the Senate.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Wisconsin for reading my record. I congratulate myself that I have advanced, that I am not one of the Bourbons, that I do not retain the same respect for slavery that I did before the war, that I have learned something by the war, that I have advanced with the age, and that I appreciate what has been gained by the war. The remarks of mine which he has read were made on the 18th day of January, 1866. I admit that I understand the situation better now than I did in January, 1866. I had not then before me the doings of these Johnson governments. I had not examined their black codes. I had not then been brought to realize the fact that we must either have in the South slavery or freedom. I had not learned that there was no half way post. But their conduct during the year 1866, and the conduct of the President in placing himself above the Constitution and the laws, their denial of the rights of the black man and of the white Union man of the South, their refusal to execute the civil rights bill, their refusal to allow their former slaves to have their civil rights, forced me to the conclusion in March following that we had no power of reconstruction, the Administration against us, except by universal manhood suffrage; that we had to place the ballot in the hands of our friends, for the ballot had been placed in the hands of our enemies. I found that loyalty was being made odious by the organizations held up by President Johnson. I found that he had left the Union party, and had commenced the work of trampling down loyalty, which the Senator from Wisconsin says is to be consummated this year. He tells us our party is to be trampled in the dust, and he calls up Governor Perry and the secessionists of the South as witnesses, and says they are the victorious, Constitution-loving people; they are to trample down Grant, Sherman, Sheridan, and the hosts of loyal men in their march to anarchy.

Sir, I think the conduct of the rebels and of Johnson for the last two years has been enough to educate any honest man, has been enough to make any honest man use all the powers which God has given him to secure to every man in this Government his rights, and to secure the fruits of this bloody war. I am astonished that the Senator from Wisconsin should stand where he stood before the war, should not have improved any, should not have advanced any. It is strange to me that he to-day joins those who have tried to destroy this Government in an effort to trample down those who saved it. Let me tell him now, if he has learned nothing in the past, he will be a dull student if he does not learn something in the future when this trampling-down process is carried a little further.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire, obtained the floor.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. With the permission of the Senator from New Hampshire I desire simply to say one word in reply to my honorable friend from Nevada. I do not object to learning by passing events. I do not object to my friend from Nevada learning all he can in the history of the country as it passes on. I have learned many things within the past two years which I shall not now take the time to state; but one thing I have not learned, that the Constitution of the United States has any power by which it can change itself in 1866 and 1868 until an amendment to the Constitution shall have been adopted and ratified. What I believed about the Constitution before the war I believe now. What I believed about the Constitution during the war I believe now. What I believed about the Constitution in 1866 I believe now. It was the Constitution of which I was speaking, which gives to the States the right to fix for themselves the qualification of voting; and when Congress assumes to override the Constitution in 1866 or in 1868 I feel constrained to oppose it now as well as then; and it is because of this demand—

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire, rose.

Mr. STEWART. I wish to reply to that.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Allow me to finish the sentence—it is because of this demand of yours to override the Constitution that I said your party would be trampled in pieces, as it will be.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. Mr. President—

Mr. STEWART. Allow me just one word.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. There does not seem to be any limit to this crimination and recrimination between the gentlemen, and I suppose I might give up the floor the whole day, if I were to leave it to them.

Mr. STEWART. I only ask two minutes. I wish to say to the Senator from Wisconsin that what may be done constitutionally one day may not be constitutionally done another; that is to say, if the rebels make war upon this Government you may resist it constitutionally; if they do not make war, you shall not cut their throats constitutionally. Their resistance to the Government gives us the right to suppress them. That is the Constitution yesterday, to-day, and to-morrow. It depends upon the state of fact, and on the fuller development of the facts I ascertained that they were still resisting and determined to destroy the Government and dictate terms to loyalty, and the Constitution therefore made it my duty—

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I believe the two minutes are up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. Mr. President, the discussion this morning seems to have passed into an explanation of the record of different Senators. So far as my friend from Wisconsin and my friend from Nevada are concerned, it seems that they have changed ends of the plank upon which they were tilting some six or seven years ago. I wish to quote a passage from a speech of my friend from Wisconsin to show that he has slightly changed his record within the past two or three years. I read from a speech of his upon the deportation and planting of the blacks in Hayti and Liberia:

"I believe that in so doing we may be instrumental, under the providence of Almighty God, in laying the foundation of an empire there, a great republic to be composed of these people and their descendants, and of the people already there, who stand ready and willing and anxious to receive them as a part of themselves, which, after a few generations will contain one hundred million human beings—a republic which shall be in the tropics what this republic is in the temperate zone of the North American continent."

Yesterday the Senator told us that the African on this continent was very much superior to the African in his native country; that he had advanced intellectually; and yet he told us that the African was utterly disqualified on account of his ignorance and besotted character to participate with us in self-government. Perhaps other Senators can see the logic of the position which the Senator from Wisconsin occupied when he made this speech and the logic of his speech yesterday; but for my life I cannot bring the two things together. The Senator, it seems, some three years since saw in the African qualities which would bring him in two or three generations up to a position in which he would establish and maintain a republic in Liberia or Hayti which should rival the great Republic of North America. There was a light on his vision then that has never dawned upon mine, I must confess; for, however much I may sympathize with the African, I am hardly prepared to say to-day that I think in two or three generations he will establish either in Hayti or Liberia a republic which shall rival this. But because I take that position, I am not prepared to say that he should not participate with us to-day in this matter of suffrage.

I sympathize fully with the Senator in his view upon the subject of suffrage, as an abstract question. I believe that intelligence should be made the groundwork and must be made the groundwork of self-government in any republic; and you have the same right to make reading and writing a condition of suffrage that you have to make age, for age itself is nothing but a condition of intelligence to suffrage. There are Africans and there are white men at eighteen years of age as well qualified to vote as other men at forty; and this question of age determines less certainly the intelligence of a man than reading and writing; so that, so far as the question abstractly is concerned, I agree with the Senator fully. Now, sir, take it in California; they have got ninety thousand, or nearly ninety thousand Chinese.

Mr. CONNESS. Oh, no.

Mr. PATTERSON of New Hampshire. They have got eighty-seven thousand.

Mr. CONNESS. No, sir.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. Then, sir, the record is false.

Mr. CONNESS. It is.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. At any rate whether they have got eighty-seven thousand or ninety thousand, they have enough to turn any election one way or the other, if you give them universal manhood suffrage. What I say is, that there is no constitutional and no natural right anywhere that should make it the duty or confer the right upon the General Government to force upon California or any other State universal manhood suffrage in respect to questions that pertain simply and solely to the State government. But, sir, that is speaking of the normal condition of things. Matters at the South are not in a normal condition, and there are reasons for giving the ballot to the black man of the South which do not exist for giving the ballot to the Chinaman in California, or the black man in Ohio or anywhere else. My position, aside from the state of things which exists at the South, is simply this: that men should vote when they are qualified to vote and not before. There is no injustice in this, because voting is simply exercising the functions of an office conferred for the purpose of administering and maintaining our form of Government, and it is just as reasonable that you should require some intelligence in the man who administers that function as that you should require intelligence in the judge who ascends his seat in order to administer justice between man and man.

You may say that this is anti-republican and if carried out would lead to the government of the minority. Mr. President, if the intellectual and moral qualifications of this country should slide back to primitive ignorance, then you must have one of two conditions; you must either have anarchy under the government of the majority or you must have order under some form of the government of a minority; and the only way to maintain universal suffrage, or anything approaching to it, is to maintain universal intelligence. That is my position as a rule.

But, sir, the condition of the South at the close of the war was and is very different from the condition of Ohio. Nine tenths of the white population there had been in rebellion; they were enemies of the Government; and we had been at war spending our resources and pouring out the blood of the nation like water in order to save those States, not to save simply the territory, but to save the governments of those States within the Union, to keep them loyal and true in the great sisterhood of States. The Senator from Wisconsin advocates the doctrine that we shall give the reorganization of the State governments into the hands of the very men who sought to destroy this Government, who sought to take the State governments out of the Union, and withhold any part in the reorganization of those States from the colored men who helped to maintain them in the Union. He complains because, as he says, we have deprived of suffrage fifty thousand white men of the South. I think he makes a grand mistake in that. We have not deprived them of suffrage. We simply failed to confer suffrage upon fifty thousand white men who have taken it from themselves by their treason, and those fifty thousand were not men simply guilty of treason, but men who had violated an oath which they had registered in heaven to maintain the Constitution and the Government of the Union. He says that we ought not to admit these governments because we allow negro voting and because we disallow voting to these rebels; and yet he maintains that the Johnson governments, which deprived two hundred and fifty thousand white men of the privilege of voting, are legitimate governments, while the governments instituted under the congressional policy deprive only fifty thousand of the privilege of voting.

More than that, sir: if a constitutional convention were to meet in Wisconsin to frame or to amend the constitution there it would not become the fundamental law of that State until the people had acted upon it, and thus it had become the legislation of the people of the State. Then it would be fundamental law, and not till then. How was it in the South in respect to those Johnson governments? Only one out of the whole number was ever submitted to the people for adoption, and the people of that State rejected it when it was submitted to them; so that the constitutions of those Johnson governments were never adopted by the people, and therefore are not legitimate; and yet the Senator maintains them as the legitimate governments against the governments organized under the congressional plan.

He tells us that these colored men are not fit to vote. Perhaps they are not fit to vote; but what was our condition? There were white men who had been in rebellion against the Government. They hated the Government. They did not desire to come back under the rule of the Constitution. We desired to organize civil government there and to relieve the people from military government. How could it be done? It could only be done by creating in those States a loyal voting population who would organize and maintain civil government. There were no white people who were loyal who would thus organize and maintain loyal governments, and therefore we were necessitated to put the ballot into the hands of the black men in order to find somebody who would organize and maintain civil governments. There were two alternatives: you must either give them indefinite military rule, which might lead to military despotism, or you must create a black voting population; and that was what we did at the South.

The Senator tells us that they will very soon become the instruments of ambitious men at the South; that they will become the mere minions and tools of southern rebels. Sir, he knows as well as I that during four years of struggle for the life of the nation these colored men, when northern influence could not reach them, were true to the Government against all the machinations and all the force that could be brought to bear upon them. He tells us that they will not vote correctly and properly. Does not he know that they were true when others were not true; that they were loyal amid the disloyal? Does not he know that the ashes of thirty thousand of them are sleeping to-day with the ashes of your children on every field that has been hallowed by the blood of our heroic dead? Does not he remember that down at Fort Wagner, when the brave Colonel Shaw had fallen dead within that intrenchment of treason, twenty of these swarthy Ethiopian warriors piled themselves as a monument above the corpse of their dead commander, to teach the world how well they knew and how deeply they loved liberty? Sir, I think men who would thus struggle can be trusted to vote and to organize governments against rebels who have been their masters and their persecutors.

Now, sir, one word in relation to the position of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON.] He has objected to that provision of the law by which we made it necessary to have a majority of the registered voters vote on the question of the ratification of the constitution in order to secure the adoption of that instrument. I voted for that provision. I thought I did it intelligently, and if we were to be placed in the same circumstances I should vote for it again. I voted for it for this reason: I assumed that all governments should originate in the consent of the majority of the governed, in a normal condition of society, and you cannot establish a government unless you have got the majority of the loyal voting people of a State in favor of that government. If you establish a government republican in form you have got to do it by force under any other circumstances, and doing it by force it is no longer a republican form of government, but it is in the nature of things a despotism. It seemed to me that it was both our privilege and our duty to say that the majority of the registered voters should vote either for or against the adoption of the constitution. But, sir, it is equally true that the disloyal should not be registered, so that the majority of the voters registered should be loyal men. That was our position.

Let me make another remark on this subject of voting. I voted for the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. FERRY,] and, further, I voted for the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS,] with whom I should certainly oftener vote if I had as great respect for his politics as I have for his intellect. I did it for a reason. The second section of the first article of the Constitution says:

"The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature."

That very section in the Constitution recognizes two things. It recognizes, first, that the States have a right to determine the qualifications of suffrage in the case of the election of officers who are to administer the powers which are reserved to the States. It recognizes also that the General Government has the right to determine the qualifications of voters who are to elect Representatives to Congress; and this very section proves it; because if the people of the Union have not the right to determine that question, why is it in the Constitution? It is simply stated here in the Constitution that the qualification of electors for members of Congress shall be precisely the same as the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature, so that there may not be a conflict in the qualifications of voters for the two classes of officers. It was so important that there should be no conflict in this respect that the framers of the Constitution put it into this instrument, so that we now have no right to determine that question by an act of the national Legislature, and we cannot determine it by any compact between Congress and a State Legislature. If it is to be done at all it must be done by an amendment of this instrument; and any clause in the nature of a fundamental condition in one of these bills, in my judgment, is utterly void and powerless. It seems to me it would be far better when one of these States comes to us with a constitution all right in this respect, a constitution that satisfies and gratifies us, that we should accept it generously, and not say to them, virtually, "We distrust you; we do not believe that you are honest in this constitution." It has been adopted by a majority of the registered voting population of the State; and why shall we not have faith to believe that it will be maintained by them? I think we had better not have any such provisions in these bills; but still it is so important that these States should come in that I am willing to vote for the bill even with that provision in it.

One word more, sir, and I am done. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] has moved an amendment by which he adds the fortunes of Alabama to the fortunes of the other States mentioned in the bill. I think that is a mistake. I am desirous that Alabama should come in; but my objections to this amendment are, first, that it will have a tendency to prevent the speedy admission of Alabama into the Union; and, secondly, it is likely to hazard this bill itself, and so keep out all the States mentioned in the bill. We all understand that the President will veto this bill. Suppose he does; it can only pass by a two-thirds vote; and, if I am not misinformed in respect to the opinions of certain Senators upon the Alabama question, we hazard something in putting such a veto before this Senate, for it is not absolutely certain with Alabama in that we could secure a two-thirds vote for the bill; but, having passed this bill by a two-thirds vote, such a momentum, such an impetus would be given to the work of reconstruction that Alabama could not be kept out for any length of time.

Mr. BUCKALEW obtained the floor.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Will the honorable Senator allow me to say a single word in correction of a statement?

Mr. BUCKALEW. I rose for the same purpose, and I must decline to yield. I tried to get the floor yesterday for the purpose of making an explanation. I shall only occupy the floor for a few moments.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] alleged that there was but a single voting poll open in each county in Alabama when the election was held, and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] was resting under a similar misapprehension. Now, sir, the fact was that a number of voting places were opened in each county, and different polls were held. In the pamphlet of evidence which was printed by the House of Representatives on this Alabama case appeared a great many items of evidence conclusively establishing this fact. At page 32, in the statement from the judge of probate and others from the third district, I find these words:

"There were four voting places in the county appointed, but one of them was withdrawn, and the voting was done at three places, to wit, Jacksonville, Davisville, and Maddox's court-ground. We were at Jacksonville."

Another gentleman who makes a statement speaks of having voted at Huntsville, "one of the voting precincts" in a particular county; and so throughout the pamphlet appears conclusive evidence that there were a number of voting places in each county.

While I am up, I will suggest one point to the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON,] which I suppose he has not reflected upon sufficiently, and, I think, if he will consider it, he will see the propriety of not pressing his amendment if there were nothing else involved. Under the act of Congress those in the State of Alabama who were in favor of the constitution went to the election and voted; those who were opposed to it stayed at home and induced others to stay at home also. The result was that but one side voted in that State at that election; and they did this under the invitation of the act of Congress; they did it in pursuance of our law. Now, what is the result? That the State organization set up was the act of a part only of the people of that State; and yet the Senator, by his amendment, would recognize that State organization thus set up, to recognize the State officers so elected, and the members of the Legislature, and he would have representatives introduced into Congress chosen at an election in which only a part of the population voted; at an election where those who did not vote were invited to stay away from the election by the very act of Congress under which the proceeding took place. Would it not be the greatest bad faith for us to recognize that State organization and State government under those circumstances?

If the men who did not vote in that State had stayed away willfully; had stayed away when the law invited them to come forward and vote at the election; when, according to their views and their position, it was to their interest to accept the invitation of the law and go forward to the election, it would be quite a different case. But here you had a law which permitted them to stay away from the polls, and invited them to stay away from the polls, and thus exhibit their hostility to the constitution when it should be submitted. That constitution was defeated under the law. The opponents of the constitution under the law secured its defeat by withholding their votes. Consequently all the votes taken at that election for State officers, for members of the Legislature, and for other officers that were then voted for, fell under the law. They were all illegal. There never was any express authority to hold a State election at the same time that the constitution was voted upon under any act of Congress. It was the act of the convention itself. They were not executing any act of Congress in holding their State election at the same time. They held that State election of their own motion, by the decision of their own convention; and when the constitution failed that State election failed under the law.

Now, sir, cannot the Senator from Massachusetts see that it would be grossly unfair, that it would be the sublimation of injustice, to hold that State election valid, and to install into office all those persons who were chosen at that election, when under our own law it was not a valid election? Then, even if the State is to be recognized by Congress as entitled to representation, good faith, the plainest principle of justice, requires that there should be another election held in the State for the choice of State officers and for organizing a State government.

Mr. POMEROY. Mr. President, I understand it is the purpose to take the vote on this question at an early hour to-day, and I do not care to occupy much time in saying what I had designed under other circumstances to say on the admission of these States, and especially in reference to Alabama. My own opinion is that we shall do a very injudicious thing, and perhaps I may add a cruel thing, to admit the States contained in this bill and leave out Alabama, the best, the first, and the most loyal of all the States included within the bill. I do not know anything about the question of expediency of which the Senator from New Hampshire has been speaking. I do not know what force there may be in the suggestion that the inclusion of Alabama in this bill will jeopardize and prejudice the bill in the Senate. I cannot think that it will have that effect. It appears to me that Senators who are willing to vote for the admission of any of these States, and who have it in their hearts to vote for the admission of any of them, will vote for the admission of Alabama.

Senators have been somewhat anxious to know what their record was in reference to the provision of law under which Alabama is claimed not to have voted a majority of all the registered voters for the constitution. For my own part I do not know precisely how I voted on that question; and what is more than that, I do not care. I have no doubt that Senators voted honestly under the lights they then had, and I do not think it is any object for a man to claim that he is always right. I have tried for many years to vote as I thought was right at the time in reference to any act of Congress or any vote I was called upon to give; and if I knew more the next day and had better light, I should be very likely to change. I hope always that I am not chained to any dead carcass of principles or measures so that I am obliged always, Congress after Congress, to vote for one bill and never amend it and never change it. I voted for the change of the law referred to as applicable to other States. Whether I voted for this provision in the original law I do not know. But, sir, I know that the State which responded the first, the most earnest, the most loyal, was the State of Alabama. Her election was held, to be sure, in an unpropitious season of the year; she had not the experience that other States which came after had; but I think the loyal and true men of Alabama did the best they could, and "angels can do no more." Nothing more should be required. When our friends who are loyal and earnest to this Government do the best they can under the circumstances, and under the lights and facilities they enjoyed, why should we not reach out the most cordial hand? Why should we not be anxious, instead of tardy, to welcome their return? Why should we not exert ourselves to let these men in the South feel that they are coming into the old family with friends, not enemies?

I have thought that the best and surest method of reconstruction would be to convince the South that on their return they are to be dealt with in the most liberal and cordial manner, not only in being welcomed back, but in our subsequent treatment of and legislation in regard to those States. When we completed the legislation called the reconstruction acts that was a covenant between me and them, and I think it was a covenant between Congress and those States; but for my action it certainly was a covenant that if they complied substantially, in good faith and earnestly, with the conditions of reconstruction as placed in the law they should be received back into the Union. I never thought we were to stand upon any technicality, that we were to resort to special pleading upon some small point to be ruled against a State. My covenant was that on a substantial compliance with the terms prescribed they would be welcomed back; and I am not going now to plead any technicality of the law; I am not going to say that these States have not done what they could under our legislation and the best they could.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Will the Senator from Kansas allow me to ask him one question? He speaks about a matter of technicality. I wish to ask him whether he thinks that provision of the statute which required that there should be a majority of the registered voters voting to ratify the constitution was a part of the law; whether he thinks that had the force and effect of law?

Mr. POMEROY. When Alabama voted I think it was the law; I think it did have the force and effect of law; and yet I think Congress is entirely capable of waiving that point now. That law, by the way, did not say that Alabama should not come in if a majority of her registered voters did not vote; it only said that she should come in if they did; and Congress has the right at any time to waive any one of these provisions, especially accompanied as it was by the grossest fraud and the greatest terror that pervaded Alabama during that election. If it would not be wasting the time of the Senate, I should like to read testimony which I have on that subject, which is conclusive to my mind. As it is, I will only read a single extract from a very long communication that I have received from a gentleman in Mobile, who has lived there for more than twenty years and who was loyal through the war, not nominally so, but actively, earnestly so. This gentleman says, in closing a long communication: "Depend upon what I say—our political and physical life depends upon prompt and fearless action on the part of Congress, looking to a speedy restoration of this State;" and so on in that strain. I should feel myself false to my convictions, to the pleadings of my friends, to the earnest, anxious longings of the loyal men in the South, if I hesitated, doubted, threw cold water, to use a familiar phrase, upon them when they come and present their application here for admission. We repealed this provision of law as applicable to all the other States, and I undertake to say that we can waive it as applicable to Alabama; and I shall vote, must vote, cannot do otherwise than vote for the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts; and in doing so I certainly hope that no Senator will feel that he cannot stand by this bill in all the trials to which it may be subjected in the future. The Senator from New Hampshire has given us the shadowings of a veto. I do not know anything about that; but if it come, I apprehend that Senators who propose to admit these States will vote for their admission.

I cannot believe that on any technicality of this kind any Senator can doubt the right of these States to admission. So I say, without doing any more than merely express my own opinion, that we ought to make haste in admitting these States, and in welcoming them, and making them feel that they are returning to their friends and not to their enemies, making them feel that the old family rejoice in their return, and not delay them from day to day by pleading against them.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I wish to ask of the Senate to make a report from a committee of conference on the same general subject which is pending and which, perhaps, may facilitate our action upon the bill now under consideration. If there is no objection I should like to make the report at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be received if there be no objection.

REPRESENTATION OF ARKANSAS.

Mr. TRUMBULL submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House No. 1039, to admit the State of Arkansas to representation in Congress, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend, and do recommend to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment to the House bill and agree to said bill with the following amendment added thereto: "Under laws equally applicable to the inhabitants of said State: Provided, That any alteration of said constitution prospective in its effect may be made in regard to the time and place of residence of voters;" and that the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment to the preamble of the bill and agree to the same.

LYMAN TRUMBULL,

C. D. DRAKE,

HENRY WILSON,

THADDEUS STEVENS,

F. C. BEAMAN,

Managers on part of the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to hear the bill read with that provision attached to it, so that we may know how it stands.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will state before the Clerk reads it, so that the Senate will understand it better, that the committee of conference have recommended that we agree to the House bill precisely as it passed the House of Representatives in regard to Arkansas excepting a slight verbal amendment in the preamble, which is not important, with the addition of the words incorporated in the report. The bill as it passed the other House provided as a fundamental condition to the admission of Arkansas to representation that no change of its constitution should be made so as to deprive any citizen or class of citizens of the right of suffrage who has it by the constitution that is herein recognized. Then we have added to that a proviso that the constitution may be changed as to the time and place of residence, leaving the people of Arkansas to make such change in that respect as they shall think proper, to require more than six months' residence in the State, or to require some definite residence in the county as necessary to the right to vote. They will also have the right to change their constitution in regard to foreigners, as this condition only applies to citizens.

Mr. POMEROY. Foreigners having declared their intention to become citizens can vote.

Mr. TRUMBULL. They can by this constitution as it stands, but this fundamental condition will not prevent the people of Arkansas from changing their constitution in that respect, if they should think proper, so as to require citizenship hereafter. Now, if the Clerk will read the words proposed to be added by the report to the House bill, I think the whole matter will be understood.

The CHIEF CLERK. The bill, as passed by the House of Representatives, reads:

That the State of Arkansas is entitled and admitted to representation in Congress as one of the States of the Union upon the following fundamental condition: that the constitution of Arkansas shall never be so amended or changed as to deprive any citizen or class of citizens of the United States of the right to vote who are entitled to vote by the constitution herein recognized, except as a punishment for such crimes as are now felonies at common law, whereof they shall have been duly convicted.

To which it is proposed to add the words:

Under laws equally applicable to the inhabitants of said State: Provided, That any alteration of said constitution, prospective in its effect, may be made in regard to the time and place of residence of voters.

Mr. DRAKE. I would inquire whether the Clerk has read that correctly. The report the committee agreed upon was that the word "all" should be before the words "the inhabitants;" so as to read, "all the inhabitants of said State."

The CHIEF CLERK. "Under laws equally applicable to the inhabitants of said State" is the language.

Mr. DRAKE. Then, sir, there is a mistake in the report of the committee; and I ask that the Chairman recall it so that the mistake may be corrected. The Clerk has made a mistake in transcribing it. The report was, "under laws equally applicable to all the inhabitants of said State." As it reads now it does not amount to anything at all.

Mr. POMEROY. It means that now.

Mr. DRAKE. No, sir; the report of the committee was not in these words. There was a mistake in transcribing it.

Mr. POMEROY. I move that we proceed with the bill regularly under consideration, and the report of the committee of conference can be made at any time.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I ask leave to withdraw the report that the error may be corrected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That may be done, no objection being made.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 1010) relating to pensions, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 188) to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief of the inhabitants of cities and towns upon the public lands," approved March 2, 1867;

A bill (S. No. 190) to further provide for giving effect to the various grants of public lands to the State of Nevada;

A bill (S. No. 320) for the relief of George Lynch, a soldier of the war of 1812;

A bill (H. R. No. 658) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1869, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1117) to partially supply deficiencies in the appropriation for the service of the fiscal year ending on the 30th of June, 1868.

REPRESENTATION OF SOUTHERN STATES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill (H. R. No. 1058) to admit the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, and Alabama to representation in Congress is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, the question being on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Wilson] to the amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, there were some things in connection with the pending amendment which I thought during the discussion yesterday I should like to have said, and, perhaps, would like to say now, though I am so much the more anxious for the passage of the bill proposing to admit those States that I would readily forego at any time anything that I might have to say if we could come to a vote upon it. Yet, if the debate is to go on to the consumption of this day or still further, I will trespass upon the Senate for a few minutes.

I regret, Mr. President, very deeply, to witness the opposition that proceeds particularly from this side of the Chamber to the amendment offered by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, because I cannot see for the life of me a good reason for objecting to the admission of Alabama at this time. Of course we all differ or are apt to differ, indeed too apt to differ, I think, in this Chamber, and particularly on our side of it. I will say, upon propositions of policy and doctrine. I regret that Senators here representing the great national, patriotic party of the Union, which maintained the war and fought it, who stand now before the country and the world under all the responsibility that can attach to a party engaged in conducting a Government, so often differ upon questions of doctrine and policy. The opposition to this amendment in the Chamber comes from two classes. One class is ably, actively, astutely represented by some of the Senators I see sitting before me. I allude particularly to the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCKALEW] and the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS.] Upon all occasions when it becomes the interest of the party they represent to advocate their policy, (which, however, they do not give much of their time to, but attack ours,) they are ever in the foreground; and their associates on the other side of the Chamber permit their leadership, as I think, with great good judgment, for they are cool, cautious, and able. These leaders, with all the other members of their party on the opposite side of the Chamber, are against this amendment.

They are against the bill; they are against it in whole and in every part. They opposed the first reconstruction bill; they opposed the second; they opposed the third; and they will oppose every proposition which proposes to readmit the southern States upon the basis of equal suffrage; and yet honorable Senators on this side of the Chamber allow them often to dictate a policy to divide and distribute our forces, while they never vote apart. It is of no consequence, Mr. President, whether it be a legislative or a judicial question that the honorable Senators vote upon, a trial to determine political policy contained in a bill before this body or a trial of the President of the United States, they vote conscientiously of course certainly, but wonderfully vote together. The solid phalanx is never broken. I like them, sir; I like wisdom, boldness, perceptive sense, and they exhibit all here; but sometimes I have been astonished that some of our friends did not perceive it and did not know that they were the serpent in the garden—they will pardon me for the comparison—who mean to please while they mean to destroy, while we conscientious folks and legal men are able to split a hair without breaking either side; and sometimes I have been tempted to think that the ability to do it, existing heretofore extensively and so certainly, often induces the practice of the attempt just to see how it can be done and who can do it.

So, sir, Alabama cannot be admitted with the other southern States in the same bill, but we are told it must be presented as a separate proposition in a separate bill. Mr. President, I ask you the question, what Senator is there on this side of the Chamber who will refuse to vote for the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts admitting Alabama at the same time with the other States, who will consent to vote for it if it stands alone? Suppose, as we have been told—and this prophecy has been made a great many times—that the President shall veto the bill now before us and send it back here; suppose that the amendment now pending be lost and that a separate bill for the admission of Alabama shall also be passed by a majority or more and sent to him for his signature, will he not return them both with a veto? Will he treat one any better than the other? And when the bill for the admission of Alabama standing alone shall be returned by him to this body, what Senator who would not waive all question and vote for it incorporated with a bill admitting the other States, will then vote for it over his veto?

Mr. President, can it be possible; is it true at this period and time that there is any Senator on what I claim to be the loyal side of the Senate—and loyalty has a meaning though it is so much used—who will refuse to sustain a bill for the admission of Alabama under the constitution made in that State, because it is either in or out of a bill proposing to admit the other States? If it be so, then it only proves that as a party, a majority party charged with conducting this Government at this great crisis, it is a failure; and, sir, that being the case, it deserves to be routed, horse, foot, and dragoons, by that party for which I have no political respect, led by those astute leaders on the other side of the Chamber.

When my friend from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] was on the floor he told us that there were Senators here who would not and could not vote for this bill if it came back with a veto from the President, the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts having been adopted; and my honorable friend from Michigan, [Mr. HOWARD,] who is always brave and true, reiterated the opinion, and although he was ready to vote for it, it was his opinion that that was the real state of the case in the Senate; and many others followed. When the debate had taken this turn my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCKALEW] rose and offered his arguments, and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] joined him as usual. They said that this was in the nature of a contract. Why, said the Senator from Indiana, several times, if not in this debate heretofore, what did you mean by submitting the question to the people of Alabama if you were not prepared to abide by their decision? It was not for the purpose of abiding by their decision that we submitted it; it was for the purpose of developing a constitution; it was for the purpose of organizing government; it was for the purpose of organizing loyalty and allowing that State to be represented in this Chamber and to resume all her practical relations with the Government. Well, sir, in the process of submitting the question, it happened that under our law, unwisely passed, I think—I do not know how I voted upon it, and I do not care; I think, however, I voted against it—the requisite number of votes was not polled for the constitution to result in its adoption. Does that bind this Congress? Did we not make the law? May we not amend it?

Have we not asserted from the beginning our entire and complete power over this subject? Might we not have admitted Alabama without the process that she took at all? Might we not have admitted Alabama, if we chose and deemed it worthy of us, under the so-called Johnson constitution? Certainly. The power was here; it abides here still; and we may either amend or change the law, or act, notwithstanding the law, as we shall see fit. Why? Because we represent the sovereign power of this Government and people that maintained the standard of the nation and the integrity of its Government against rebellion, and because we mean to hold fast to that position until the entire work is done and well done. Sir, among our friends that come to our house to meet us, do we raise the question of who shall first enter? Who that has a heart and a judgment does not welcome all; and why should we not welcome all?

I will give no time to the question of the causes that led to the failure of the vote in Alabama. It is enough that it technically failed; but it is true, as stated by my honorable friend from Indiana near me, [Mr. MORRISON,] that there were eighty odd thousand votes cast for the constitution; it is true that they have made such a constitution as we would choose that they should make; it is true that they ask to be admitted, and that their safety demands that they be admitted. If the Senate will indulge me at this point, I will read some dispatches just received from Alabama. The first one is addressed to the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, who has offered the amendment, and is in these words:

MONTGOMERY, ALABAMA, June 6, 1868.

The loyalists of Alabama, with one voice, beg Senators to support your amendment.

Hon. HENRY WILSON, United States Senate.

This is signed by more than half a dozen of the leading men of that State. I will read another dispatch received to-day:

MONTGOMERY, ALABAMA, June 6, 1868.

Republicans are intensely anxious for the adoption of WILSON'S amendment.

Hon. R. M. REYNOLDS.

The honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, in this discussion, was almost facetious in his attacks upon the reconstruction laws. It is but what he has iterated and reiterated here many times before, though he rarely repeats himself; but the line of discussion has drawn him into it. He said that the better way to have done would have been to send an exact pattern of a constitution down to these States, a kind of a last upon which a political boot should be made; and then we should have the thing according to pattern. I do not know whether his support of the pattern of that kind sent by Andrew Johnson down into these States when he made his celebrated proclamations, put this in his head or not. I do not know but that that pattern, which particularly and prominently allowed every rebel to vote, so pleased him that he got the idea of pattern in his head from that, and then said what he did while up.

The only conditions that we imposed upon the people of the South were conditions which became necessary by their crimes and falsity to good faith and loyalty. Why, sir, it was preposterous that a local government could be organized in any of those States after the war by allowing the men who had laid down their arms to take up the ballot and vote, and they alone, under which this Government could live, and it was as impossible as that devils could reign in Heaven, and as unnatural. Therefore it became necessary to put the ballot in other hands; and the fault, the great and grievous fault of reconstruction, has been that the power of the Government from the time the war ceased was not kept closely applied to the rebels so that they should not be let up until they were taught obedience to law and to order, respect for property and life and the rights of other men. But, sir, unfortunately, in a day of the cruellest misfortune, our President, elected by the party that we represent here, determined to make a wide difference with us. He determined to engage in the business of reconstruction single-handed—no, sir, not single-handed, but without the aid of our hands, without the aid of the men who had given him his power, but with the aid of the rebels of the South, the Democrats of the North who had opposed the war, and the plunder-seeking Republicans, wherever they could be found, to build up a party that should elect him or someone like him for the next four years President of the United States. That was what he undertook to do, and that was why the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DOOLITTLE] deserted his party—I was going to say basely betrayed it—and joined the President to do. Ah, Mr. President, does any one think, can the Senator make the simplest creature in the land believe, that if the President had been true to his faith, true to his trust to the people, true to his obligations to the party that elected him, and gone on with us, the Senator would have left him then? Nay, sir, he would have clutched to his coat-tails, he would have still followed the fleshpots of presidential patronage, and he would have been here the londest of the loud proclaiming for Johnson and reorganized, reconstructed liberty in the South; and we should have had some of that physical eloquence that he so often gives us specimens of here when, with a pile-driving power, he drives down his propositions beneath him, often smashing them into pieces, and when, sir, he almost impiously—he will excuse my language, but the facts justify it—intersperses his appeals to the Senate with appeals to Almighty God.

Mr. President, the honorable Senator professes to be a Christian man, and has often told us how much he reveres the Christian religion; but, sir, he has joined idols; he has abandoned his faith; he has abandoned the principles upon which Christianity is founded and for which it was established in the world. If Christianity, by its great Master and Teacher, was not brought to men of the earth for the purpose of defending the weak and lowly, for the purpose of lifting them up in the scale of being, for the purpose of teaching some of that equality on earth which is certain in Heaven, then, sir, I undertake to say for myself that it is a deception and a snare. The Senator professes the doctrine and violates it shockingly, impiously, wickedly, at every turn. He rises here and gives us dissertations on the inequality of men, the impossibility of the negro being the equal of the Caucasian. Mr. President, the distinction was not made by their Maker. We are not told that there are dividing places in Heaven for classes and castes and colors and shades. There is not a Christian church in the world of all the denominations that does not admit them to be upon the same plane; but the Senator, while he boasts his Christianity, violates its most sacred purposes and principles.

I was reminded yesterday when he had nearly a mule's load of books around him, that there was one which he might have added with advantage to himself. I hold it in my hand. It is a simple and old book. There are supposed to be truths in it, and the honorable Senator professes to believe them. While he was denouncing the inequality of men and boasting it loudly, I opened it at a place where a man who was known in his day and generation, and is not forgotten yet, had spoken. His name was Paul, and on an occasion when he met the Athenians, who thought themselves the greatest of all the earth, who boasted their superiority and eloquence, and who called every outsider a barbarian or an uncivilized semi-barbarian—they were like the honorable Senator in everything but that they were great in art—Paul stood up among the Athenians and spake thus:

"Then Paul stood in the midst of Mars' Hill and said, 'Ye men of Athens, I perceive that in all things ye are too superstitious.'"

"God that made the world, and all things therein, seeing that he is Lord of heaven and earth, dwelleth not in temples made with hands;

"Neither is worshipped with men's hands as though he needed anything, seeing he giveth to all, life, and breath, and all things;

"And hath made of one blood all nations of men or to dwell on all the face of the earth."

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Read the next sentence.

Mr. CONNESS. The next sentence, Mr. President, the honorable Senator can read, and if he will read and study and pay attention to the spirit as well as the letter, he will leave the rotten faction and party that he has joined and come back to the men who have heart and blood and courage in advocacy of human right.

But there is another thing the Senator is in the habit of doing when he speaks here; and I have heard him do it I may say a hundred times. He calls up that great and beloved man now gone, our late President, as a witness, and he makes him responsible again and again for this vilest plan to organize rebellion politically. Sir, the man who left his residence when his health was failing him and went down to the front and witnessed the proceedings during the last ten days of the existence of the armed forces of rebellion, had his heart and his soul in his country's cause too deeply to ever trust one of the men who was on the other side in that conflict. It is true that he was a generous and charitable man, and, like us, would not use unnecessary severity against any person whatever, not even against his active enemies. But think you, sir, that if he had lived he would not have guarded with jealous care and fidelity, and organized the patriotism of the country, and preserved its Government so as to make it impossible to be again attacked so successfully as it had been? No man can doubt that.

The honorable Senator has treated us time and again to what he has called the "Lincoln-Johnson policy." "Lincoln-Johnson!" I have heard that a great many times from him. He used to come up here with a hand-organ and grind out ad libitum "the Lincoln-Johnson policy;" but if Johnson had stayed with us he had never turned musician! I do not know what the honorable Senator's mission is, whether it is music, statesmanship, theology, or what not. I may have something to say about that by and by.

He has a habit here, too, of speaking of the elections whenever through any cause whatever in any part of the country there is a seeming triumph of the party that he has now joined, but he will permit me to say, does not honor, for deserters always have a character, and it abides with them and stays with them like the shirt of Nessus; there is no reorganization or reconstruction for them. The man who fails his comrades, the man through whom a cause is lost, has no friends, and for the best reason in the world, he is not worthy of them; and there is a common instinct that all mankind have, without the trouble of reasoning, which teaches them that very wholesome fact. If an election occurs in California, though the result was brought about by the shameless acts of faction in our own party, by means of which the men whom he has joined have made a temporary success, he heralds it here again and again and claims that those bad principles and those heinous policies that he now stands the advocate of have been indorsed. If the proposition has been submitted in any one or more of the northern States to give the ballot to the colored man, and through the monstrous and wicked prejudice which the existence of that brutal institution of slavery has sown, grown and built up among us, the proposition be rejected, the honorable Senator comes here and speaks loud and claims that it is a victory for him and his party! Well, sir, when a man or a party boasts of a victory like that, won with the seeds of injustice deeply in it, he or it has only to wait a little while to be destroyed. As sure as right is better than wrong as an abstract principle, so sure will any man or party binding up within its policies, error, and wickedness, fall thereby.

But the honorable Senator finds nothing in the Christian religion to engage him as an active missionary on the side of right, but he has gone out and counted his forces, and he calculated with his friend, the President, that the Democrats of the North, the rebels of the South, and the class that I denominated as the plunder-seeking Republicans wherever they are found, would make an overshadowing and overpowering party, and he joined it at once. Of course, he cannot immediately retreat; he has committed himself; but he does not tell us of how unfortunate he has been individually in his advocacy of these monstrosities. His State, not like mine by a local and party feud, but upon a fair election, spewed him out of its mouth. Its people have not said, "Well done, good and faithful servant," but they have said, "Go hence;" and I heard—I suppose it is not true—that the honorable Senator was going to Florida. He ought to remember that that is not the latitude for the Caucasian race. I rather think if he were there, particularly if the ballot should be maintained in the hand of the negro, he would overcome his scruples and go back to his old doctrine read by the honorable Senator from New Hampshire to-day and say, "I was mistaken for a while; the savage of Africa built up and intellectually strengthened and born again in America is capable of establishing here in the tropics a republic that will rival the great Republic of the North;" and I suppose he would add, "and of the temperate zone," for I believe he always puts that in. I like to be accurate.

But not a word falls from his lips of how his partners have gone from him. When, in 1865 he met his party associates in a conference in a room not far from here, I remember well, before a word was spoken about the desertion of Mr. Johnson from his party, that Senator's speeches, and I remember well the speeches made by his associate for awhile who was a Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Cowan,] and I remember well the coöperation of the gentle and amiable Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. Dixon.] There were a few more, but this trio were the leaders. They were evidently the marked and chosen leaders, chosen blindly and foolishly by the President. I remember the speeches they made in that conference, and how certain it was then that they were deserters, that they intended treason to our party and to our cause. What has been the history of every man who went with the honorable Senator on that occasion? He might well put that hand-organ down on some occasion, and go to one of the poets, and read thus:

"When I remember all
The friends, so link'd together,
I've seen around me fall,
Like leaves in wintry weather;
I feel like one,
Who treads alone
Some banquet hall deserted,
Whose lights are fled,
Whose garlands dead,
And all but he departed."

I shall not speak, sir, of the dead; they have passed away; but where is the Senator from Pennsylvania, and where will be the Senator from Connecticut, and where will be the man who made music for them all? And where will he be, sadder yet, in the estimation of his countrymen? Where will he be fifty years hence? Where will he be when a century shall have come which shall render practical on earth some of the teachings of the Christian doctrine and make all forget their individual power, their superiority where they have it, and in place of trying to put their feet upon the neck of their fellows, who are already too low down, they shall be engaged in lifting up—nay, sir, shall have lifted up the lowly—where then will his record be? If he shall make answer to me he will do it with party twaddle, he will do it with that same old instrument, the crank of which he has turned here so often, and which has been made to play a certain number and order of tunes, and which the merest fool in creation can play as well, if he be able to turn the crank, as any of the great artists that have been known in that delightful profession.

The honorable Senator says we violated the pledges of pardon that the President gave. The President gave pardons, it is true, but who pardoned him? Is there any party in this land that are entitled to respect that have pardoned him for the great crime of deserting us, that have pardoned him for the falsehood spoken when he said to those poor, deluded men in Nashville, "I will be your Moses," meaning to be understood that he would be their leader and their light and their strength; and when in detestable contrast with those sentiments only a short time after, with our good President dead and he in power, in one of the rooms of the Treasury building he had the audacity and the shamelessness, addressing a number of colored men who called upon him, to tell them that they should be protected in their right to labor—they should be protected in their right to work. Yes, sir; their former masters were to be allowed to make contracts with them and to refuse to pay them for their labor, and the colored man to whom he gave the former promise was to be protected in his right to labor without the pay! There is such a thing sometimes as justice on earth, and sometimes men escape it. Without wishing to be harsh to the President, to whom I feel no personal ill-will, I think, if he were secured a while in the same right to labor, that it would be according to a high philosophy, the doctrine of compensation, eminently just and deserved. The military governor of Tennessee, at Nashville, holding a temporary place, said, "I will be your leader;" the President of the United States, representing all the power of the Republic, said "You shall be protected in the right to work," and at that time my Christian friend from Wisconsin was engaged in helping the President to maintain the latter promise!

He brings in a petition here, signed by a thousand of the white men of Alabama, representing, as he says, "the intellect and moral power" of that country. I do not know about the intellect; but if they represent the moral power, then there is a certain dignitary, who is said to have his chief abode in the infernal regions, who is the custodian and chief of all that power, and there is no God! Moral power, sir! What a shocking misuse of terms! Men, who, that the right might be secured to buy and sell human flesh, bodies and souls eternally, made war against the only Government that offered security to the liberties of mankind; men who, in making that war, violated all the usages of honorable warfare, butchered those whom they had in their power disarmed and overpowered, and made toys of their bones!

Right here, Mr. President, let me tell very briefly an incident of an excursion party. Long after the battle of Bull Run, and after the bones of our poor fellows had whitened on the surface of the soil, an excursion party on horseback came out from Richmond. Let it be spoken but in shame, that they were composed mainly of what are called ladies; that they wheeled their horses and went back with trophies consisting of bones of human beings, their country people, the children of the same God, who had been slain by their fathers and brothers; and one lady, to be more distinguished than the rest, carried a skull off on her riding-whip as a garland and trophy. The Senator speaks of the moral power such people represent! I will not spend any time in undertaking to show, nor is it necessary to say, that every man of them who signed that petition, in all human probability, has a history either as bad as or worse than this man Perry, from South Carolina; and yet they come here to petition, to misstate facts, to denounce their fellows, to ask us to reinstate them in power that they may proceed to the full completion of the work which they failed to do by other means.

Mr. President, let me say before I go further, lest any man shall say or think that I would do a cruel or ungenerous act toward one of these persons, that there was no man in the nation at the end of the war, and there is no man in it now, who is so ready to receive them back when they are prepared to come back as American citizens, loving the flag, believing in the system of government, ceasing to tyrannize over and destroy the men that they the other day enslaved, when they shall have come to acknowledge that a man from Massachusetts or New York may take his money and his household gods and go into any State of the Union and live in peace and security. But, Mr. President, it is not so now; and this petition that the Senator has presented denounces such of us as say that it is not so.

There was in this gallery awhile ago a brave fellow who left my State and came here to take the fortunes of war for his country just after he had left college, and who undertook to settle in the South. In his character he is as gentle as a woman, in his moral and upright bearing he is a pattern in society. His very lineaments impress you with his nobility. He engaged in business; he has tried to live in the South, but he could not do it. To use his own words, gentle and truthful as he is, "no standard of character, no matter how elevated; no purity of life, no matter how simple and true, is a passport there to any favor. I was warned to leave again and again. I had determined to sell my life dearly if forced to do so, and I prepared means of defense in my household. I escaped a physical conflict, but finally had to leave."

It is not constitutional, says the Senator from Wisconsin; you are trampling the Constitution under foot if you preserve that man in the plainest rights of an American citizen! There was a time, whether the Senator believed in it or not, when he stood forth as the advocate of the opposite doctrine; but the time has come when we have but the abandonment of that by the Senator, and his constant and oft-repeated harangues here.

When he rose yesterday the first utterance he made was that he did not rise to engage in this discussion as a party man. No sir, I suppose not. He did not belong to our party; that is certain; he has not been long enough in the other to have obtained a status, and so he is hanging between earth and heaven politically yet. I do not know where he will fall; but I know that he will fall; I know that he is falling; he is bereft of that element of moral power which he says these petitioners represent in the State of Alabama.

He says the distinguished gentleman who recently did not receive the indorsement of this body for a high office which he had once held, said on a certain occasion, and all their leaders say, that they mean first to get power, and next, if they do get power, they will trample free suffrage under their feet; they will reinstate their style of rule. Mr. President, if there be one of them so vain as to dream earnestly of it, I caution and conjure him to remember that the day has passed for rebel rule in America. The day has passed, as slavery has passed, when its damned instruments can longer control public opinion. Sir, let them undertake to trample under foot, and the next great example will make an epoch in human history never to be forgotten. As Wrong is weaker than Right and has not any of its inherent power; as Right is true and strong and bold, so will the one triumph over the other and trample it under its feet. That, sir, is where the trampling will be done, and the result of the vintage will be the pure wine of liberty, unadulterated, vitalizing, good for body and soul.

I have been at a loss, Mr. President, in thinking of it, to imagine to what caste, class, party, faction, or sect my friend really belongs; I mean in his religion; not while I listened to him yesterday, but while I have listened to him for the three years last past in this Chamber. I have not gone and made the researches that our friend from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] could have done by turning his finger, and brought and spread before me all the systems of religion that mankind have known, so that I might have found the place of my friend from Wisconsin. Having found no place for him in the sect to which he professes to belong, I went to others, and among the rest I found me a book which gave the philosophy of the Hindoo religion. There is a great deal in it, sir; and I will say here in its behalf and for it, that if my friend belonged to it, was in full communion with it, he would sever his present party connections and come and seek forgiveness of the men and cause he has betrayed.

I find that their religion divides their population into four castes or tribes or classes, and they are described according to their inherent faculties and their fitnesses for life on earth, and I suppose for life in heaven. They consist of the Brahmen, which is the highest—my friend from Nevada, [Mr. NYE,] I have no doubt will be deeply interested in this exposition, as he is known to be a searcher after truth. The next tribe or caste is the Kehree; the next is the Visya; and the next and fourth and last is the Soodra. The Brahmen consist of those who have faculties that give this result: "The natural duty of the Brahman is peace, self-restraint"—that is bad for my friend—"zeal"—if that could possibly be meant to be associated with a bad cause, he could come in—"purity"—I will let him judge of that for himself—"patience, rectitude, wisdom, learning, and theology." Do you think he belongs there, sir? I should say not.

The natural duties of the second class are "bravery, glory,"—a brave man never deserts a cause, not even a failing cause; to use a vulgar phrase, he dies in his tracks; and that is glorious; and the very next duty of that caste is "glory;" then "fortitude, rectitude, not to flee from the field"—my friend clearly does not belong there, for he did flee from the field; he left us, and he left us when we had the mightiest of works to do—"generosity and princely conduct." It is not "princely conduct" to flee from the field.

The natural duty of the third class, or Visya, is "to cultivate the land, tend the cattle, buy and sell." I do not know that my friend belongs there. I do not know that he has any talent for these pursuits.

The natural duty of a Soodra is servitude. In one sense, I think, my friend belongs there. He has joined the party devoted to the establishment of servitude. But on the whole, having discussed that with myself, I concluded that my friend could not be put with that tribe or class; and therefore I found no place for him in the Hindoo religion. I found he did not belong to the Christian religion, and there was no place for him among the Hindoos. He had left his party and his country in its greatest need, and not having my friend from Massachusetts at my elbow so that I might carry on my investigations further, it simply became my natural duty to pray for him. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I argued yesterday in favor of the right and propriety of immediately admitting Alabama, but I said that perhaps it would not be safe to put Alabama into this general bill, as there was some special opposition to Alabama, and it might endanger the admission of the other States, and for that reason I would favor putting Alabama into a bill by itself. I learn to-day that I was mistaken in regard to the strength of the opposition to the admission of Alabama. I believe that Alabama can be admitted on the final passage of the bill, and therefore I shall vote for the amendment offered by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, believing that the bill with Alabama in it will pass over the President's veto as well as without it.

REPRESENTATION OF ARKANSAS.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I ask the Senate now to consider the report of the committee of conference on the Arkansas bill. The word "all" was omitted in the copying of the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be received and read, if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read it, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House No. 1039, to admit the State of Arkansas to representation in Congress, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend, and do recommend to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment to the House bill and agree to said bill with the following amendment added thereto: "Under laws equally applicable to all the inhabitants of said State: Provided, That any alteration of said constitution, prospective in its effect, may be made in regard to the time and place of residence of voters;" and that the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment to the preamble of the bill and agree to the same.

LYMAN TRUMBULL,

C. D. DRAKE,

HENRY WILSON,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

THADDEUS STEVENS,

F. C. BEAMAN,

Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 1010) relating to pensions was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 1033) for the relief of Thomas McLean;

A bill (H. R. No. 1051) to grant certain islands to the State of Wisconsin as swamp lands and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1052) amendatory of an act entitled "An act granting public lands to the State of Wisconsin to aid in the construction of railroads in said State," approved June 3, 1856.

These bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1058) to admit the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, and Alabama to representation in Congress.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suppose it cannot be expected to finish this matter this afternoon, and, if it is agreeable to the Senate, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. WILSON. Let us finish this.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We cannot finish it on this Saturday afternoon.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope we shall go into executive session, because we have some business there that ought to be acted upon speedily.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have no particular wish in moving an executive session, but I thought it would be better.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope we shall get a vote on the bill.

Mr. MORTON. I think we can get a vote in a few minutes.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope we may get a vote. I do not know that there is any discussion to be had in the Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I withdraw the motion if gentlemen desire it, unless somebody wishes to discuss the bill at length.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion for an executive session is withdrawn.

Mr. HOWARD. What is the question then?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON.]

Mr. VICKERS. It is now nearly three o'clock, and I suppose that if any time of the Senate is to be given to executive business it would be better to give it now. Possibly I might detain the Senate to a period so late that it would not be practicable to enter on that kind of business. I understand there is some important business to be performed in executive session.

Mr. WILSON. I understand the Senator desires to speak at length on this subject.

Mr. VICKERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOWARD. Then I hope we shall go into executive session.

Mr. WILSON. Will the Senator allow me a single moment? I propose to let this bill lie over, and take up and put on its passage—I hope it will take no time—the bill to continue the Bureau for the relief of Freedmen and Refugees, and for other purposes. It is important to act upon it now.

Several SENATORS. You cannot pass that to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can only be done by unanimous consent at this time.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. WILSON. If objection be made to that motion, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Before that motion is put, I wish the Senate would indulge me simply to say that I hope we may come here on Monday with the understanding that we shall vote on this bill. ["Agreed!"]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, June 6, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOXTON.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the Journal, but, on motion of Mr. MAYNARD, by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

WILLIAM CONNELLY.

On motion of Mr. SCOTFIELD, the petition of William Connelly, for a pension, was withdrawn without leaving copies on file.

REISSUES OF PATENTS.

Mr. RAUM, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1163) in relation to the reissues of patents; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. MAYNARD. I call for the regular order.

THOMAS M'LEAN.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the unfinished business at the adjournment last evening, being the bill (H. R. No. 1033) for the relief of Thomas McLean, reported from the Committee on the Public Lands by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOPKINS.]

Mr. HOPKINS. A word of explanation will satisfy every gentleman here that this bill ought to pass. Congress, on the 3d of March, 1865, passed a law setting apart a tract of land in Calumet county, Wisconsin, as an Indian reservation. That law provided that all the settlers actually residing within the limits of the reservation should have the right to purchase their homesteads, not exceeding eighty acres, at $2 50 per acre. When the lines of the reservation were run it was found that, though the cultivated fields of this petitioner were within the limits of the reservation, his house, where he actually lived, was ten rods over the line. Therefore, by a technical construction of the law, not living actually on the reservation, he was deprived of the privilege which that bill gave to the settlers on the reservation. This bill simply allows him to enter the land that he has cultivated for thirteen years at the price stipulated in the act of Congress, $2 50 per acre.

Mr. BROOKS. I objected to this bill last night, but I think it is all right.

Mr. HOPKINS. There are seventy-five acres of the land, and he has cultivated it for thirteen years.

Mr. MAYNARD. If the gentleman states that that is all there is in the bill, I suppose nobody will object to it.

Mr. HOPKINS. That is all there is in the bill, and the Commissioner of the General Land Office informs me that there are no adverse claims.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman yield to me for one moment?

Mr. HOPKINS. Certainly.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I know the facts with regard to this bill very well. It is one that I introduced myself for a constituent of the gentleman from the district adjoining mine because he was not present at the time. It simply provides that this party, Mr. McLean, may enter this land as though he had built his house upon it. The preemption laws under which the lands are to be entered require, according to the decision of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, actual residence upon the lands. His house happens to be just off the lands, and his improvements are upon them. I understood my colleague to say that Mr. McLean has occupied and cultivated this land for thirteen years. That is the fact, and he has occupied it for five years longer than that, making eighteen years, supposing that he was right and could avail himself of the provisions of the law.

Mr. MAYNARD. Does the gentleman say, as his colleague has said, that this is merely a question as to seventy-five acres of land?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I do not understand that it covers seventy-five acres. I believe there are only forty acres, but whatever the quantity of land may be, it is simply a question of allowing him to enter his land as his neighbors who were successful in getting their houses upon these lands have done.

Mr. MAYNARD. Then I presume there is no objection to the bill.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I think there can be none.

Mr. HOPKINS. I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOPKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOPKINS. I ask unanimous consent to make one or two reports from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which there will be no objection, and which it will take no time to dispose of.

Mr. MAYNARD. "No time" is rather indefinite. I am willing that the morning hour shall be postponed for ten minutes.

Mr. HOPKINS. I ask, then, that the morning hour be postponed for ten minutes to enable me to make some reports.

No objection was made.

WISCONSIN LAND GRANT.

Mr. HOPKINS, from the Committee on the Public Lands, then reported back from the said committee, without amendment, and with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1052) amendatory of an act entitled "An act granting public lands to the State of Wisconsin to aid in the construction of railroads in said State," approved June 3, 1856.

The bill was read. It provides that it shall and may be lawful for the Legislature of Wisconsin to dispose of the lands granted and which may have inured and been certified to the State of Wisconsin under the act of Congress approved June 3, 1856, to aid in the construction of a railroad "from Madison or Columbus, by the way of Portage City, to the St. Croix river or lake, between township twenty-five and thirty-one," and commonly known as the La Crosse and Milwaukee railroad, for the benefit of the Wisconsin Railroad Farm Mortgage Land Company, a company existing under and by virtue of the laws of Wisconsin, provided that the act shall apply only to such lands as may be due the State of Wisconsin for the portion of the road already completed.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I would inquire of the gentleman whether the Committee have considered the question whether there ought not to be annexed to this bill a provision that the State shall be required to sell the lands to actual settlers at a price not exceeding $1 25 an acre? We passed a bill a day or two ago granting some hundreds of thousands of acres of land to the State of Minnesota for the purpose of constructing a dam across the Mississippi river, which had such a provision incorporated in it. I believe I had the honor first to suggest that provision to this House. I shall vote for no bill which grants lands to aid in the construction of railroads, or which carries out existing grants. That does not provide in specific terms that the lands shall be sold to actual settlers at a price not exceeding $1 25 an acre. I submit to the gentleman that this provision should be ingrafted upon this bill.

Mr. HOPKINS. I would say, in reply to my friend from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] that this bill does not grant any land to the State of Wisconsin. It simply permits the State of Wisconsin to dispose of this land in the interests of the people of the State.

This bill, perhaps, proposes a new thing in the legislation of the country. It permits the State of Wisconsin to do justice to the men who furnished the means to build this road. It gives to the poor farmers along the line of the railroad, who mortgaged their farms to build the road, and who, in many cases, lost all their property, the lands which the railroad company are entitled to receive to aid in its construction, and I am happy to say the railroad company are willing to do this small act of justice to the unfortunate men who contributed their means to build the road. In 1856 Congress granted to the State of Wisconsin a quantity of lands to aid in the construction of a railroad from Madison, or Columbus, by way of Portage City, to St. Croix river or lake, and from thence to Superior City and to Bayfield. The State conferred the grant upon the La Crosse and Milwaukee Railroad Company. In order to raise the means to build this road agents were sent among the farmers living along the line, who had no money to subscribe, but they were induced to mortgage their farms to the company as subscriptions to the stock. These mortgages were sold to eastern capitalists. The stock which the farmers received became utterly valueless, as the road was sold out upon the mortgage bonds, wiping the stock and the original stockholders all out, creating much distress among the deluded farm mortgagers. As a consequence there has prevailed all along the road since its completion a feeling of bitter hostility, which at times has threatened to break out in open violence.

The company completed about sixty miles of the road specified in the grant, and demanded a certificate from the Governor so as to obtain title to the land, but were refused, because they had not commenced their road at Madison or Columbus, as provided by law. Subsequently the company did complete their road from Columbus to Portage City. No lands, however, have as yet been certified to the company, although the quantity granted has doubtless inured to the State for the portion of the road actually completed. As I am informed, the railroad company now consent to an arrangement which will authorize the State to convey so much of the land as they have become entitled to, by building a portion of the road, to a company organized under the laws of Wisconsin for the benefit of the farm mortgagers.

I am satisfied that there can be no objection to the passage of this bill, as it simply authorizes the State to carry out the arrangement, thereby doing an act of manifest justice toward a large number of the respectable and industrious farmers of our State, who have ruined themselves by mortgaging their homesteads to aid in building the road.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Upon that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and there were—ayes six, noes not counted.

So (one fifth of those present not voting in the affirmative) the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The bill was then passed.

Mr. HOPKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SWAMP LANDS IN WISCONSIN.

Mr. HOPKINS, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, House bill No. 1051, to grant certain islands to the State of Wisconsin as swamp lands, and for other purposes.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill was read at length. The first section provides that all islands or parts of islands in the Mississippi and Wisconsin rivers lying within the jurisdiction of the State of Wisconsin, and which upon examination and survey may be shown to be swamp or overflowed lands within the meaning of the act of September 28, 1850, to enable the State of Arkansas and other States to reclaim the swamp lands within their limits, and which may have been withheld from selection by reason of the restrictions of the act of March 12, 1860, to extend the provisions of an act to enable the State of Arkansas and other States to reclaim the swamp lands within their limits to Minnesota and Oregon, and for other purposes, shall be confirmed to the State of Wisconsin under the provisions of the act of September 28, 1850; provided the provisions of this act shall not extend to any tract or tracts to which any adverse rights may have vested under any laws of the United States prior to the date of the return of surveys under this act.

The second section provides that it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of the General Land Office to have surveys of the islands made accordingly, and to convey to the State, by approval and patent, all tracts shown thereby to be really swamp or overflowed within the jurisdiction of the State.

The third section provides that as regards all swamp or overflowed lands sold by the United States or located with military bounty-land warrants or scrip since the passage of the swamp act of September 28, 1850, and which may not be designated as swamp or overflowed by the field notes of public surveys, it shall be lawful for the State to present proof to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, to show the character of such lands, and when they shall have been proven to have been really swamp or overflowed lands at the date of the passage of the said act of September 28, 1850, the State shall be entitled to receive as indemnity therefor a like amount of lands, to be located within her limits, on any of the public lands subject to entry at private sale at $1 25 per acre or less.

Mr. MAYNARD. I cannot, by any means, consent to allow a bill of this kind to pass through sub silentio and pro forma. The swamp-land legislation of 1850, referred to here, took from the Government the very best lands in the State of Arkansas, under the pretense of granting the swamp lands to that State. I understand the object of this bill is simply to extend that Arkansas policy up into Wisconsin. If we are to have a general policy, that when a State is organized all the public lands in the State shall be granted to that State, I am not prepared to say that I will not go for it. But so long as we have an established policy in regard to our public lands of a different character I cannot consent to this kind of legislation.

Mr. HOPKINS. The gentleman is usually so well informed that I regret the necessity of correcting him on this occasion; but he certainly misapprehends the entire scope of this bill. The swamp-land policy was extended to our State by the act referred to in this bill, which seeks only to give to the State of Wisconsin the swamp lands which were actually granted by the act of September 28, 1850. There has been a dispute in regard to some islands in the Mississippi and Wisconsin rivers ever since that grant was made to our State; and this bill was drawn by the Commissioner of the General Land Office with the view of settling that dispute, so that these islands may be disposed of by the State, as the timber upon them, which constitutes about all their value, is being stripped off every year. The bill simply provides for doing an act of justice to the State of Wisconsin by a fair construction of the existing law.

The history of the swamp-land grant, so far as it relates to the State of Wisconsin, I will, as briefly as possible, give to the House.

By the act of September 28, 1850, entitled "An act to enable the State of Arkansas and other States to reclaim the swamp lands within their limits," the United States granted to the several States all the unsold swamp or overflowed lands within their limits. Acting upon information received from the land department, and believing that the plats and field notes of the Government surveys indicated accurately the swamp lands, and wishing to avoid the expense of a resurvey of the State for the purpose of making the selections under this grant, the Governor of the State of Wisconsin, in November, 1851, notified the Commissioner of the General Land Office to adjust the grant to Wisconsin upon the evidence of the plats and field notes on file in the Land Office. It soon became apparent to the authorities of the State and General Government that the plats and field notes were very imperfect, and really furnished no adequate evidence for the proper adjustment of this grant. Consequently the State of Wisconsin, through the Governor, applied to the Secretary of the Interior, and obtained permission to resurvey the State, with a view to ascertain the quantity of land Wisconsin was entitled to under said grant. A careful resurvey was made at an expense to the State of over thirty thousand dollars, and the evidence furnished thereby was conclusive that the State, if the grant was adjusted upon the basis of the plats and field notes, would lose a large quantity of land which, by the act making the grant, we were clearly entitled to. Congress intended, manifestly, to convey to the States all the swamp lands unsold within their limits at the date of the act making the grant. Wisconsin claims that a large quantity of land of the character specified in the act has not been conveyed to the State, owing to the fact that the basis adopted for the adjustment was imperfect and unreliable. We claim, further, that it was no fault of ours; that had the Government surveyors done their duty they would have indicated the swamp lands upon their plats, and afforded an easy and correct basis for the adjustment of the same; but, failing to do so, we are unable to adjust the grant fairly upon this basis. All we ask by the bill under consideration is that the act of September 28, 1850, so far as Wisconsin is affected by it, shall be carried out in good faith, and that the State may receive only such a quantity of land as by an equitable adjustment of the grant we are entitled to. The General Government has always pursued a liberal policy toward the States in settling grants of land, and I trust no exception will be made in the case under consideration.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOPKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The ten minutes allowed by unanimous consent to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HOPKINS] for reports from the Committee on the Public Lands have expired.

RELIEF OF ARMY OFFICERS.

Mr. BOYER, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Military Affairs a joint resolution (H. R. No. 238) amendatory of joint resolution for the relief of certain officers of the Army; which was read a first and second time, recommitted, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

RELIEF OF DRAFTED MEN.

Mr. BOYER also, by unanimous consent, reported back with amendment, from the Committee on Military Affairs, a bill (H. R. No. 424) entitled "An act amendatory of an act entitled 'An act for the relief of certain drafted men;'" which was recommitted, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. UPSON. I move to reconsider the votes by which these bills have been recommitted; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MAYNARD. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the first business in order during the morning hour is the call of the Committee on Invalid Pensions for reports, that committee being entitled to another morning hour.

RECEPTION OF CHINESE EMBASSY.

Mr. WOOD, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Speaker be requested to extend to the embassy now in this capital representing the Chinese Government a public reception in this Hall at such time as may be convenient to the embassy and the public business.

The SPEAKER. As the order of the House is that this invitation be extended by the Speaker at such time as will not interfere with the public business, the Chair would like to have the opinion of the House as to what the time shall be.

Mr. WOOD. I defer to the wishes of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means on that question.

The SPEAKER. If the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means will designate what time in his opinion will least interfere with the public business, the Chair will designate that time.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope the time may be Monday rather than to-day. I will state now what I propose for to-day. Many gentlemen, especially those residing at points conveniently accessible from the capital, have begged that there may be no meeting for business to-night. I wish, therefore, to submit a proposition that to-day's session be extended till half past five o'clock instead of half past four, and that we have no session to-night. If this be agreed to I shall endeavor to have the House go into the Committee of the Whole immediately after the morning hour. I think that on Monday this proposed reception might conveniently take place.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that proposition first. The gentleman from Ohio asks that the session of the House to-day shall be extended to half past five o'clock and no recess taken for an evening session. Is there objection?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Say five o'clock.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not think it is too much to ask one hour for the three hours of the evening session; but I will make it five o'clock.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will suggest that Tuesday will be a better day. The invitation must be tendered and accepted before notice can be given to the House.

Mr. SCHENCK. Very well; say Tuesday.

Mr. GARFIELD. It will be impossible to fix a day now, when we do not know whether they will accept or not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will extend an invitation for Tuesday after the morning hour.

Mr. CULLOM. I suggest three o'clock. We can then do some business before the reception.

Mr. PRICE. I suggest ten o'clock, and then it will not interfere with business.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Eleven o'clock would be better.

Mr. SCHENCK. I accept the latter suggestion, as I think it is the best.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will extend the invitation then for eleven o'clock on Tuesday morning.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

D. H. BRUSH.

Mr. PERHAM. I am instructed by the Committee on Invalid Pensions to report back the petition of D. H. Brush, of Jackson county, Illinois, and to move that it be laid upon the table. And as it is one of a large class of cases before the committee, I will make a statement for the information of the House. A very large number of soldiers disappeared during the war, and it has been found impossible to make proofs of their death. Applications for pensions made to the pension department have been rejected on that account. The last heard of many was that they were in rebel prisons; of others that they were upon the field of battle, and of others that they were in hospitals. The pension department have recently established a rule that it shall be held sufficient if proof can be made that the soldier disappeared under circumstances which would lead to the presumption of his death, and that he has not been heard of for two years.

I mention this so petitioners may know that instead of applying here they should apply to the department, who will grant pensions under this rule.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Have they power to establish this rule?

Mr. PERHAM. They decide that under the law they have the power to establish the rule.

Mr. INGERSOLL. It is a just rule.

Mr. CHANLER. Is this decision final or only temporary?

Mr. PERHAM. It is final, I take it. We so understand it.

The petition of D. H. Brush was laid on the table.

Mr. MYERS. I should like to ask the gentleman from Maine whether he proposes to report any further general bill? There is great difficulty in regard to applicants who cannot prove that the party died in the line of duty.

Mr. PERHAM. No general bill has been prepared on that subject.

Mr. BURR. I object to the morning hour being taken up in this way.

MARGARET DAVIS.

Mr. PERHAM, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1164) granting a pension to Margaret Davis; which was read a first and second time.

The bill grants to Margaret Davis, widow of William H. Davis, late acting surgeon of the eighteenth Missouri volunteers, a pension at the rate of seventeen dollars a month.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PERHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ELIZABETH CASSIDAY.

Mr. PERHAM, from the same committee, also reported a bill (H. R. No. 1165) granting a pension to Elizabeth Cassiday; which was read a first and second time.

The bill grants a pension to Elizabeth Cassiday, widow of Michael Cassiday, late first lieutenant in sixty-ninth regiment of Pennsylvania volunteer infantry, commencing July 5, 1863.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PERHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MRS. MARY A. LORD.

Mr. PERHAM, from the same committee, also reported back the petition of Mrs. Mary A. Lord, widow of the late Colonel R. G. G. Lord, for increase of pension; and moved that the same be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

LOUISA M. WILLISTON.

Mr. PERHAM, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1166) granting a pension to Louisa M. Williston; which was read a first and second time.

It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of the petitioner, widow of Samuel P. Williston, late a sergeant in the fourth Massachusetts battery, and pay her a pension at the rate of eight dollars per month from October 17, 1862, to January 6, 1864.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PERHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF PENSION LAWS.

Mr. PERHAM, from the same committee, reported adversely on the joint resolution (H.

R. No. 110) to amend the pension law; and the same was laid on the table.

ESTHER GRAVES.

Mr. PERHAM, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1167) granting a pension to Esther Graves; which was read a first and second time.

It directs the name of the petitioner, late a nurse in the Army, to be placed on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, with a pension at the rate of eight dollars per month, commencing January 1, 1865.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PERHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PENSIONS TO DRAFTED MEN.

Mr. PERHAM, from the same committee, reported adversely on the bill (H. R. No. 702) in reference to the payment of pensions to drafted men; and the same was laid on the table.

MARY ATKINSON.

Mr. PERHAM, from the same committee, reported back the bill (S. No. 49) granting a pension to Mary Atkinson.

It directs the name of the petitioner, mother of Andrew B. Atkinson, late a quartermaster in the United States Navy, who died in the service of the United States in the line of duty, to be placed on the pension-roll at the rate of twenty dollars per month, to commence from the passage of this act and continue during her natural life, said pension to be paid out of the naval pension fund.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PERHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN E. JONES.

On motion of Mr. PERHAM, the Committee on Invalid Pensions were discharged from the further consideration of the petition of John E. Jones for back pay; and the same was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pension and of the War of 1812.

FREDERICK DENNING.

Mr. PERHAM, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1168) granting a pension to Frederick Denning; which was read a first and second time.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of the petitioner, father of William F. Denning, late a second lieutenant in the ninth Maine veterans, commencing January 2, 1865.

PAY OF CLERK TO COMMITTEE.

Mr. MILLER, from the same committee, also reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives is hereby authorized and directed to pay the clerk of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, during the Fortieth Congress, a sum of money which will make his compensation equal to that of the clerk of the Committee of Claims.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose as the clerk of the Committee of Claims is paid an annual salary this only pays this clerk of the Pension Committee at the same rate for the session.

Mr. MILLER. It makes his pay the same as that of the Clerk of the Committee of Claims.

Mr. UPSON. How much is that?

Mr. MILLER. Last year it was $2,100. I have a statement of the business done by several committees during the present Congress. The Committee on Military Affairs reported five hundred and twenty cases, the Committee of Claims four hundred and fifty-two, and the Committee on Invalid Pensions five hundred and ninety-one. It thus appears that the work of the Committee on Invalid Pensions is not behind that of any other committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not object if it be limited to the session of Congress.

Mr. MILLER. It puts the clerk on the same footing as the clerk of the Committee of Claims.

Mr. HOLMAN. The clerk of the Committee of Claims is paid an annual salary. I think it only fair to pay the clerk of the Committee on Invalid Pensions at the same rate during the session. I believe the clerk of the Committee of Claims is employed during the whole Congress.

Mr. MILLER. He is not employed more laboriously than the clerk of the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. HOLMAN. What is the salary of the clerk of the Committee of Claims?

Mr. MILLER. Twenty-one hundred dollars.

Mr. HOLMAN. What is the pay of the clerk of the Committee on Invalid Pensions?

Mr. MILLER. Four dollars a day.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think it entirely just to pay him the same as the clerk of the Committee of Claims during the session of Congress.

Mr. MILLER. I am instructed by the committee to report the resolution. The committee were of opinion that he is fully entitled to the same pay that the clerk of the Committee of Claims gets. His labor is greater.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the gentleman tell us what use the committee has for a clerk in the recess between two sessions?

Mr. MILLER. The same that the Committee of Claims has.

Mr. MAYNARD. The clerk of the Committee of Claims has nothing to do. I was on that committee four years, and some way or other the clerk came to be a salaried officer, appointed and kept on a fixed salary as a permanent clerk. I never could see any business that he had to do in the recess of Congress. If the committee will bring in a resolution to put their clerk on the same footing as the others I will most cheerfully vote for it, but I cannot, unless there are more facts brought to my notice, consent to make another clerk a permanent salaried officer.

Mr. MILLER. If the gentleman was on the Committee of Invalid Pensions he would find out whether there was not much work to do. I think this clerk is well entitled to a salary.

Mr. MAYNARD. The gentleman does not answer my question. I do not propose to withhold his pay during the sessions of Congress, long or short, but I ask what he is to do in the vacation when we are all away?

Mr. MILLER. He has a considerable quantity of papers to prepare and take care of, while we are absent.

Mr. MAYNARD. I suppose they can be locked up, and there they would stay; nobody would steal them.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is manifest that the pay of this clerk ought to be more. The duties are manifestly laborious as indicated by the number of bills reported. I suggest, however, that it is not a good idea to make any more of these clerkships permanent; but, if it is proposed to increase the compensation of this particular clerk, I think it ought to receive the favorable consideration of the House. Fix it, if you please, as high as six dollars a day. I think there are three other clerks of committees who perform the same amount of labor.

Mr. MILLER. I shall have to resume the floor. I demand the previous question.

On seconding the previous question, there were—ayes 34, noes 44; no quorum voting.

Mr. MILLER. I withdraw the resolution.

Mr. MAYNARD. I hope the gentleman will have it referred back to the committee, and have this man paid abundantly, but not make him a salaried officer.

Mr. MILLER. I have withdrawn it.

Shears, deceased, late private in company H, fifty-seventh regiment of Illinois volunteers, to be paid the pension of a widow of a private during her widowhood, to be computed from the 7th of September, 1862; but on her remarriage the same to be paid to the minor children of John T. Shears who may then be under age.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MILLER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM W. WITHERSPOON.

Mr. MILLER, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do not pass, the bill (H. R. No. 596) granting a pension to Mary A. Davis, widow of William P. Davis, late a private in the eighteenth regiment Indiana volunteers.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is there any written report accompanying that bill?

Mr. MILLER. No, sir; there is a written report in almost every case except this one.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would be very glad if the gentleman would allow the bill to be recommitted as there is no written report.

Mr. MILLER. I have no objection.

The bill was recommitted to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

WILLIAM H. BLAIR.

Mr. MILLER, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1182) granting a pension to William H. Blair, late a private in company G, of the twelfth regiment of Maine volunteers; which was read a first and second time.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place upon the pension-roll the name of William H. Blair, late a private in company G, of the twelfth regiment of Maine volunteers, at the rate of eight dollars per month, to be computed from the 27th day of January, 1867, subject to the rules and regulations of the pension department.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JAMES A. ANDERSON.

Mr. MILLER, from the same committee, made an adverse report on the petition of James A. Anderson, for increase of pension; which was laid on the table.

CHRISTOPHER M. CORNMESSE.

Mr. MILLER, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1183) granting a pension to Christopher M. Cornmesser, late a private in the independent Iowa home guards; which was read a first and second time.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place upon the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Christopher M. Cornmesser, late a private in the independent Iowa home guards, and pay him such pension as a private as he is or may be entitled to under existing law founded upon surgical examination, to commence July 21, 1861.

Mr. ROSS. I would like to have the report in this case read.

The report was read, from which it appears that Christopher M. Cornmesser, on or about the 20th June, 1861, volunteered and joined as a private the independent Iowa home guards, under the command of Captain V. Wainwright, which company at the earnest solicitation of the loyal home guards of the counties of Gen-try and Worth, in the State of Missouri, marched into said counties to aid in dispersing bands of rebels there congregated, and that Cornmesser, while in the line of duty on the 21st day of July, 1861, was by an accidental discharge of a gun wounded, the ball penetrating the fore-part of his leg near the ankle joint, passing through and shattering the leg and ankle bones so as to render him a cripple for life.

The petitioner made an application to the Pension Office for a pension but it was rejected upon the ground that there was no record evidence of the organization of the company.

Mr. ROSS. Does not this bill incorporate a new principle in our pension laws? If so, why not make the bill applicable to all individuals who volunteered at that part of the war, and served without being mustered into the service of the United States?

Mr. MILLER. The committee determined to decide each case on its own merits when presented.

Mr. ROSS. I think it a dangerous precedent to grant pensions to individuals who have not been regularly mustered into the service of the United States.

Mr. MILLER. He performed valuable service to his country under the circumstances. I call the previous question.

The question was taken upon seconding the previous question; and upon a division, there were—ayes 59, noes 8; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. MILLER and Mr. Ross were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 92, noes 4.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MILLER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BUSINESS OF PENSION COMMITTEE.

Mr. BURR. I ask unanimous consent of the House that the Committee on Invalid Pensions be allowed another morning hour on Friday next. We have a large number of reports to make in very meritorious cases which I am sure will lead to no discussion at all. It will be remembered that the committee did not get its full morning hour yesterday.

Mr. PERHAM. I hope no objection will be made.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I am willing they shall have another morning hour, after the Committee of Claims have been called.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. BURR. There may be some Massachusetts cases to be reported upon by the Committee on Pensions, which the gentleman may be slaughtering by his objection.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. The trouble will be that it will put off our committee one morning.

The SPEAKER. It requires unanimous consent. If the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WASHBURN] insists upon his objection the arrangement cannot be made.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I will withdraw my objection.

No further objection being made, leave was given accordingly to the Committee on Invalid Pensions to occupy a morning hour on Friday next.

The amendment of the committee was to strike out all after the word "month," and insert the words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, commencing January 1, 1865."

The amendment was agreed to.

* The bill, as amended, was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was on the passage of the bill. Mr. ROSS. I would like to inquire to what regiment this soldier belonged.

The pending section was section twenty-two, which had been amended to read as follows:

SEC. 22. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of all persons required to make returns of income and articles or objects charged with an internal tax to declare in such returns whether the several rates and amounts therein contained are stated according to their values in currency or according to their values in coin, and in case of neglect or refusal so to declare to the satisfaction of the assistant assessor receiving such returns, such assistant assessor is hereby required to make returns for such persons so neglecting or refusing, as in cases of persons neglecting or refusing to make any return, and to assess the tax thereon, and to add thereto the amount of penal tax or penalties imposed by law in cases of such neglect or refusal. And whenever the rates and amounts contained in the returns as aforesaid shall be stated in coin, it shall be the duty of each assessor receiving the same to reduce such rates and amounts to their equivalent in currency, according to the value of such coin in said currency for the time covered by such returns. And the returns required to be furnished to collectors by assessors shall in all cases contain the several amounts of taxes assessed, estimated, or valued in currency only.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending amendment is that of the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. JENCKES,] to strike out in line twelve the word "penalties;" and insert in lieu thereof the word "taxes," so as to make the clause read as follows:

And in case of neglect or refusal so to declare to the satisfaction of the assistant assessor receiving such returns, such assistant assessor is hereby required to make returns for such persons so neglecting or refusing, as in cases of persons neglecting or refusing to make any return, and to assess the tax thereon, and to add thereto the amount of penal tax or taxes imposed by law in cases of such neglect or refusal.

Debate was exhausted on this amendment.

Mr. POLAND. I move the following as an amendment to the amendment:

Strike out the word "penalties," and in lieu thereof insert the words "additional per cent. for neglect or refusal to make return."

Mr. Chairman, I think the Committee of Ways and Means will see the propriety of striking out the word "penalty" and inserting either what I have proposed or something like it. This section provides that every person making return of income or of articles or objects subject to tax shall specify whether that return is made on the basis of currency or coin, and if he neglects or refuses so to specify in his return, it is made the duty of the assessor to add to the tax "the amount of penalties imposed by law in cases of such neglect or refusal;" that is, neglect or refusal to make return at all. Now, by turning back to section eighteen we find what the penalty is for neglecting or refusing to make any return.

The last clause of the eighteenth section is as follows:

And if any person, on being notified or required as aforesaid, shall refuse or neglect to render such return within the time designated, he shall, on conviction, be fined not less than $100 nor more than $1,000.

That is for refusal to make any return. This section as presented by the committee provides that it shall be the duty of the assessor to add to the tax some penalty imposed for refusal to make any return. It is clear in my judgment, and I think in that of the chairman of the committee and of every member of the House, that it is entirely beyond our jurisdiction to invest an assessor with that power.

The amount of the penalty is not fixed. It is not less than $100 and not more than $1,000. You cannot make the assessor a criminal judge to say what shall be the intermediate sum.

There is a variety of provisions in relation to penalties. In section twenty-seven, in the case of a false or fraudulent return, the assessor is to add one hundred per cent. to the tax; and in case of neglect or refusal to make a return he is to add fifty per cent. to the tax. Then it provides:

And if any person shall deliver or disclose to any assessor or assistant assessor any false or fraudulent return or statement, with intent to defeat or evade the valuation, enumeration, or assessment required to be made, or if any person, who, being duly summoned to testify, or to produce any book as aforesaid, shall refuse or willfully neglect to appear or to produce said book, he shall, on conviction thereof, be fined not less than $100 nor more than $5,000, and imprisoned not less than one month nor more than two years.

In section thirty there is a general provision that the assessor may put any penalty which arises under this law in the list of taxes to be returned to the collector, and it is then provided that the collector, upon the receipt of such list, shall proceed to collect such penalties by distraint or suit as provided by law for the collection of taxes. It is clear that we have no such constitutional power. I agree where a man fails to make his return by a certain time that a certain percentage may be added. It may be said to be an additional tax. If a man makes his return by a stated time his tax is to be so much. If he fails, then his tax is to be a certain percentage more. In any event, that is only a tax, and we can put it in the list and distraint the man's property to collect it. But where it is a penalty for violation of law it comes clearly within that provision of the Constitution, and may be levied only by due process of law.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman seems to think there is very clear reason to be presented against the provisions of this and other sections relating to penalties. If we are mistaken we are mistaken advisedly.

First, on the subject of penalties generally. There are two classes of them. One penalty is to be ascertained by calculation, being a percentage on the tax, as for instance in the case of delinquency where the tax is to be collected and in consequence of the delinquency fifty per cent. is added. The other penalties are those which are fixed by law, a stipulated or fixed sum, a penalty of fifty dollars or $100 or other number of dollars. One is as easily ascertainable as the other. If it be unconstitutional to fix and collect it as having become a part of the tax, or incident to the tax, a specific penalty, then it must be equally unconstitutional to connect with the tax as an incident to it and collect a percentage on that tax; the only difference being that you ascertain one by reference to the letter of the law, and the other by referring to the tax and making a calculation. If one be more certain than the other it is the fixed, specific penalty, rather than the calculated penalty, for in that you have to go one step further and make an arithmetical calculation, simple though it be.

The gentleman refers back to the eighteenth section, and says the penalty there is a fine.

He would not have made that reference if it had not escaped his observation that not only in this bill but in the old law as it now exists upon the statute book, and since the beginning of the tax system the distinction is continually drawn between penalties and fines. On conviction there may be fine and imprisonment as a punishment. The penalty is not the punishment which is to be inflicted.

Mr. POLAND. If the gentleman will yield a moment I will call his attention to this provision:

Such assistant assessor is hereby required to make returns for such persons so neglecting or refusing, as in cases of persons neglecting or refusing to make any return.

Mr. SCHENCK. In that particular case there is no penalty imposed. There is a fine and imprisonment. But there are other cases where upon a refusal to make returns there is a penalty, and also a fine and imprisonment. All through the law as it now exists, and all through this bill which we present, a distinction is drawn between penalties. If it is to be sued for it is sued in a civil case as for debt; but a fine is a punishment inflicted after a conviction for an offense.

Then, again, the gentleman speaks of it as being unconstitutional and unusual. Why, sir, this very clause is copied from the law as it has been on the statute-book enacted, and afterward reenacted. If you will refer to the third section of the act of March, 1866, from which the substance of this clause is taken, you will find this clause, which I read last night:

And in case of neglect or refusal so to declare to the satisfaction of the assistant assessor receiving such returns or lists, such assistant assessor is hereby required to make returns or lists for such persons so neglecting or refusing, as in cases of persons neglecting or refusing to make the returns or lists required by the acts aforesaid, and to assess the tax thereon, and to add thereto the amount of penalties imposed by law in cases of such neglect or refusal.

The only difference made is, that having originally reported to add the penalties, the committee propose to insert the words "penal tax or penalty," as it now stands amended. The gentleman's objection is to penalties, not to penal tax, and yet "penalty" is the very word of the old law that we retain. His objection is not to the new matter that we have put in, which seems to accord with his own ideas, but he claims as unconstitutional and unprecedented exactly that which has all along been in the law.

One word as to the reason for this assessment of penalties. From all quarters we learn, on consultation with assessors, that in nine cases out of ten when you assess the tax and a penalty has accrued, and there is a stated amount with a percentage, and that also is assessed with the tax and returned to the party, it will be paid without objection. Thus a great saving of money and of expense is made to the Government. Either conscious that they are liable for the penalty or for some other reason the party will generally submit. And yet we do not trench on the constitutional privilege of the party to be heard, because we do not take away his right to a suit in court. He may afterward sue and recover, or he may apply to the Commissioner, as in any other case, to have the penalty remitted. There is a special clause providing for that.

Mr. POLAND. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. DAWES. I renew it for the purpose of making a suggestion to the chairman of the committee. I agree to the philosophy of the committee in incorporating into the tax whatever penalty accrues. In the eighteenth section it is provided that—

If any person, on being notified or required as aforesaid, shall refuse or neglect to render such return within the time designated, he shall, on conviction, be fined not less than $100 nor more than $1,000.

Mr. SCHENCK. That is fine, not penalty.

Mr. DAWES. It is a fine that the assessor is authorized to impose. The assessor refers back to this law and finds that it authorizes him to impose a penalty. This is the difficulty in my mind. We impose upon the assessor a duty which is entirely a judicial one. He has a discretionary penalty to impose. It may be one sum; it cannot exceed another sum; it must be contained within limitations according to his discretion as to the enormity of the offense in violating the law. That seems to me to have all the elements of being a judicial decision on the part of this assessor. Now, if my friend can get round that, or will so change the phraseology of the bill as not to be open to that objection, I will yield entirely to his argument as to the propriety of the process.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman has detected, if he has detected anything, the omission of penalties in section eighteen in regard to this particular class of delinquencies. The penalties and the fines are distinct things, and the fines we have made discretionary with the court, for they are only to be imposed on conviction.

In other parts of the bill we provide for penalties for offenses in various cases of refusal to make returns. For instance, on page 31, we provide that—

In case of a refusal or neglect, except in cases of sickness or absence, to make a return, or to verify the same as aforesaid, he shall add fifty per cent. to such tax.

Mr. DAWES. I do not object to that. I do not desire to detain the committee any longer. I merely wished to get the views of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means on that subject.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. JENCKES. The very reason why I made the motion last night to strike out the word "penalty" was because of its being in the present law, and its having created the trouble which I then attempted to explain. It is no reason for retaining it here that it has been found a stumbling-block in the existing law; but it is a reason for its being removed.

The point I wish to make on this section, as well as on subsequent sections, I will restate; and it is this: that so far as relates to any penal tax or assessment, any mode by which the tax of a person may be increased by computation, by mere arithmetic, those penal assessments may be added to the actual proper assessment, and collected in the mode prescribed in the act without objection; but where any sum is to be added to a tax properly assessed under the law by reason of the misconduct of the party assessed, of any act that amounts to malum prohibitum, and for the doing of which, or the not doing of which either, the penalty is imposed, in that case the person is entitled to a trial by a court of competent jurisdiction before he can be deprived of his property by reason of his misconduct.

With regard to the first class of cases, they are properly within this section and the thirtieth section; but in regard to all other cases where penalties are imposed for misconduct they do not seem to me proper to be included either in this section or in the other. They should come within the scope of the fifty-sixth section, which provides for the collection of these penalties, fines, and forfeitures in courts of law.

The gentleman says that if the assessment has been improperly increased the party aggrieved may have his appeal to the Commissioner, and that is sufficient; but that is not so, because he stands charged with doing something which the laws of his country forbid, and he should not rest under the imputation or be obliged to remove it by bringing a civil action or by appealing to an irresponsible tribunal, to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, because his decisions may be governed by principle or they may not; they may be governed by caprice. Every person, before he can be deprived of his property for any act done or any act left undone in violation of the laws of his country, should have a proper trial in a court competent to try him for that purpose. It was for that reason that I moved to strike out the word "penalty;" but I will accept the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND,] which simply carries it a little further, so that one vote may decide the question.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask unanimous consent to add these words at the end of line thirteen of section eighteen on page 20: "have added to his fifty per cent. as a penalty and;" then follow the words, "on conviction shall be fined," &c. That will remove the objection of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] and will remove all questions as to the difference between fines and penalties.

Mr. JENCKES. I think the gentleman had better wait until we go through the other sections, and I think he will find that an amendment should be made to other sections also. I have accepted the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND,] and I ask for a vote upon it.

The question was taken on Mr. JENCKES'S amendment as modified; and there were—ayes 43, noes 23; no quorum voting.

Mr. SCHENCK. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. PILE and Mr. JENCKES were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes fifty-two, noes not counted.

So the amendment was agreed to.

No further amendment was offered.

The next section was read, as follows:

Sec. 23. And be it further enacted, That every person before commencing, or if already commenced, before continuing any manufacture liable to be assessed under the provisions of this act, and not elsewhere differently provided for, shall furnish, without previous demand therefor, to the proper assistant assessor, a statement subscribed and sworn to or affirmed, setting forth the place where the manufacture is to be carried on, and the principal place of business for sales, the name of the manufactured article, the proposed market for the same, whether foreign or domestic, and generally the kind and quality manufactured or proposed to be manufactured. Any person manufacturing articles upon the manufacture of which specific taxes are imposed by law shall in his return state the entire quantity of such articles made by him or his agent, and shall state whether any part, and if so, what part of said articles has been consumed or used by himself or on his own account. In case of the sale, consumption, or delivery of any manufactured articles, on the manufacture of which any tax is imposed, without compliance on the part of the person manufacturing the same, with all the requirements prescribed by law in relation thereto, the assessor or assistant assessor may, upon such information as he may have, assume and estimate the amount of such manufactures, and upon such assumed amount assess the taxes and add thereto fifty per cent.; and said taxes and per cent. shall be collected in like manner as if the provisions of this act in relation thereto had been complied with.

No amendment was offered.

The next section was read, as follows:

Sec. 24. And be it further enacted, That every return, statement, inventory, abstract, or account required by this act to be made and delivered to an assistant assessor, shall have indorsed thereon the certificate of an assistant assessor of the district in such manner and form as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may prescribe, setting forth that the said return, statement, inventory, abstract, or account was duly filled up in every particular, as required by law, before the same was sworn to by the person rendering the same; and that the same was signed by the person making the oath or affirmation, and that the oath or affirmation was duly administered according to law by the said assistant assessor. In every case wherein such return, statement, inventory, abstract, or account, a word or words may be needed to show that no transactions have taken place, or that no manufactures, sales, or removals have been made, such word or words shall be inserted in such return, statement, inventory, abstract, or account before the same is so certified. And any assistant assessor who shall neglect or refuse to sign such certificate, or to cause the proper word or words to be inserted in such return, statement, inventory, abstract, or account, shall, on conviction thereof, be fined not less than fifty dollars nor more than $1,000.

Mr. SCHENCK, on behalf of the Committee of Ways and Means, moved to amend the first sentence of the section by striking out the words "this act" and inserting the word "law," so that it would read "that every return, statement, &c., required by law," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK also moved to further amend the same sentence by striking out the words "an assistant assessor of the district," and inserting "the revenue officer before whom the same shall be verified."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK also moved to amend the same sentence by striking out at the close the words "assistant assessor," and inserting the words "revenue officer."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK also moved to amend the last sentence of the section, by striking out the words "assistant assessor," and inserting the words "revenue officer."

The amendment was agreed to.

No further amendment was offered.

The next section was read, as follows:

Sec. 25. And be it further enacted, That the assistant assessors, respectively, shall make a general list of all returns received by them, which shall exhibit, in alphabetical order, the names of all persons liable to pay any tax under this act residing within their assessment districts, together with the value and assessment or enumeration, as the case may require, of the objects liable to tax, with the amount of tax payable thereon; and on another list shall enter, in alphabetical order, the names of all persons residing out of the collection district who own property within the district, together with the value and assessment or enumeration thereof, as the case may be, with the amount of tax payable thereon as aforesaid. All returns required to be made monthly by any person liable to tax shall be made on or before the 10th day of each and every month, and the amount of the tax assessed or due thereon shall be certified and returned by the assessor to the collector on or before the last day of each and every month. And all returns required to be made quarterly, and all other returns, not otherwise provided for, shall be made on or before the 10th day of the month in which said return is required to be made, and the tax thereon shall be certified and returned as provided for monthly returns; and such tax shall be due and payable on or before the last day of the month. The forms of all returns and lists shall be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. Assistant assessors shall deliver their general lists to the assessor within fifteen days after the day on which returns are required to be made to them, or, where taxes accrue at other and different times, lists shall be delivered from time to time as such taxes become due.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend this section by inserting after the words "on or before the 10th day of the month in which said return is required to be made" the words "or on the 10th day of the month next succeeding the time when the tax may become due and liable to be assessed."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to further amend this section by striking out "fifteen" and inserting "five," so that it will read, "shall deliver their general lists to the assessor within five days after the day on which returns are required to be made."

The amendment was agreed to.

No further amendment was offered.

The next section was read as follows:

Sec. 26. And be it further enacted, That where any return is required to be verified by oath or affirmation of the person making the same, no alteration, amendment, erasure, or addition thereto, shall be made or allowed after such return is so verified before the assessor or assistant assessor authorized to receive the same. And any person who shall violate the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, on conviction thereof, be fined not less than $500, and imprisoned not less than one year; but any person who shall have delivered any incorrect, imperfect, or informal return, may, within six months thereafter, present to the assessor of the district a supplementary return, which shall clearly and distinctly set forth the details and items of the incorrectness, imperfection, or informality of the return which it is intended to correct, and the correct statement which should have been made, together with a declaration verified by his oath or affirmation that such supplementary return contains a true and correct statement of all the facts, and shall, in addition, have attached thereto the affidavits of one or more persons having personal knowledge of the facts testifying to the truth of said statement; and the assessor shall make due examination of the case, and transmit such return, together with the evidence and his own report thereon, to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue; and if, in the judgment of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, it shall appear that such incorrect, imperfect, or informal return was delivered to the assistant assessor without intent to defraud, and without gross carelessness or willful neglect, or that a manifest clerical error has been committed, he may authorize the assessor to accept the same, and such supplementary return shall be taken as good and sufficient for all legal purposes.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend this section so that the last portion of the section shall read as follows:

And shall, in addition thereto, furnish such evidence in writing as he may be able to do in support of the truth of said statement; and the assessor shall make due examination of the case, and if, in the judgment of the assessor, it shall appear that such incorrect, imperfect, or informal return was delivered to the assistant assessor without intent to defraud, and without gross carelessness or willful neglect, or that a manifest clerical error has been committed, he may accept the same, and such supplementary return shall be taken as good and sufficient for all legal purposes: Provided, That in any such case the assessor may, in his discretion, and in all cases involving a greater amount than $100, he shall report the same, with all the evidence, to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for his decision thereon; and in any such case, where the person making such supplemental return shall be dissatisfied with the decision of the assessor thereon, he may appeal therefrom to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and the decision of the Commissioner on such reference or appeal shall be final.

Mr. SCHENCK. I understand the object of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] is to have the assessors settle all small cases of this kind, instead of carrying every one of them to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, as is now the practice. Now, I see no particular objection to the amendment of the gentleman, except that I think he had better make the limit fifty dollars instead of $100.

Mr. POLAND. I accept the suggestion, and will modify my amendment accordingly.

The amendment, as modified, was then agreed to.

No further amendment was offered.

The next section was read as follows:

Sec. 27. And be it further enacted, That if any person, on being duly notified or required thereto, shall deliver or disclose to any assessor or assistant assessor any return which, in the opinion of the assessor, is false or fraudulent, or contains any understatement or undervaluation, it shall be lawful for the assessor to summon such person, his agent, or other person having possession, custody, or care of books of account containing entries relating to the trade or business of such person, or any other person he may deem proper, to appear before such assessor and produce such book, at a time and place therein named, and to give testimony or answer interrogatories under oath or affirmation respecting any objects liable to tax, or the statements, or returns thereof, or any trade, business, or profession liable to any tax. And the assessor may summon, as aforesaid, any person residing or found within the State in which his district is situated. And when the person intended to be summoned does not reside and cannot be found within such State, the assessor may enter any collection district where such person may be found, and there make the examination hereinbefore authorized. And to this end he shall there have and may exercise all the power and authority he has or may lawfully exercise in the district for which he is commissioned. The summons authorized by this section shall in all cases be served by an assistant assessor of the district where the person to whom it is directed may be found, by an attested copy delivered to such person or left at his usual place of abode, allowing such person time, at the rate of one day for each twenty-five miles he may be required to travel, computed from the place of service to the place of examination; and the certificate of service signed by such assistant assessor shall be evidence of the facts it states on the hearing of an application for an attachment; and when the summons requires the production of books, it shall be sufficient if such books are described with reasonable certainty. In case any person so summoned shall neglect or refuse to obey such summons, or to give testimony, or to answer interrogatories as required, it shall be lawful for the assessor to apply to the judge of the district court or to a commissioner of the circuit court of the United States for the district within which the person so summoned resides for an attachment against such person as for a contempt. It shall be the duty of such judge or commissioner to hear such application, and, if satisfactory proof be made, to issue an attachment directed to some proper officer, for the arrest of such person, and upon his being brought before him, to proceed to a hearing of the case; and upon such hearing the judge or commissioner shall have power to make such order as he shall deem proper, not inconsistent with the provisions of existing laws, for the punishment of contempts, to enforce obedience to the requirements of the summons, and punish such person for his default or disobedience. It shall be the duty of the assessor or assistant assessor of the district within which such person shall have taxable property to enter into and upon the premises, if it be necessary, of such person so refusing or neglecting, or rendering a false or fraudulent return, and to make, according to the best information which he can obtain, including that derived from the evidence elicited by the examination of the assessor, and on his own view and information, such return, according to the form prescribed, or of the property, goods, wares, and merchandise, and all articles or objects liable to tax, owned or possessed or under the care or management of such person, and assess the tax thereon, including the amount, if any, due for special or income tax; and in case of a false or fraudulent return, he shall add one hundred per cent. to such tax; and in case of a refusal or neglect, except in cases of sickness or absence, to make a return, or to verify the same as aforesaid, he shall add fifty per cent. to such tax; and in case of neglect occasioned by sickness or absence as aforesaid, the assessor may allow such further time for making and delivering such return as he may judge necessary, not exceeding thirty days; and the amount so added to the tax shall, in all cases, be collected by the collector at the same time and in the same manner as the tax; and the return so made and subscribed by such assessor or assistant assessor shall be taken and reputed as good and sufficient for all legal purposes. And if any person shall deliver or disclose to any assessor or assistant assessor any false or fraudnent return or statement, with intent to defeat or evade the valuation, enumeration, or assessment required to be made, or if any person, who, being duly summoned to testify, or to produce any book as aforesaid, shall refuse or willfully neglect to appear or to produce said book, he shall, on conviction thereof, be fined not less than $100 nor more than $5,000, and imprisoned not less than one month nor more than two years.

Mr. SCHENCK. On behalf of the Committee of Ways and Means, I move to amend by striking out after the word "person" in the first line of this section the words "on being duly notified or required thereto."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I also move, on behalf of the Committee of Ways and Means, to amend by inserting after the word "undervaluation," in the fifth line, the words "or shall refuse or neglect to make return within the time prescribed by law;" so as to make the first clause of the section read:

That if any person shall deliver or disclose to any assessor or assistant assessor any return which, in the opinion of the assessor, is false or fraudulent, or contains any understatement or undervaluation, or shall refuse or neglect to make return within the time prescribed by law, it shall be lawful for the assessor to summon such person, his agent, or other person having possession, custody, or care of books of account containing entries relating to the trade or business of such person, or any other person he may deem proper, to appear before such assessor and produce such book, at a time and place therein named, and to give testimony or answer interrogatories under oath or affirmation respecting any objects liable to tax, or the statements or returns thereof, or any trade, business, or profession liable to any tax.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. On behalf of the Committee of Ways and Means, I also move to amend by inserting after the word "certainty," in line thirty-four, the following:

The costs for the attendance and mileage of witnesses shall be taxed by the assessor and paid by the delinquent or by the disbursing agent for the district, on certificate of the assessor, at the rates allowed to witnesses in the district court of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WOOD. I move to amend by inserting a. the end of the section the following:

Provided, That no person holding the office of assessor or assistant assessor shall be a candidate for election to office during the time he may hold or exercise the duties of his office.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am compelled to raise a point of order on this amendment. This section relates only to the making of improper returns to the assessor and has nothing to do with the election of assessors.

Mr. WOOD. I am aware of that, and I was about to make the inquiry whether this is the proper section to which to propose this amendment. I desire at the proper time, and when the proper section is under consideration, to propose, for incorporation in this bill, a provision which will prevent these officers from exercising their official power for the promotion of their own personal political ambition.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from New York whether he thinks we can by legislation prevent the American people from voting for any candidate they may select, though the man may happen to occupy one of these offices?

Mr. WOOD. I can answer the gentleman very readily. We have adopted such provisions in the State of New York. No judge of the supreme court of our State can, while holding that position, become a candidate for office. The State of Ohio has adopted a similar provision. Such provisions are very proper. The amendment I have offered is in accordance with a rule which has been adopted by the Department, and I would incorporate that rule in the law itself.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Chairman, I have not made any question about the merits of this proposition. I think there is a germ of good in it. Perhaps the fact of becoming a candidate for another position might be made a cause for removal from office. But the proposition is not germane to this section.

Mr. WOOD. I will withdraw it with the notice that I will offer it again at the proper time.

Mr. JENCKES. I move to strike out in lines thirty-eight and thirty-nine, "or to a commissioner of the circuit court;" in line forty-two "or a commissioner;" and in line forty-six "or commissioner;" and I do it for this reason. Courts only are authorized to punish for contempt, and commissioners of circuit courts of the United States do not hold courts, nor do they have any authority of courts, nor should they be clothed with extraordinary power of punishment for contempt. There is no law which gives them that power, but they are authorized to take affidavits and depositions and to hold for bail. The practice is, if a witness summoned before a commissioner refuses to answer, then the case is heard before a judge of the United States court, and if on such hearing the party is adjudged to be guilty he is then punished for contempt. It has never been the policy of Congress to clothe any other than judicial officers with the power to commit for contempt. If this is in the present law it crept in by somebody not being as vigilant as he should have been.

The bill authorizes the assessor to summon witnesses, and it requires the witnesses to answer to such matters as it is his duty to answer. If the witnesses refuse to answer, then the assessor should report to the district judge, who shall adjudge a case of contempt. We know that this power of committing for contempt is an irresponsible power, and it rests in the discretion of a court to impose a fine or to imprison as long as the judge pleases. I am unwilling to place that power in the hands of any other than judicial officers.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Chairman, one of the nicest little States in the Union is Rhode Island, and as to her people, the most precious gems are contained in the smallest caskets. Now, although it may be easy to reach a judge from any portion of that State it is not so easy in the other States of the Union. For that reason it has been thought expedient in the law as it stands, and we propose to perpetuate it, to give this power to the assessors. If the gentleman's suggestion be adopted assessors would have to travel sixty miles and more to find a judge, and in some districts two hundred miles. These commissioners are lawyers and competent persons, and we have given them this power heretofore. The gentleman lives in a State where it is not an inconvenience to go before a judge, but it is not so easy in other States.

Mr. JENCKES. The assessor will not have to travel at all; all he will have to do will be to send a prima facie case to the judge, and in a day he can get an answer. This surely is not a hardship upon the assessor. It is too much to have a man committed for contempt and his property distrained for refusing to answer a question when the judge might say that the question was a frivolous one. The inconvenience is on the other side.

Mr. SCHENCK. It will be an extremely great inconvenience for the assessor to go to find a judge for that purpose.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 39, noes 46; no quorum voting.

The Chairman ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. JENCKES and Mr. GRISWOLD.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 51, noes 46.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The next section was read, as follows:

Sec. 23. And be it further enacted, That the assessor for each collection district shall give notice by advertisement in one newspaper published in each county within said district, and if there be none published in the district, then in a newspaper published in the collection district adjoining thereto, and shall post notices in at least four public places within each assessment district, and shall mail a copy of such notice to each postmaster in his district, to be posted in his office, stating the time and place within said collection district when and where appeals will be received and determined relative to any erroneous or excessive valuations, assessments, or enumerations by the assessor, or assistant assessor returned in the annual list, and such notice shall be advertised and posted by the assessor and mailed as aforesaid at least ten days before the time appointed for hearing said appeals. And it shall be the duty of the assessor for each collection district, at the time fixed for hearing such appeals as aforesaid, to submit the annual lists taken and returned as aforesaid, to the inspection of any and all persons who may apply for that purpose. And such assessor is hereby authorized at any time to hear and determine in a summary way, according to law and right, all appeals which may be exhibited against the action of the said assessor or assistant assessor; and the office or principal place of business of the said assessor shall be open during the business hours of each day for the hearing of appeals by parties who shall appear voluntarily before him; but no appeal shall be allowed to any party after he shall have been duly assessed, and the annual list containing the assessment has been transmitted to the collector of the district. All appeals to the assessor shall be made in writing, and shall specify the particular cause, matter, or thing respecting which a decision is requested, and shall state the wrong or ground of error complained of. And the assessor shall have power to reexamine and determine upon the assessments and valuations, and rectify the same as shall appear just and equitable; but no valuation, assessment, or enumeration shall be increased without a previous notice of at least five days to the party interested to appear and object to the same if he judge proper, which notice shall be in writing and left at the dwelling-house, office, or place of business of the party by such assessor, assistant assessor, or other person, or sent by mail to the nearest or usual post office address of said party. On the hearing of appeals it shall be lawful for the assessor to require by summons the attendance of witnesses and the production of books of account in the same manner and under the same penalties as are provided in cases of refusal or neglect to furnish returns. The costs for the attendance and mileage of said witnesses shall be taxed by the assessor and paid by the delinquent party, or by the disbursing agent for the district, on certificate of the assessor, at the rates allowed to witnesses in the district courts of the United States.

Mr. RAUM. I move the following amendment:

In line sixty-seven, after the words "such tax," insert:

And any person feeling himself aggrieved by the decision of an assessor in cases arising under the foregoing provisions shall have the right to appeal from the decision of such assessor to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue within five days after such decision shall have been made.

Mr. SCHENCK. Appeals are provided for in another place.

Mr. RAUM. I withdraw the amendment for the present.

No further amendment being offered, the Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 29. And be it further enacted, That the assessor of each collection district shall, immediately after the expiration of the time for hearing appeals concerning taxes returned in the annual lists, and from time to time as taxes become liable to be assessed, prepare lists containing the sums payable according to law on all property or other subjects of taxation in his district, which lists shall contain the name of each person residing therein, and owning or having the care or superintendence of such property, or engaged in any business or pursuit which renders him liable to any tax, and shall furnish to the collector of his district, within ten days thereafter, and from time to time as occasion afterward may require, a certified copy of every such list; and when there is any property within his collection district liable to tax owned or occupied by or under the superintendence of any person not resident therein, there shall be a separate list made of such property, specifying the amount payable, and the names and residences of such persons, respectively; and the said assessor shall transmit to the assessor of the district where any person liable to pay such tax resides a copy of the list of said property for assessment and collection of the tax thereon. In case it shall be ascertained that the annual list or any other list which may have been or which shall hereafter be delivered to any collector is imperfect or incomplete, in consequence of the omission of the name of any person liable to tax, or in consequence of any omission, understatement, or undervaluation, or of any false or fraudulent statement contained in any return made by any person liable to tax, the said assessor may, from time to time, or at any time within fifteen months after the delivery of the list to the collector as aforesaid, enter on any monthly or special list the name of any person so omitted, together with the amount of tax for which such person may have been or shall become liable; and also the name of any person in respect to whose return, as aforesaid, there has been or shall be any omission, understatement, or undervaluation, or false or fraudulent statement, together with the amount for which such person may be liable over and above the amount which may have been or shall be assessed on any return made as aforesaid, and shall certify and return said list to the collector as required by law.

No amendment being offered, the Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 30. And be it further enacted, That whenever any penalty shall be charged to have accrued against any person under any of the provisions of the internal revenue laws, and the same shall, by complaint made or otherwise, come to the knowledge of the assessor or assistant assessor of the proper district or division, it shall be the duty of such assessor or assistant assessor to make investigation thereof, and, if satisfied that such penalty has been incurred, to enter the same upon his monthly list, or any special list, to be returned to the collector as assessed taxes are returned; and the collector, upon the receipt of such list, shall proceed to collect such assessed penalties by distraint or suit as provided by law for the collection of taxes, and no suit shall be brought for a penalty until after such investigation and assessment.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move on behalf of the committee to amend by inserting after the word "any," in line one, the words "penal taxes or."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move further to amend by inserting in line eight and line thirteen each before the word "penalty," where it occurs, the words "penal tax." Also, in line twelve, before the word "penalty," by inserting the words "penal tax and."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to strike out after the word "penalties," in line twelve, to the word "and," in line thirteen, and to insert the words "unless voluntarily paid by proper suit or complaint." By this section every penalty that is provided for is to be inserted in the assessment when it comes to the knowledge of the assessor, and it is made the duty of the collector to go forward and collect it either by suit or by distraint. It will be noticed that this bill bristles with penalties.

Mr. SCHENCK. If it will not be offensive to the gentleman, I will say I am willing for one to accept that amendment if the committee agree with me.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JENCKES. I move to strike out the word "penalty" wherever it occurs in this section, so that only the words "penal tax" or "penal taxes" may remain.

Mr. POLAND. If the gentleman had paid attention to the amendment which I offered, I think he would not have offered this amendment.

Mr. JENCKES. I did pay attention but it was impossible to hear it.

Mr. POLAND. My amendment was to insert the words, "unless voluntarily paid by proper suit or complaint." The authority given by this section to collect and distraint for a penalty is taken away by this amendment.

Mr. JENCKES. Then I understand that the word "distraint" is stricken out?

Mr. POLAND. Yes, sir.

Mr. JENCKES. I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 31. And be it further enacted, That before any collector shall enter upon the duties of his office he shall execute a bond in such form and in such penal sum as shall be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with two or more sureties to be approved by a judge of the circuit or district court of the United States for that judicial district, conditioned that said collector shall faithfully perform the duties of his office according to law, and shall justly and promptly account for and pay over to the United States, in compliance with law and regulations of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, all public moneys which may come into his possession; which bond shall be filed in the office of the First Comptroller of the Treasury. And such collector shall, from time to time, renew, strengthen, and increase his official bond, as the Commissioner may direct, with such further conditions as the said Commissioner shall prescribe.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend by striking out the word "two" in line five and inserting "five," so that it will read "five or more sureties."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I also move, in line nine, after the word "for," to insert the words "all stamps and other property."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 32. And be it further enacted, That each collector shall be authorized to appoint, by an instrument in writing, as many deputies as he may think proper, to be by him compensated for their services, and also to revoke any such appointment, giving such notice thereof as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall prescribe; and may require bonds or other securities, and accept the same, from such deputies; and each such deputy shall have the like authority, in every respect, to collect the taxes levied or assessed within the portion of the district assigned to him which is by this act vested in the collector himself; but each collector shall, in every respect, be responsible both to the United States and to individuals, as the case may be, for all moneys collected, and for every act done or neglected to be done by any of his deputies while acting as such.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend by striking out the word "act" in line ten and inserting "law."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the first two lines of this section, and ask whether it is not best to make an amendment? I believe all these appointments of deputies are made by the Secretary of the Treasury on the nomination of the collector or assessor. Now, it occurs to me we cannot authorize a collector to appoint subordinates.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman is thinking of assistant assessors. The collector is charged with every dollar of the tax assessed, and is bound to account for it. For this purpose he is permitted to select his own deputies, every one of whom is appointed by him. He is responsible for them, and the Government has nothing to do with them.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman is right; I was thinking of assessors.

No further amendment being offered to the thirty-second section, the next section was read, as follows:

Sec. 33. And be it further enacted, That in case of the sickness or temporary disability of a collector to discharge his duties, they may be devolved by him upon one of his deputies; and for the official acts and defaults of such deputy the collector and his sureties shall be held responsible to the United States; and in case of a vacancy occurring in the office of collector, the deputies of such collector shall continue to act until his successor is appointed; and until a successor shall be appointed the deputy of such collector senior in service shall discharge all the duties and receive the compensation of collector; and for the official acts and defaults of such deputy, remedy shall be had on the official bond of the collector. But if it shall appear to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that the interest of the Government shall so require, he may, by his order, direct said duties to be performed by such other of the said deputies as he may designate. And any bond or security taken from a deputy by such collector, pursuant to this act, shall be available to his legal representatives and sureties to indemnify them for loss or damage accruing from any act or omission of duty by the deputy so continuing or succeeding to the duties of such collector.

No amendments were offered, and the next section was read as follows:

Sec. 34. And be it further enacted, That the collector of internal revenue at any port of entry in the United States shall have charge of all matters relating to the exportation from said port of articles subject to tax under the laws to provide internal revenue, subject to such regulations, not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may prescribe; and at any port of entry where there is more than one collector of internal revenue, the said Commissioner shall designate one of said collectors to be collector in charge of exports, whose duty it shall be to have charge of all matters relating to exportations as aforesaid from such port of entry; and at such ports of entry as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may deem necessary, there shall be an officer appointed by him to superintend all matters of exportation and drawback, under the direction of the said collector, whose compensation therefor shall be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, but shall not exceed in any case an annual rate of $2,000, excepting at New York, where the compensation shall not exceed an annual rate of $3,000. And any books, papers, and documents in the respective ports relating to the drawback of taxes paid under the internal revenue laws shall be delivered to said collector of internal revenue; and any collector of internal revenue, or superintendent of exports and drawbacks, shall have authority to administer such oaths and certify to such papers as may be necessary under any rules and regulations that may be prescribed under the authority herein conferred.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to offer the following amendment:

On page 39, section thirty-four, line sixteen, after the word "collector," insert the words "to be known as superintendent of exports;" so that the clause will read:

And at such ports of entry as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may deem necessary, there shall be an officer appointed by him to superintend all matters of exportation and drawback, under the direction of the said collector, to be known as superintendent of exports, whose compensation therefor shall be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, but shall not exceed in any case an annual rate of $2,000, excepting at New York, where the compensation shall not exceed an annual rate of $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I also offer the following amendment in behalf of the Committee of Ways and Means:

On page 39, section thirty-four, line twenty-four, after the word "revenue," where it first occurs, insert the words "in charge of exports;" so that the clause will read:

And any books, papers, and documents in the respective ports relating to the drawback of taxes paid under the internal revenue laws shall be delivered to said collector of internal revenue in charge of exports.

The amendment was agreed to.

No further amendments being offered to the thirty-fourth section, the next section was read as follows:

Sec. 35. And be it further enacted, That there shall be allowed to collectors, in full compensation for their services and that of their deputies, a salary of $1,500 per annum, to be paid quarterly, and, in addition thereto, a commission of three per cent. upon the first $100,000, and a commission of one per cent. upon all sums above $100,000 and not exceeding $400,000, and a commission of one half of one per cent. on all sums above $400,000 and not exceeding $1,000,000, and one-eighth of one per cent. on all sums above $1,000,000; such commissions to be computed upon the amounts by them respectively collected and paid over and accounted for under the instructions of the Treasury Department, and adjusted in conformity with the fiscal year as in other cases, except that in determining the compensation, to be allowed to any collector the commission shall be computed on one half of the tax on any articles which shall have been transported from his district in bond, and on only one half of the tax on any articles received in his district in bond, where such transportation has been by shipment from one district to another. And there shall be further paid, after the account thereof has been rendered to and approved by the proper officers of the Treasury, to each collector his necessary and reasonable charges for advertising, stationery, and blank books used in the performance of his official duties, and for postage actually paid on letters and documents received or sent, and exclusively relating to official business; but no such account shall be allowed unless it shall state the date and the particular items of every such expenditure, and shall be verified by the oath or affirmation of the collector, and have the approval of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue indorsed thereon. But the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is authorized to make such further allowances, from time to time, as may be reasonable in cases in which, from the territorial extent of the district, or from the amount of internal taxes collected, or from other circumstances, it may seem just to make such allowances.

Mr. SCHENCK. I offer the following amendment from the Committee of Ways and Means:

On page 40, section thirty-five, lines twenty-three and twenty-four, strike out the words "proper officers of the Treasury," and insert in lieu thereof the words "Commissioner of Internal Revenue;" so that the clause will read:

And there shall be further paid, after the account thereof has been rendered to and approved by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, to each collector his necessary and reasonable charges for advertising, stationery, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ELA. I move to strike out all after the word "deputies," in the third line to the end of the eleventh line, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

A salary of $1,000 per annum to be paid quarterly, and, in addition thereto, a commission of two and one half per cent. on the first $100,000, and a commission of one per cent. upon all sums above $100,000 and not exceeding $300,000, and a commission of one half of one per cent. on all sums above $300,000 and not exceeding $500,000, and one eighth of one per cent. on all sums above $500,000.

The amendment now offered, if adopted, will remove one of the great complaints now made by the payers of taxes, that there are too many persons employed and at too high pay. I am inclined to believe that while you may not much reduce the number of persons employed the expense can be reduced from twenty-five to thirty-three per cent. The compensation is now altogether out of proportion to any pay the same talent ever received before, or could again obtain in any other business. I am unable to conceive why the committee should have reduced the pay of the assessor—the officer who has to furnish the most ability and do the most work—leaving the compensation of the collector as before. The collector has always had very much higher pay than the assessor, taking into account the ability required and the duties performed. I shall probably be met by the chairman of the committee with the argument of the great responsibility and the bond of the collector for the performance of his duties.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have in mind a collector who has paid into the Treasury $1,500,000 annually—who in efficiency will compare favorably with any collector in the country—whose district has been kept comparatively free from abatements and frauds, who has told me many times he knew of no business which would pay him so well as to collect the present amount of taxes for $2,000 net; and that $2,500 for the work and furnishing the bond was liberal. Yet he has been receiving from six to seven thousand dollars net. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] may think there is no one in his State who will work so cheap. But he will recollect the longest and loudest howl over the cost of collecting taxes came from his own section—from the convention of western manufacturers—and I doubt if even his constituents, when they are selling their grain next winter for half what they are now getting, will thank him for peeling them by taxation to pay extravagant compensation to tax-gatherers.

What do we see as a consequence of paying so much more to those officers than any other business in their community will pay? When there is a vacancy fifteen or twenty candidates will start up for the office, beseeching their Representatives to aid them. They will come here bringing their influential friends with them; they settle down like a cloud over the White House and the Treasury Department, and when passed there, throng the corridors of the Senate besieging Senators, and I hope that is the worst of it. They spend from a thousand dollars to a year's salary to get the office, spreading demoralization at every step. After spending so much to get an office, the man is a marvel who will not sell himself to retain it, and get back in some way what it cost him. [Here he hammer fell.]

Mr. SCHENCK. This is a matter peculiarly for the judgment of Congress; and we of the Committee of Ways and Means are perfectly willing to submit to Congress the question as to what the compensation of these officers shall be; we have no feeling whatever about the matter.

In this section the Committee of Ways and Means have merely incorporated the provisions of the present law; those provisions have been continued, so far as the compensation of collectors is concerned. What is that compensation? It starts with $1,500 as a basis. Then three per cent. is allowed on the first $100,000, making $3,000 more; then one per cent. on the next $300,000, making $3,000 more; then one half of one per cent. on all over that amount up to $1,000,000, making $3,000 more. So that the compensation of a collector who collects $1,000,000—which is considerable more than the ordinary average—is $10,500.

Now, if that were merely the salary of an officer it would be a very large salary indeed. But what has he to do for this? He is charged with every dollar of the tax assessed; he is charged with every stamp that goes out. An account is opened with him at the Treasury, and he must either show that all the tax assessed has been collected, or he must account for that which he has not collected before a settlement is had with him and he is allowed his compensation.

And how does he collect the tax? He employs his deputies and pays them himself. He has no office-rent and no clerk hire allowed him. He takes this heavy responsibility, this contract, as it may be called. He stands charged with all this money of the Government, the amount to be obtained from the taxes within his district. And he renders an account of the transaction at his own risk.

This, therefore, is not really in the nature of a salary. In one sense it is rather payment under a contract. Although the compensation appears to be large, gentlemen must remember that, being in the nature of a contract, it is in effect an agreement entered into between him and the Government, the terms of the contract being that if he will undertake the collection of taxes at his own risk, at his own expense employing and paying his own agents to assist him, the Government will allow him a certain commission on the amount collected. That commission will amount to much according to his faithfulness; or it will amount to very little if he collects but little.

Thus far this plan has worked very well. It is true, however, as the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. ELA] says, that when one of these offices become vacant there is a swarm of candidates for the place, who pester the Representative in Congress from that district, if he happens to be on "the right side," and has any influence; or if such is not the case they pass him by and go to the White House to operate by themselves or through their friends.

But what office is there about which this cannot be said? Is there any office so contemptible, so small, that the same general remark cannot be made in regard to it? I think that is no proof of the enormous amount paid to these collectors. When we see almost the same sort of desire manifested to get possession of the most petty office in the country, we may conclude that there is something else at the bottom than the very great lucrativeness of the office itself.

Looking to the amount actually paid to the collector and that for which it is to be paid to him, which are really the only elements that ought to enter into our consideration, this is, as I have before explained, an engagement made with the officer by the Government that for a certain commission—a liberal one—he shall, at his own risk, by his own agents, at his own expense, (no expenses being allowed him, I believe, except his postage and stationery,) collect the money of the Government.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. SCHENCK. I yield to the gentleman whatever time I have remaining.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Mr. Chairman, if I remember rightly the statement made by the chairman of the committee [Mr. SCHENCK] in his argument on presenting this bill, he said that the committee anticipated—

[Here he hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] has expired.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I ask the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. ELA] to withdraw his amendment that I may renew it.

Mr. ELA. With that understanding I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I renew the amendment of the gentleman from New Hampshire.

Mr. Chairman, we have been informed by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means that, according to the anticipation of the committee, the revenues next year, should this bill go into operation, will be $65,000,000 less than they have been during the last year. Consequently the pay of the collectors will be correspondingly reduced, for the major part of their compensation depends upon the amount of collections that they make, they receiving a percentage upon all the money collected in excess of a certain amount. This matter ought to be taken into consideration in connection with any legislation by which we may fix the salaries of these officers.

Now, sir, in view of the fact that the revenues to be collected during the coming year are expected to be decreased $65,000,000 under this bill, in consequence of the reduction in taxation, it strikes me it would be but fair and just toward the collectors of internal revenue throughout the entire country that the same provision already adopted with reference to assessors should be extended so as to embrace collectors. By the provisions of this bill assessors, receiving almost as much pay as collectors, though having much less responsibility, are allowed the amount of their office rent. There is at present no such allowance to collectors. In the district, for instance, of my colleague from Chicago [Mr. Judd] the collector must pay $1,000 or $1,500 for office rent; and the case is similar in any city of large size. If the collector desires to avoid this expense he must hire a cheap office in some out-of-the-way place, much to the inconvenience of the tax-payer. I believe it would be better for the interests both of the tax-payer and of the Government to allow office rent to collectors as well as to assessors.

Whenever it shall be in order I shall offer an amendment, (which I believe would not be in order as an amendment to the amendment now pending,) to add after the word "another," in line twenty-one, the following:

Each collector shall be allowed and paid the sums actually and necessarily expended by him, with the approval of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, for office rent; but no account of such rent shall be allowed or paid until it shall have been verified in such manner as the Commissioner shall require, and shall have been audited and approved by the proper officers of the Treasury Department.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. ELA, it was not agreed to.

Mr. ELA. I move a further amendment—to strike out in the fifth line of this section the word "three" and insert "two;" so that the section will read:

That there shall be allowed to collectors, in full compensation for their services and that of their deputies, a salary of $1,500 per annum, to be paid quarterly, and, in addition thereto, a commission of two per cent. upon the first $100,000, &c.

Mr. Chairman, under this section the collector in any district where the compensation is based upon $1,000,000 will receive as his net proceeds not less than five or six thousand dollars per annum clear. Under the former practice the collector received, as I believe he still does, in addition to his salary and commissions, a percentage upon the stamps sold by him. It is no part of his duty to sell stamps. In addition to that, for traveling and doing other business, he gets fees, which are an additional compensation over and above what he gets through these other processes.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that being the case in every district where the collector shall collect $1,000,000, his pay cannot fall below $5,000, and the probability is it will run up to $6,000, a sum altogether beyond what these men can get, or ever did get, in any business they ever followed.

I hope the amendment will be adopted.

The question was taken on Mr. ELA's amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move the following amendment to the section:

Add as follows:

Each collector shall be allowed and paid the sums actually and necessarily expended by him, with the approval of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for office rent, but no account of such rent shall be allowed or paid until it shall have been verified in such manner as the Commissioner shall require, and shall have been audited and approved by the proper officers of the Treasury Department.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read the next section, as follows:

SEC. 36. And be it further enacted, That when any part of the compensation of the assessor or collector of any district shall be by commissions upon assessments or collections, and shall, in consequence of a new appointment, be due to more than one assessor or collector within the same year, such commissions shall be apportioned between such assessors or collectors; but in no case shall a greater amount of commissions be allowed than is or may be authorized by law to be allowed to one assessor or collector of that district. And the salary and commissions of assessors and collectors heretofore earned and accrued shall be adjusted, allowed, and paid in conformity to the provisions of this section, and not otherwise; but no payment shall be made to assessors or collectors on account of salaries or commissions, without the certificate of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that all reports required by law or regulation have been received, or that a satisfactory explanation has been rendered to him of the cause of delay.

Mr. KOONTZ. I move to insert in line seven after the word "collectors" the words, "in proportion to the amount assessed or collected by each respectively."

This section, it is true, Mr. Chairman, provides that the commission shall be apportioned between the assessor and the collector, but it does not provide the method by which such apportionment shall be made. It leaves it in the breast of the Secretary of the Treasury to determine in what manner this fund shall be distributed. He may do it pro rata according to the amount of each, or according to the labor each one may have performed, or according to any arbitrary rule he may set up. These assessors will be left to his mercy to dispose of what they are justly entitled to. I think the fair method of dividing between these men would be according to the amount collected by each.

Mr. SCHENCK. There has been no practical difficulty in the working of this rule. It is expressed exactly in the language of the present law, and there would be a very great objection to adopting the rule proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KOONTZ.] Suppose a collector is appointed after the 1st of March, when the general returns are made, and he proceeds to collect the tax. After remaining in office some month or two he takes the cream off and leaves all the rest to his successor. It would be a very unequal division.

The amendment of Mr. KOONTZ was disagreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 37. And be it further enacted, That each collector, on receiving from time to time any list from the assessor of his district, shall subscribe three receipts therefor, one of which receipts shall be indorsed upon a full and correct copy of such list, and be delivered by him to the assessor, to be preserved in his office, and shall be open to the inspection of any person who may apply to inspect the same, and the other two shall be made upon aggregate statements of the lists aforesaid, exhibiting the gross amount of taxes to be collected in his district, one of which aggregate statements and receipts shall be transmitted to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and the other to the First Comptroller of the Treasury.

No amendment being offered, the Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 38. And be it further enacted, That every collector shall, within twenty days after receiving the annual list of taxes from the assessor, give notice, by advertisement in one newspaper published in each county in his district, if there be any, and if not, then in a newspaper published in an adjoining county, and by notices to be posted in at least four public places in each county in his district, that the said taxes have become due and payable, and state the time and places within said county at which he or his deputy will attend to receive the same, which time shall not be less than ten days after the date of such notice, and shall send a copy of the notice by mail to each postmaster in the county, to be posted in his office. And if any person shall neglect to pay, as aforesaid, for more than ten days, it shall be the duty of the collector or his deputy to issue to such person a notice, to be left at his dwelling or usual place of business, or sent by mail, demanding the payment of his taxes, stating the amount thereof, with a fee of twenty cents for the issuing and service of such notice, and with four cents for each mile actually and necessarily traveled in serving the same. And it shall be the duty of the collector in person, or by deputy, to give notice and demand payment, in the manner last mentioned, of all taxes not included in the annual lists aforesaid, and of all taxes the collection of which is not otherwise provided for, within ten days from and after receiving the lists thereof from the assessor, or within twenty days from and after the expiration of the time within which such taxes should have been paid. If the annual or other taxes shall not be paid within ten days after such notice and demand, the collector or his deputy shall proceed to collect the said taxes and fee of twenty cents and mileage, with a penalty of five per cent, and interest at the rate of one per cent, per month on said taxes from the time the same may become due, but no interest for any fractional month shall be demanded; which collection may be made by distraint and sale of the goods, chattels, and effects, including stocks, securities, and evidences of debt of the person delinquent as aforesaid. And if any person liable to the payment of any tax shall neglect or refuse to pay the same after demand as aforesaid, the amount of such tax, together with the interest, penalties, and accruing costs, shall be a lien in favor of the United States from the time such tax was due until it is paid, upon all property real and personal belonging to such person. All persons and all officers of companies or corporations shall, on demand of a collector or deputy collector about to distraint, or having made distraint of any property for the payment of taxes, exhibit all books containing evidence or statements relating to any subject of distraint or property liable to distraint for the tax due as aforesaid.

Mr. WOOD. I move to amend by inserting after the word "aforesaid," in line thirty-nine, the words, "and after due public notice." If I understand this section correctly it gives the General Government a lien on the real estate of any delinquent taxpayer. After due notice is given by the collector, and after a certain time has elapsed if the tax-payer does not pay his real and personal property is liable to seizure and the claim of the Government becomes a lien.

Now, we will suppose that A is in Europe, and without his knowledge he has been assessed, through ignorance it may be, or perhaps willfully, with the intention to injure the absentee. He is returned to the collector by the assessor as having been assessed so much. Being absent from the country he is uninformed of the fact, and in his absence his real estate within the district becomes incumbered to the Government. A Government lien is put upon it, and the owner has no means of remedying the difficulty.

Or, on the other hand, suppose he willfully neglects to pay his tax and B comes into the market to purchase his real estate. He institutes the necessary investigation as to title, and makes the ordinary searches in the ordinary offices by which to ascertain what, if any, incumbrances rest upon that real estate. He buys it. He accepts the title. He finds nothing against it in the United States court because there is no provision here that a record shall be made of that fact. He subsequently discovers that Uncle Sam has a lien upon his real estate in pursuance of this section. Therefore I offer the amendment that it shall not be operative so far as the real estate is concerned until due public notice has been given. I think the chairman of the committee will see the propriety of accepting the amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think if the gentleman had read carefully the previous provisions of the section he would not have thought it necessary to offer that amendment. The very line in which he proposes to insert his amendment says, "after demand as aforesaid;" and the "aforesaid" provision referred to in the sixteenth and seventeenth lines declares that a notice shall be served, telling how it shall be served, and how many days shall elapse, which notice is a demand of the payment. The whole subject of demand is very fully exhibited in the section, and if you require a still further notice after that notice of demand before he can proceed, we may put off for a very long period the collection of this tax.

Mr. WOOD. My amendment requires due public notice.

The amendment was disagreed to.

The next section was read, as follows:

SEC. 39. And be it further enacted, That whenever a collector shall have on any list duly returned to him the name of any person not residing within his district who is liable to tax, or of any person so liable to tax, who, residing in said district, shall not have sufficient property therein subject to seizure or distraint from which the money due for such tax can be collected, such collector shall certify and transmit a copy or statement containing the name of the person liable to such tax, with the amount and nature thereof, to the collector of any district to which said person shall have removed, or in which he shall have property, real or personal, liable to be seized and sold for tax, and the collector of the district to whom the said certified copy or statement shall be transmitted shall proceed to collect the said tax in the same way as if the name of the person and objects of tax contained in the said certified copy or statement were on a list furnished to him by the assessor of his own collection district; and the said collector, upon receiving said certified copy or statement as aforesaid, shall transmit his receipt for it to the collector sending the same to him.

No amendments were offered, and the Clerk read the next section, as follows:

SEC. 40. And be it further enacted, That if any collector shall find, upon any list of taxes returned to him for collection, property within his district which is charged with any specific or ad valorem tax, but which is not owned, occupied, or superintended by some person known to such collector to reside or to have some place of business within the United States, and upon which the tax has not been paid within the time required by law, such collector shall forthwith take such property into his custody, and shall advertise the same, and the taxes charged thereon, in some newspaper published in his district, if any be published therein; otherwise in some newspaper in an adjoining district for the space of thirty days; and if the taxes thereon, with all charges for advertising, shall not be paid within said thirty days, such collector shall proceed to sell the same, or so much as is necessary, in the manner provided for the sale of other property distrained for the non-payment of taxes, and out of the proceeds shall satisfy all taxes charged upon such property, with the costs of advertising and selling the same. And like proceedings to those provided in the preceding section for the purchase and resale of property which cannot be sold for the amount of tax due thereon shall be had with regard to property sold under the provisions of this section. And any surplus arising from any sale herein provided for shall be paid into the Treasury, for the benefit of the owner of the property. And the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized, in any case where money shall be paid into the Treasury for the benefit of any owner of property sold as aforesaid, to repay the same, on proper proof being furnished that the person applying therefor is entitled to receive the same.

Mr. SCHENCK. I offer from the Committee of Ways and Means the following amendment:

Page 45, section forty, lines nineteen and twenty, strike out the words "in the preceding section."

The amendment was agreed to.

No further amendments being offered, the next section was read, as follows:

SEC. 41. And be it further enacted, That the gross amount of all taxes, and of all moneys for passports, penalties, forfeitures, fees, or costs, received or collected, shall be paid, by the collectors and other officers receiving or collecting the same, daily into the Treasury of the United States, under the instructions of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, without any abatement or deduction on account of salary; compensation, fees, costs, charges, expenses, or claims of any description whatever; and a certificate of such payment, stating the name of the depositor and the specific account on which the deposit was made, signed by the Treasurer or an Assistant Treasurer, designated depositary, or proper officer of a deposit bank, shall be deemed evidence of a compliance with this provision; but in any district where, from the distance of the collector or other officer from a proper Government depositary, such depositing would be inconvenient, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may extend the time for making such payment, not exceeding, however, in any case, a period of one month. The certificate of the Treasurer or an Assistant Treasurer, designated depositary, or proper officer of a deposit bank, given for any such payment, shall be in duplicate, one copy of the same to be retained by the depositor, and the other transmitted to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. And every collector or other officer shall, at the end of each month, render a true and faithful account in triplicate of all public moneys by him received and paid into the Treasury of the United States, one of which accounts he shall transmit to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, one to the Fifth Auditor of the Treasury, and retain one in his office. With the account transmitted to the Fifth Auditor he shall furnish proper vouchers to sustain the same; and the Fifth Auditor, after examination and settlement of said account, shall report the same with the vouchers to the First Comptroller for his decision thereon. It shall be the duty of such collectors of internal revenue as may be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury to act as disbursing agents of the Treasury for the payment of all expenses of assessment and collection of taxes, and other expenditures for the internal revenue service, within their respective districts, under regulations and instructions from the Secretary of the Treasury, and on giving good and sufficient bond for the faithful performance of their duties as such disbursing agents, which bond shall be in such form and conditioned in such penal sum as shall be prescribed and approved by the First Comptroller of the Treasury; but no additional compensation shall be paid to collectors for such services.

Mr. SCHENCK. I offer the following amendment from the Committee of Ways and Means:

Page 46, section forty-one, line four, strike out the word "paid," and insert in lieu thereof the word "deposited."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I also move, in line ten, to strike out the word "payment" and insert "deposit."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am also instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to offer the following amendment:

Page 47, section forty-one, strike out from and including line twenty down to and including the word "same" on line thirty-three, as follows:

Payment, not exceeding, however, in any case, one month. The certificate of the Treasurer or an Assistant Treasurer, designated depositary, or proper officer of a deposit bank, given for any such payment, shall be in duplicate, one copy of the same to be retained by the depositor, and the other transmitted to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. And every collector or other officer shall, at the end of each month, render a true and faithful account in triplicate of all public moneys by him received and paid into the Treasury of the United States, one of which accounts he shall transmit to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, one to the Fifth Auditor of the Treasury, and retain one in his office. With the account transmitted to the Fifth Auditor he shall furnish proper vouchers to sustain the same.

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

Deposit, not exceeding, however, in any case, a period of one month. The certificate of the Treasurer or an Assistant Treasurer, or designated depositary, given for any such deposit, shall be in triplicate, one to be retained by the depositor, one to be transmitted to the Secretary of the Treasury, and the other to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. And every collector or other officer shall, at the end of each month, render a true and faithful account in triplicate of all public moneys by him received and deposited as aforesaid, one of which accounts he shall transmit to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, one to the Fifth Auditor of the Treasury, and retain one in his office.

The amendment was agreed to.

No further amendments being offered, the Clerk read the next section, as follows:

SEC. 42. And be it further enacted, That every collector shall be charged with the whole amount of taxes contained in annual or other lists delivered or transmitted to him by the assessor of his own or any other district, or by any other collector, or by his predecessor in office, and with the additions thereto, with the par value of all stamps deposited with him, and with all moneys collected for passports, penalties, forfeitures, fees, or costs; and he shall be credited with all payments into the Treasury made as provided by law, with the amount of all uncollected stamps returned by him, and for which he shall produce the receipt of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and with the amount of taxes contained in the lists transmitted to other collectors, and by them received for; and also with the amount of the taxes of such persons as may have absconded or become insolvent prior to the day when the tax ought, according to the provisions of the law, to have been collected, and with all uncollected taxes transferred by him or by his deputy acting as collector to his successor in office, when it shall be proved to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and be by him certified to the First Comptroller of the Treasury, that due diligence was used by the collector for the collection of said taxes. And each collector shall also be credited with the amount of all property purchased by him for the use of the United States when he shall have faithfully accounted for and paid over the proceeds thereof upon a resale of the same as required by law. In case of the death, resignation, or removal of the collector, all lists and accounts of taxes uncollected shall be transferred to his successor in office as soon as such successor shall be appointed and qualified, and it shall be the duty of such successor to collect the same.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I move to amend that section by striking out the word "par" in the sixth line and inserting in lieu thereof the word "denominate," and by striking out the word "and" in the tenth line. The amendments are merely verbal.

The amendments were agreed to.

No further amendments being offered, the next section was read, as follows:

SEC. 43. And be it further enacted, That if any collector or other officer shall fail either to collect taxes and revenues, and to pay the same into the Treasury in the manner and at the time required by law, or to render his account as provided by law, it shall be the duty of the First Comptroller of the Treasury, immediately after evidence of such delinquency, to report the same to the Solicitor of the Treasury, who shall issue a warrant of distress against such delinquent collector or other officer, directed to the marshal of the proper district, stating therein the amount with which the said collector or other officer is chargeable, and the sums, if any, which have been paid over by him, so far as the same are ascertainable. And the said marshal shall immediately proceed to levy and collect the sum which may remain due, with five per cent. thereon, and all the expenses and charges of collection, by distress and sale of the goods and chattels or personal effects of the delinquent collector or other officer, giving at least five days' notice of the time and place of sale, in the manner provided by law for advertising sales of personal property on execution in the State wherein such collector or other officer resides. And the bill of sale of the said marshal for any goods, chattels, or other personal property distrained and sold as aforesaid, shall be conclusive evidence of title to the purchaser, and prima facie evidence of the right of the officer to make such sale, and of the correctness of his proceedings in selling the same. And for the want of goods and chattels or other personal effects of such collector or other officer sufficient to satisfy any warrant of distress, issued pursuant to the preceding section of this act, the lands and real estate of such collector or other officer, or so much thereof as may be necessary for satisfying the said warrant, after being advertised for at least three weeks in not less than three public places in the collection district, and in one newspaper printed in the county or district, if any there be, prior to the proposed time of sale, shall be sold at public auction by the marshal, who, upon such sale, shall make and deliver to the purchaser of the premises so sold a deed of conveyance therefor, to be executed and acknowledged in the manner and form prescribed by the laws of the State in which said lands are situated, which said deed so made shall invest the purchaser with all the title and interest of the said collector or other officer at the time of the seizure thereof, and the marshal shall thereupon put the purchaser in possession of the premises. And all moneys that may remain of the proceeds of such sale, after satisfying the said warrant of distress and paying the reasonable costs and charges of sale, shall be returned to the proprietor of the lands or real estate sold as aforesaid.

No amendments were offered, and the next section was read, as follows:

SEC. 44. And be it further enacted, That every collector having charge of any warehouse in which distilled spirits, tobacco, oil, or other articles are stored in bond, shall render a monthly account of all such articles to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, which account shall be examined, adjusted, and settled quarterly on the 1st days of January, April, July, and October, so as to exhibit a true statement of the liability and responsibility of every such collector on such account. In adjusting such account the collector shall be charged with all the articles which may have been deposited or received under the provisions of law, in any warehouse in his district and under his control, and shall be credited with all such articles shown to have been removed therefrom according to law, including transfers to other collectors and to his successor in office, and also whatever allowances may have been made in accordance with law to any owner of such goods or articles for leakage or other losses.

Mr. SCHENCK. I offer the following amendment from the Committee of Ways and Means:

Page 51, section forty-four, strike out from and including the word "adjusted," in line five, down to the word "October" inclusive, in line seven, as follows: "adjusted and settled quarterly on the 1st days of January, April, July, and October," and insert in lieu thereof the words "and adjusted monthly by him."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PILE. I desire to move an amendment to strike out the words "distilled spirits," in the second line; but I ask that by unanimous consent it be reserved to be voted on in case the provisions with regard to bonded warehouses for distilled spirits are all stricken out when we reach that part of the bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have no objection to that.

There was no objection, and the amendment was reserved.

No further amendments being offered to the forty-fourth section, the next section was read, as follows:

SEC. 45. And be it further enacted, That if any property, sold under process or distraint is of a kind subject to tax, and the tax thereon has not been paid, after deducting the expenses of the sale, the proceeds shall be first appropriated to the payment of said tax; but if the amount bid at the sale for such property is not equal to the amount of tax thereon, the collector may purchase the same for and in the name of the United States for a sum not exceeding the said tax; and if no assessment of tax has been made on such property the collector shall make a return thereof in form required by law, and the assessor shall assess the tax thereon. All property so purchased may be sold by said collector under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, but in no case for less than the tax assessed thereon; and the collector shall render to the Commissioner a distinct account of all charges and necessary expenses incurred in the care and sale of such property, and pay into the Treasury any surplus after defraying such charges and necessary expenses.

No amendment was offered.

The next section was read as follows:

SEC. 46. And be it further enacted, That in any case where goods, chattels, or effects sufficient to satisfy the taxes imposed by law upon any person liable to pay the same shall not be found by the collector or deputy collector whose duty it may be to collect the same, he is hereby authorized to collect the same by seizure and sale of real estate. The officer making such seizure and sale shall give notice to the person whose estate is proposed to be sold, by giving him in hand, or leaving at his last or usual place of abode, if he has any such within the collection district where said estate is situated, a notice, in writing, stating what particular estate is proposed to be sold, describing the same with reasonable certainty, and the time when and place where said officer proposes to sell the same, which time shall not be less than twenty nor more than forty days from the time of giving said notice; and the place of sale, except by special order of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, shall not be more than five miles distant from the estate seized; he shall also cause a notice to the same effect to be published in some newspaper, if there be one, within the county where such seizure is made, and posted at the post office nearest to the estate to be sold, and in two other places within the county. At the time and place appointed, the officer making such seizure shall proceed to sell the said estate at public auction, offering the same at a minimum price, including the expense of making such levy, and all charges for advertising, and an officer's fee of ten dollars. In case the real estate so seized, as aforesaid, shall consist of several distinct tracts or parcels, the officer making sale thereof shall offer each tract or parcel for sale separately, and shall, if he deem it advisable, apportion the expenses, charges, and fees, aforesaid, to such several tracts or parcels, or to any of them, in estimating the minimum price aforesaid. If no person offers for said estate the amount of said minimum price, the officer shall declare the same to be purchased by him for the United States, and shall deposit with the district attorney of the United States a deed therefor, as hereinafter specified and provided; otherwise, the same shall be declared to be sold to the highest bidder. The sale may be adjourned from time to time by said officer for not exceeding thirty days in all, if he shall think it advisable so to do. If the amount bid shall not be then and there paid, the officer shall forthwith proceed to again sell said estate in the same manner; and on the payment of the purchase-money shall give to the purchaser a certificate of purchase, which shall set forth the real estate purchased, for whose taxes the same was sold, the name of the purchaser, and the price paid therefor; and if the said real estate be not redeemed in the manner and within the time hereinafter provided, then the collector of the district shall execute to the said purchaser, upon surrender of said certificate, a deed of the real estate purchased by him aforesaid, reciting the facts set forth in said certificate, and in accordance with the laws of the State in which such real estate is situated upon the subject of sales of real estate under execution, which said deed shall be prima facie evidence of the facts therein stated; and if the proceedings of the officer as set forth have been substantially in accordance with the provisions of law, the said deed shall be considered and operate as a conveyance of all the right, title, and interest the party delinquent had in and to the real estate thus sold at the time the lien of the United States attached thereto. Any person whose estate may be proceeded against as aforesaid shall have the right to pay the amount due, together with the costs and charges thereon, to the collector or deputy collector at any time prior to the time fixed for the sale thereof, and all further proceedings shall cease from the time of such payment. The owners of any real estate sold as aforesaid, their heirs, executors, or administrators, or any person having any interest therein or a lien thereon, or any person in their behalf, shall be permitted to redeem the land sold as aforesaid, or any separate tract thereof, at any time within one year after the sale thereof, upon payment to the purchaser, or in case he cannot be found in the county in which the land to be redeemed is situated, then to the collector of the district in which the land is situated, for the use of the purchaser, his heirs or assigns, the amount paid by the said purchaser and interest thereon at the rate of twenty per cent. per annum. And any collector may, for the collection of taxes imposed upon any person, or for which any person may be liable, and committed to him for collection, seize and sell the lands of such persons situated in any other collection district within the State in which said collector resides; and his proceedings in relation thereto shall have the same effect as if the same were had in his district. It shall be the duty of every collector to keep a record of all sales of land made in his district, whether by himself or his deputies, or by another collector, in which shall be set forth the tax for which any such sale was made, the dates of seizure and sale, the name of the party assessed, and all proceedings in making said sale, the amount of fees and expenses, the name of the purchaser, and the date of deed; which record shall be certified by the officer making the sale. Any officer making sale, as aforesaid, shall return a statement of all his proceedings to the collector, and certify the record thereof; but in case of the death or removal of the collector, or the expiration of his term of office from any cause, said record shall be delivered to his successor in office; and a copy of every such record, certified by the collector of the proper district, shall be evidence in any court of the truth of the facts therein stated. When any lands sold, as aforesaid, shall be redeemed as hereinbefore provided, the collector shall make an entry of the fact upon the record aforesaid, and the said entry shall be evidence of such redemption. If any property seized and sold under the provisions of this section shall not be sufficient to satisfy the claim of the United States against the person owning the same or having an interest therein, the collector may thereafter, and as often as the same may be necessary, proceed to seize and sell, in like manner, any other property liable to seizure of such person until the amount due from him, together with all expenses, shall be fully paid.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend the clause, "the officer making such seizure shall proceed to sell the estate at public auction, offering the same at a minimum price, including the expense of such levy," by striking out the word "including" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "which shall be all."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to further amend the section, in the clause, "if the amount bid shall not be then and there paid, the officer shall forthwith proceed to again sell said estate in the same manner," by striking out the words "sell said estate" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "offer said estate for sale."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to further amend the section, near the end, by striking out the word "every" and inserting the word "any," in the clause which now reads, "and a copy of every such record, certified by the collector of the proper district, shall be evidence in any court of the truth of the facts therein stated."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WOOD. I move to strike out this entire section as amended. I am opposed to a provision of this character in any tax bill, or to a principle of this kind being incorporated in any law of Congress.

So far we have left real estate to be exempt from the operation of the penalties for the non-payment of taxes. Indeed, we have left the homestead exempt from any taxation whatever. But under the operation of this section a homestead, although it may be exempt from all other claims if not valued over a certain sum, is liable to seizure and confiscation for the non-payment of any tax upon any trade, employment, or occupation of the owner.

Sir, there is nothing so important and yet so delicate as the title to real estate. There is nothing in this country to which the people attach so much importance as they do to the right which the homestead laws give them to be exempt from any penalty by the action of the Government, so far as that homestead right may go.

But how will it be under the operation of this section? Whenever the owner of a homestead meets with misfortune in his ordinary business, becomes bankrupt and utterly unable to pay the taxes which may accrue upon the ordinary products of his business, when he returns to his homestead at night, which under our laws is exempt from all liabilities of this character, he finds it in the hands of the collector or deputy collector who becomes one of the most important officers in the revenue service.

Mr. UPSON. Are not all homesteads liable to taxation and sale?

Mr. WOOD. Not liable to seizure and summary sale.

Mr. UPSON. Yes, all the time.

Mr. WOOD. They can be sold for taxes that accrue upon the land itself.

Mr. UPSON. Yes.

Mr. WOOD. But they are not liable for taxes which accrue upon the ordinary business or occupation of the owners.

Mr. MAYNARD. It is for this Committee of the Whole to decide whether the law shall be retained as it now exists. This has for a long time been a feature in the internal revenue law. The section is a mere reenactment of the present law with merely verbal changes to make some things clearer, as any one can see by referring to section nine of the act of July, 1866. Now, I submit that people who can afford to have homesteads can also afford to pay taxes. It would be a very singular thing, indeed, if those who own real estate, own what is called a homestead, should be exempt from the payment of taxes upon it; for the position of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] amounts to that. The owner of the homestead, according to that, has only to keep his personal property out of the reach of the law, and then he can snap his fingers at the collector.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The gentleman will allow me to inquire whether this bill does not in fact propose to make a lien those taxes which accrue in general business—which accrue, for instance, upon the sales of the merchant? Do not the committee propose to make such taxes a lien upon the homestead, so that, in disregard of the interests of the wife and children, it may be sold for taxes accruing in general business? That is the feature to which, as I understand, the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] objects; and it seems to me the objection is very reasonable.

Mr. MAYNARD. The language of this section corresponds with the language of the existing law.

The present law provides—

"That in any case where goods, chattels, or effects sufficient to satisfy the taxes imposed by law upon any person liable to pay the same shall not be found by the collector or deputy collector, he is authorized to collect the same by seizure and sale of real estate."

This affects neither the wife nor the children. The poor man who happens to have no homestead, who resides on rented property, the man who has not sufficient means to own the place upon which he resides with his wife and children, is liable, according to the proposition of the gentleman from New York, to have all his property taken, while the man who is domiciled in his own mansion may bid defiance to the authorities of the law. He can carry on his business to the amount of thousands of dollars, in such a way and under such guise that the collector cannot lay his hands upon any property which shall be liable for taxes. He may carry on business, for example, as a claim agent or a commercial broker or a lottery dealer, in such a way that the business affords nothing tangible for the collector to seize; yet that man may retire into his costly mansion, his Fifth avenue palace, and bid defiance to the revenue laws of the country. I cannot see the propriety or the justice of any such proceeding; and it strikes me that it would not be wise for us to sanction it by our laws. I think the amendment ought not to be adopted, but that the law should be permitted to stand precisely as it has stood for a long time.

On agreeing to the amendment of Mr. WOOD, there were—ayes 16, noes 60; no quorum voting.

The Chairman, under the rules ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. WOOD and Mr. MAYNARD.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes twenty-one, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend by adding to the pending section the following proviso:

Provided, however, That property, real or personal, exempt by the law of the State, where the seizure thereof shall be made from sale on execution shall be exempt from sale under the provisions of this act, except for tax originally assessed thereon under the provisions of this act.

Mr. Chairman, while I think that property upon which tax is actually assessed ought to be liable for the payment of the tax, yet it seems to me that in our legislation on this subject it is wise for us to follow the policy marked out in the homestead laws of almost all the States, and exempt the homestead from liability for any other taxes than those actually assessed against it. Why should the homestead, which, according to the general policy of our laws is regarded as specially reserved for the benefit of the wife and children, be made liable to sale for taxes not levied against that particular property?

There is in this respect a manifest difference between the taxes assessed by the General Government and those assessed by the various States. The taxes assessed by the States are charged simply upon the property itself, and that property, in case of default, is sold simply to pay the taxes charged against it. Under the United States laws a merchant or a distiller, for instance, may, in the conduct of his business, render himself liable for a large amount of tax, and according to the bill before us that tax may be collected by the sale of his homestead, which, by the laws of most of the States, is protected for the benefit of the wife and children. It would be in conformity with the spirit of our legislation in almost all the States to exempt specially from sale the homestead, against which, ordinarily, no tax whatever would be assessed by the General Government.

Mr. MAYNARD. The amendment of the gentleman, from the form in which he has presented it, is, I believe, objectionable. It is, that whatever is exempted from execution under the law of any State, shall be exempted from sale for taxes. We know there is great diversity in that regard. Some States exempt more than others do. Some exempt the homestead, and others do not. Some exempt sub modo, and others absolute. So the Federal laws would operate differently in the different parts of the country, and they would be subject to Federal legislation.

Then, again, it would permit a man, by getting into what he called a homestead, to carry on any of that kind of business to which I referred a moment ago.

There is another thing I think the gentleman will consider. The construction in these States where property is exempted from execution as against individual claims, is that it is not exempted from restraint for taxes. I think we had better leave the law as it is. I am not aware there is any complaint. We have had no petitions for its repeal, and we have had on almost every other subject.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move in lines fifty-five, fifty-six, and fifty-seven, to strike out the words "if the proceedings of the officer as set forth have been substantially in accordance with the provisions of law," and to insert in line fifty-eight, after the word "operate" the words "prima facie," so it will read:

If the amount bid shall not be then and there paid, the officer shall forthwith proceed to again sell said estate in the same manner; and on the payment of the purchase money shall give to the purchaser a certificate of purchase, which shall set forth the real estate purchased, for whose taxes the same was sold, the name of the purchaser, and the price paid therefor; and if the said real estate be not redeemed in the manner and within the time hereinafter provided, then the collector of the district shall execute to the said purchaser, upon surrender of said certificate, a deed of the real estate purchased by him aforesaid, reciting the facts set forth, in said certificate, and in accordance with the laws of the State in which said real estate is situated upon the subject of sales of real estate under execution, which said deed shall be prima facie evidence of the facts therein stated; and the said deed shall be considered and operate prima facie as a conveyance of all the right, title, and interest the party delinquent had in and to the real estate thus sold at the time the lien of the United States attached thereto. Any person, whose estate may be proceeded against as aforesaid, shall have the right to pay the amount due, together with the costs and charges thereon, to the collector or deputy collector at any time prior to the time fixed for the sale thereof, and all further proceedings shall cease from the time of such payment. The owners of any real estate sold as aforesaid, their heirs, executors, or administrators, or any person having any interest therein, or a lien thereon, or any person in their behalf, shall be permitted to redeem the land sold as aforesaid, or any separate tract thereof, at any time within one year after the sale thereof, &c.

Mr. Chairman, if real estate is to be sold we have to get a purchaser, and in order to induce anybody to buy land at a marshal's sale you have got to give the purchaser, in accordance with the laws of the various States, a deed, which is a prima facie evidence of title. It must be held as prima facie evidence of title, or else you will get nobody to buy. Whenever it shall be assailed the onus probandi must be upon the assailing party to show that the proceedings were not proper.

Now, as I construe the language of the bill, it throws the burden of proof upon the purchaser or the grantee, and not upon the party who seeks to void the deed. Let me read the bill as it is:

And if the proceedings of the officer as set forth have been substantially in accordance with the provisions of law the said deed shall be considered and operate as a conveyance of all the right, title, and interest the party delinquent had in and to the real estate thus sold at the time the lien of the United States attached thereto.

Now, by that language the party claiming under its deed must show that all the proceedings, in all respects, have been according to law. If you strike out the words I have indicated then the deed is prima facie evidence of title to any real estate that is sold.

Mr. HOLMAN. It seems to me, from the language of the bill, that the deed is now prima facie evidence of all that it recites. It is to be taken as such for what it substantially recites. Therefore the party that assails the deed must overturn that prima facie case. The word "substantial" has great significance.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Then I cannot answer that question.

Mr. MAYNARD. The facts and proceedings as substantially recited in the deed are to be taken as prima facie evidence and can only be countervailed by rebutting testimony. The deed is to convey the delinquent's title to the purchaser, and is to be taken as prima facie evidence that all the proceedings have been in accordance with law. To disprove that evidence is with the other side.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I wish to say in reply to the gentleman—

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted unless the gentleman from Tennessee yields the balance of his time.

Mr. MAYNARD. I yield it to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. INGERSOLL. What I want to say is this: in an action for ejectment if the purchaser has a deed from the Government under Government sale, will that show that the proceedings of the officer have been in accordance with law?

Mr. MAYNARD. Suppose a purchaser at a sale finds somebody in possession and brings an action of ejectment, showing a title in the delinquent, and then brings a deed from the collector to himself which recites a compliance with the provisions of the law respecting such sales, then, unless the delinquent shows by evidence which he introduces that the recitals of the deed are true, is he not entitled to possession?

Mr. INGERSOLL. With this exception: the deed will never recite that the proceedings of the officer have been regular. I now yield to the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. POLAND. I will propose an amendment that will satisfy both the gentlemen. I move to insert in line fifty-five the words "and of the regularity of the officer's proceeding;" so that it will read, "which said deed shall be prima facie evidence of the facts therein stated and of the regularity of the officer's proceeding."

Mr. PAINE. Suppose it should happen that the facts set forth in the deed are entirely inconsistent with the alleged regularity of the proceedings, then what? The amendment still makes the deed prima facie evidence of the regularity of the proceedings.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] accept the amendment?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I do.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I move in line seventy-seven to strike out "twenty" and insert "fifty." I suppose the object of this is to secure a purchaser for this real estate. The party has one year in which to redeem, by paying twenty per cent. upon the purchase money. I take it that that is entirely inadequate to secure a purchaser. In many localities it is nothing more than the interest on the money, and no person will invest his money with the uncertainty attending all tax sales with but twenty per cent. per annum held out to him as an inducement so to invest. The law of some States gives one hundred per cent., and that, in a large number of instances, does not secure purchasers of delinquent lands. Unless you offer more than twenty per cent. for one year's investment you will find no purchasers.

Mr. BENTON. Mr. Chairman, I had already drawn an amendment to strike out the word twenty and insert fifteen, but after consultation with the chairman of the committee I concluded I would not offer it. But it seems to me that the amendment now proposed by the gentleman from Missouri is very unreasonable. This provision is intended, as I understand it, to provide for many cases where there is no fault on the part of the delinquent—where the delinquency occurs through misfortune—perhaps on account of absence from the country. Now, to impose such a monstrous rate of interest as fifty per cent. it seems to me would be outrageous. Twenty per cent. is a very large rate in most parts of the country. In the West the interest is much higher. In Boston, where money is plenty, three or four per cent. is a frequent rate.

Mr. MAYNARD. What rate is allowed in New Hampshire in a case of this kind?

Mr. BENTON. Where land is sold for taxes the rate is twelve per cent. in my State.

Mr. BENJAMIN. In Missouri the rate is one hundred per cent., and in nine cases out of ten the land finds no purchaser.

Mr. BENTON. That may explain in some degree why things are so deranged there. They allow such unreasonable liens that all the property that can be gathered together is put in a homestead, and then under the high rate of interest they want more money. No wonder they want more greenbacks issued here. [Laughter.]

The amendment of Mr. BENJAMIN was disagreed to.

No further amendments being offered, the next section was read, as follows:

SEC. 47. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall have charge of all real estate which has been or shall be assigned, set off, or conveyed, by purchase or otherwise, to the United States, in payment of debts arising under the laws relating to internal revenue, and of all trusts created for the use of the United States, in payment of such debts; and may sell and dispose of any such lands at public auction upon giving not less than twenty days' notice of such sales; and in cases where real estate has already become the property of the United States by conveyance or otherwise, in payment of or as security for a debt arising under the laws relating to internal revenue, and such debt shall have been paid, together with the interest thereon, at the rate of twenty per cent. per annum, to the United States, within two years from the date of the acquisition of such real estate, it shall be lawful for the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to release by deed, or otherwise convey, such real estate to the debtor from whom it was taken, or to his heirs or other legal representatives.

No amendments were proposed, and the Clerk read the forty-eighth section, as follows:

SEC. 48. And be it further enacted, That in all cases of collection by distraint it shall be the duty of the officer charged with the collection to cause a notice to be published forthwith in some newspaper within the county wherein said distraint is made, if there be a newspaper published in said county, or to be publicly posted at the post office, if there be one within five miles, nearest to the residence of the person whose property has been distrained, and in not less than two other public places, which notice shall specify the articles distrained and the time and place for the sale thereof, which time shall not be less than ten nor more than twenty days after the publication or posting of such notice, and after the notice given to the owner or possessor of the property as hereinafter provided, and the place for such sale shall not be more than five miles from the place of making such distraint; and it shall be the duty of such officer to make or cause to be made an account of the goods, chattels, and effects distrained, a copy of which, signed by the officer making the distraint, with a note of the sum demanded, and the time and place fixed for the sale shall be left with the owner or possessor of such goods, chattels, and effects, or at his usual residence or place of business, with some person of suitable age and discretion, if any such can be there found. And such sale may be adjourned from time to time at the discretion of said officer, but not for a time exceeding in the aggregate thirty days. In case of any distraint for the payment of taxes, the goods, chattels, and effects distrained shall be restored to the owner or possessor if payment of the amount due, together with the fees and other charges, shall be made, prior to the sale, to the officer charged with the collection thereof; but in case of non-payment, as aforesaid, the said officer shall proceed to sell the said goods, chattels, and effects at public auction, and shall retain from the proceeds of such sale the amount due to the United States, and a commission of five per cent. thereon for his own use, together with the fees and charges for distraint and sale, rendering any surplus to the person who may be entitled to receive the same. In any case where property distrained for taxes may not be divisible, so as to enable the collector, by a sale of part thereof, to obtain the whole amount of the tax, with all costs, charges, and commissions, the whole of such property shall be sold, and the surplus of the proceeds of the sale, after satisfying the tax, costs, and charges, shall be paid to the person legally entitled to receive the same, or if he refuse to receive the same or cannot be found, then such surplus shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States, to be held for the use of the person legally entitled to receive the same, until he shall make application therefor to the Secretary of the Treasury, who, upon such application, and satisfactory proofs in support thereof, shall by warrant on the Treasury, cause the same to be paid to such person. And in all cases of sale as aforesaid the certificate of such sale shall be transferred to the purchaser all right, title, and interest of the delinquent tax-payer, in and to the property sold, and shall be prima facie evidence of the right of such officer to make the sale, and conclusive evidence of the regularity of his proceedings; and where such property shall consist of stock such certificate of sale shall be notice, when received, to any corporation, company, or association, of said transfer, and shall be authority to such corporation, company, or association to record the same on their books and records in the same manner as is transferred, or assigned by the person or party holding such stock in lieu of any original or prior certificate, which after that time shall be void, whether canceled or not. And any such certificate of sale, where the subject of sale shall be securities or other evidences of debt, shall be a good and valid receipt to the person holding the same as against any person holding or claiming to hold possession of such securities or other evidences of debt: Provided, That there shall be exempt from distraint and sale the school-books and necessary wearing apparel for the family, arms for personal use, one cow, two hogs, five sheep, and the wool thereof, the aggregate market value of said sheep not to exceed fifty dollars, the necessary food for such cow, hogs, and sheep for a period not exceeding thirty days, fuel to an amount not greater in value than twenty-five dollars, provisions to an amount not greater in value than fifty dollars, household furniture kept for use to an amount not greater in value than three hundred dollars, and the books, tools, or implements of trade or profession to an amount not greater in value than one hundred dollars; and the officer making the distraint shall summon three disinterested householders of the vicinity, who shall appraise and set apart to the owner any property herein declared to be exempt.

Mr. POLAND. In lines fifty-six and fifty-seven of that section on page 60 I move to strike out the words "conclusive evidence," so as to correspond with the amendment made in the other section and make it prima facie evidence of the right of the officer to make the sale and of the regularity of his proceedings.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move to insert on page 61, after the word "dollars" in line eighty-one, the following:

And the team and wagon with proper harness and tackle by which any teamster or laboring man habitually earns his living.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. ROSS. I move to insert in line seventy-one the words "a homestead not exceeding in value $1,000."

Mr. Chairman, this is a provision which has been favored by the Legislatures of most of the States in this Union. It prevails in my own State and I think in most of the States, and I know of no reason why, in collecting duties in behalf of the Government of the United States, the same humane and just rule should not prevail that has been adopted in the various States. For my own part I am not willing to give my sanction or my vote in favor of depriving a family of their homestead for any debt due to individuals or to the State or national Governments. I hope, therefore, that a provision of this sort will be incorporated in the bill. It is just and wise and humane.

Mr. PILE. Are homesteads exempted from sale for taxes in the State of Illinois?

Mr. ROSS. Not for taxes upon the homestead, but from sale for all other duties. I do not propose to exempt the homestead from sale for taxes imposed on it by the United States Government, but we have assessed no tax whatever upon homesteads, and I trust we never will impose such a tax in behalf of the Government of the United States.

This amendment is in accordance with the wise and humane policy which has been inaugurated by the Legislatures of the different States, and there is no good reason, in my judgment, why on account of the misfortunes of the husband and father, the homestead should be taken from the wife and children. I hope my amendment will be adopted.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would merely remark that if a man has nothing but his homestead, he will not be troubled at all, because he will have no tax to pay. If he has other property upon which to pay taxes, then the homestead ought not to be exempted. I hope the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. ROSS. I suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee, that he might be an officer of the Government of the United States and have a tax assessed upon him which would take the homestead from his family.

The question was taken on Mr. Ross's amendment, and it was disagreed.

No further amendment being proposed to the forty-eighth section, the next section was read, as follows:

SEC. 49. And be it further enacted, That all the officers of internal revenue shall be, and hereby are, authorized to perform all the duties relating to the assessment and collection of any direct taxes imposed, or which may be imposed, by law in all cases where the payment of such tax has not been assumed by the State, except within those districts within any State which have been or may be otherwise especially provided for by law. But no direct tax whatsoever shall be assessed or collected under this or any other act of Congress heretofore passed until Congress shall enact another law requiring such assessment and collection to be made; but this shall not be construed to repeal or postpone the assessment or collection of the first direct tax levied, or which should be levied, under the act entitled "An act to provide increased revenue from imports, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1861, nor in any way to affect the legality of said tax or any process or remedy provided in said acts, or any other acts, for the enforcement or collection of the same in any State; but said first tax, and any such process or remedy, shall continue in all respects in force, anything in this act to the contrary notwithstanding.

No amendment was offered.

The next section was read, as follows:

SEC. 50. And be it further enacted, That if, for any cause, at any time, in any part of the United States, the laws cannot be executed, it shall be the duty of the President, and he is hereby authorized, to proceed to execute the provisions of this act within such portion of the United States so soon as the authority of the United States shall be reestablished therein, and to collect the taxes in such States, under the regulations prescribed in this act, so far as applicable; and where not applicable the assessment and levy shall be made, and the time and manner of collection regulated by the instructions and directions of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue; and for the purposes of this act all territory and Indian reservations shall be taken and held to be a part of the United States.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to move to amend this section by adding to it the following:

And all goods, wares, and merchandise manufactured or produced within such reservations or Territory shall be held subject to tax as if manufactured within a collection district, and the tax upon such goods, wares, and merchandise shall be and continue a lien upon the same in the hands of all persons whomsoever; and when such goods, wares, or merchandise shall have been removed from the Indian territory or reservation in which they have been manufactured the assessor or assistant assessor of any collection district wherein they may be found shall immediately assess the tax due thereon, and shall, without delay, return the same to the collector or deputy collector, who shall demand and receive of the owner or person in charge or custody thereof the amount of the tax so assessed, unless evidence of the previous payment of such tax shall be produced under such regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall prescribe.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the word "Indian," and inserting the word "any" before the word "Territory."

Mr. SCHENCK. That will not accomplish the object the gentleman apparently has in view.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Why not?

Mr. SCHENCK. Because the law now extends over Territories as over States. But the department has decided that whisky and other articles manufactured on Indian reservations cannot be reached.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

The amendment of Mr. SCHENCK was then agreed to.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. I move to further amend this section by striking out the words, "so soon as the authority of the United States shall be reestablished therein." I know of no portion of the United States where the authority of the United States does not exist by virtue of law.

Mr. MAYNARD. There are some Indian people who are giving us a heap of trouble just now.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. I know of no Indian people within the territory of the United States.

The question was then taken upon the amendment of Mr. VAN TRUMP; and upon a division there were—ayes 10, noes 54; no quorum voting.

Mr. SCHENCK. In order that the committee may not be broken up for want of a quorum, I ask unanimous consent that this amendment be regarded as agreed to, and we can take a vote upon it in the House.

No objection was made, and the amendment was accordingly agreed to.

No further amendment was offered.

The next section was read, as follows:

SEC. 51. And be it further enacted, That all goods, wares, merchandise, articles, or objects, on which taxes are imposed, which shall be found in the possession or custody, or within the control of any person, for the purpose of being sold or removed by such person in fraud of the internal revenue laws, or with design to evade the payment of said taxes, may be seized by the collector or a deputy collector, or by the assessor or an assistant assessor, of the proper district, and forfeited to the United States; and also all raw materials found in the possession of any person intending to manufacture the same into articles of a kind subject to tax, for the purpose of fraudulently selling such manufactured articles, or with design to evade the payment of said tax; and also all tools, implements, instruments, and personal property whatsoever, in the place or building, or within any yard or inclosure, where such articles or such raw materials shall be found, may also be seized and forfeited as aforesaid; and the proceedings to enforce said forfeiture shall be in the nature of a proceeding in rem in the circuit or district court of the United States for the district where such seizure is made, or in any other court of competent jurisdiction. And any person who shall have in his custody or possession any such goods, wares, merchandise, articles, or objects, subject to tax as aforesaid, for the purpose of selling the same with the design of evading payment of the taxes imposed thereon, shall be liable to a penalty of $500, or not less than double the amount of said taxes. The goods, wares, merchandise, articles, or objects which shall be so seized may, at the option of the collector or assessor, be delivered to the marshal of said district, and remain in his care and custody until he shall obtain possession by process of law; and the costs of seizure made before process issues shall be taxable by the court.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move to amend the second sentence of this section by striking out at the close of it the words "or not less than double the amount of said taxes," and inserting in lieu thereof the words, "and where such taxes amount to more than $250 such fine shall be double the amount of tax."

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not object to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I move to further amend the second sentence of this section by inserting the words "or have actually sold or transferred" before the words "any such goods, wares, merchandise, articles, or objects." This section imposes a penalty upon any person having in his possession property liable to taxation, for the purpose of evading the payment of the tax. But it does not now make any provision for the case of a person who has actually sold or transferred it for that purpose. Hence my amendment seems to be necessary in order to carry out the idea the Committee of Ways and Means seem to have in view.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman will find that any goods which have been removed on any account whatever are liable.

Mr. BENJAMIN. This proposes a penalty upon the person removing them.

Mr. MAYNARD. I suggest to the gentleman that his amendment in the terms in which he has put it will render the phraseology of the section scarcely proper. It would read, I believe—

"Any person who shall have in his custody or possession any such goods for the purpose of selling the same, with the design of evading the payment," &c.

The gentleman should propose his amendment at some subsequent place.

Mr. SCHENCK. The matter is provided for in the next section.

The amendment of Mr. BENJAMIN was not agreed to.

No further amendment being offered,

The next section was read as follows:

SEC. 52. And be it further enacted, That in case any goods or commodities on which any tax is imposed, or any materials, utensils, or vessels, proper or intended to be made use of for or in the making of such goods or commodities shall be removed, or shall be deposited, or concealed in any place, with intent to defraud the United States of such tax, or any part thereof, such goods and commodities, and such materials, utensils, and vessels, respectively, shall be forfeited; and in every case where any goods or commodities shall be forfeited under the internal revenue laws, every cask, vessel, case or other package containing, or having contained, or intended to contain, such goods or commodities, respectively, and every vessel, boat, cart, carriage, or other conveyance, and all horses or other animals used in the removal or for the deposit or concealment thereof, shall be forfeited; and every person who shall remove, deposit, or conceal, or be concerned in removing, depositing, or concealing any such goods or commodities with intent to defraud the United States of the tax or any part thereof, shall be fined not less than $100 nor more than $5,000, and be imprisoned not less than three months nor more than two years.

Mr. SCHENCK. On behalf of the Committee of Ways and Means, I move to amend by striking out after the word "respectively," in line eight of the section just read, the words, "shall be forfeited; and in every case where any goods or commodities shall be forfeited under the internal revenue laws," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "together with."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move further to amend this section by striking out in line fourteen the words "horses or other animals," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "animals and other property."

The amendment was agreed to.

No further amendment being offered, the next section was read as follows:

SEC. 53. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is hereby authorized, on appeal to him made within fifteen months from the date of assessment thereof, to remit all taxes erroneously or illegally assessed, and to refund by requisition on the Treasury all taxes erroneously or illegally collected; such power to remit and refund to extend to moneys assessed or collected as penal tax in cases where an assessor or assistant assessor has or shall have added such penal tax to the assessment, and the Commissioner shall be of opinion that this addition was improper. The Commissioner shall also have power, upon such appeal being made to him as aforesaid, to refund in like manner all fines or penalties collected without authority, or collected in cases where the tax shall have been refunded under the power herein given: Provided, That where a second assessment has been or may hereafter be made in case of a return which, in the opinion of the assessor or assistant assessor, was fraudulent, or contained any understatement or undervaluation, such assessment shall not be remitted, nor shall taxes collected under such assessment be recovered or refunded, unless it is proved that said return was not fraudulent; and if such proof shall be furnished, the sum remitted or refunded shall not include the amount, if any, assessed or collected in consequence of understatement or undervaluation. The circuit and district courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction in all cases at law or in equity arising under the internal revenue laws. But no suit shall be maintained in any court for the recovery of any tax alleged to have been erroneously or illegally collected, until such appeal shall have been duly made to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and a decision of said Commissioner had thereon, and no such suit shall be maintained in any court unless brought within six months from the time of such decision; but if the decision shall be delayed more than six months from the date of appeal, then suit may be brought at any time within twelve months from the date of such appeal. No suit for the purpose of restraining the assessment or collection of tax shall be maintained in any court.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend the section just read, by striking out in lines twenty-three and twenty-four, the words "assessed or collected in consequence of," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "which should have been assessed or collected had there been no;" so that the clause will read:

And if such proof shall be furnished, the sum remitted or refunded shall not include the amount, if any, which should have been assessed or collected had there been no understatement or undervaluation.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I desire to offer an amendment to which I think there will be no opposition by the committee. It is to insert after the word "suit" in line thirty-six, the words "commenced after March 2, 1867;" so that the last sentence of the section will read:

No suit commenced after March 2, 1867, for the purpose of restraining the assessment or collection of tax shall be maintained in any court.

There was no such provision as this in our internal revenue law until March 2, 1867, when the provision of this section, in substantially the same words, was incorporated in the law by way of amendment. There being before that time no such provision, of course, any person against whom the tax was assessed might, if he believed himself legally exempt, bring his suit to try that question by way of injunction in the courts of the United States. Now, I happen to know that while such was the law, while it was proper for parties to bring their suits in that way, a suit was brought to try a very important question under the revenue law. Not only was the question important, but the amount involved was considerable. The parties brought their suit by bill in the circuit court of the United States, and they brought it in the form of an injunction.

Of course, having brought their suit in that way, it was incumbent upon them to file a bond with good and sufficient security that, if the suit was declared against them, they would pay the tax that was claimed. I have good reason to believe that amendment, slipped in during a night session of the Senate, was for the purpose of affecting that suit.

I understand that all laws in relation to remedies ought to be prospective in operation.

Every lawyer of the House understands that when a law is passed affecting the forms of remedies, it is not retrospective unless it is so provided in its terms and requires that construction. Congress has uniformly, in all the laws it has ever passed of this kind, permitted parties to avail themselves of their rights under the law as it stood, that is that existing suits should be saved from the operation of the new law.

I believe this amendment was introduced for the purpose of cutting up these parties in the remedies they had, and, so far as I know, it will not affect any other parties in the United States than the parties to that suit, and I appeal to the House to say whether it is not just to these parties to let their suit go on, instead of compelling them to bring a new suit, when they have given abundant security that if the suit shall be decided against them, the judgment shall be paid?

Mr. HOLMAN. It seems to me that the argument of the gentleman from Vermont is a strong one against this whole bill. I do not think the Government of the United States should seek this advantage over the citizen. They seize his property, compel him to pay taxes, and then when wrong has been done him he has to come all the way here to have refunded the money unjustly taken from him. And when he does recover it he only gets back the amount taken from him, and for all the time that he has lost, for the expense that he has been put to, there is not one cent of damages paid to him by the Government. I say that the Government of the United States ought not to ask such a thing of the citizens of the United States. It ought not to inflict these outrages and wrongs upon the citizens of the United States without granting them ample remedies. I do not believe there is a Government in which lingers any regard for individual rights which would assume to close the courts of the Government against the rights of the citizens, against his protection from wrong and injustice. It is the first time, so far as I am aware of, that in any act of Congress distrust of the courts of the country has been manifested. The Government, with all this extraordinary power, is not to be restrained by the courts. As I have already said, I think the gentleman's speech is a forcible argument against the whole provision. The Federal courts should be open at all times to protect the citizen from wrong and injustice.

Mr. MAYNARD. It is here as with the collection of duties on imports. The duties are collected, it may be under protest, and then a suit can be brought for the recovery of any duties levied illegally. The gentleman, I am sure, would not encourage any man in the evasion of payment of taxes.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly not, if the courts are open for him to procure an injunction.

The question was taken on Mr. POLAND'S amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to strike out the last sentence of the section.

Mr. SCHENCK. I understand that some privileged questions are to be presented to the House, and I now move that the committee rise.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 67, noes 31.

Mr. RANDALL demanded tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. POMEROY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 1060) to reduce into one act and to amend the laws relating to internal taxes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ADMISSION OF ARKANSAS.

Mr. BEAMAN. I rise to make a privileged report.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House, No. 1039, to admit the State of Arkansas to representation in Congress, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment to the House bill, and agree to said bill with the following amendment added thereto:

Under laws equally applicable to all the inhabitants of said State; Provided, That any alteration of said constitution prospective in its effect, may be made in regard to the time and place of residence of voters, and that the House agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the preamble to the bill, and agree to the same.

THADDEUS STEVENS,

F. C. BEAMAN,

Managers on the part of the House.

LYMAN TRUMBULL,

C. D. DRAKE,

HENRY WILSON,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the reading of the bill as amended.

The SPEAKER. That cannot be done except by unanimous consent.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move to lay the report on the table.

On laying the report on the table there were—ayes 20, noes 70; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Messrs. ELDRIDGE and BEAMAN.

CONTRACTORS FOR IRON-CLAD VESSELS.

On motion of Mr. HENDRICKS, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 307) for the relief of certain Government contractors, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. GRIMES, to insert after the word "dollars," in line fifteen, the words "to Harlan & Hollingsworth, the sum of $38,513;" so as to make the bill read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Secor & Co., and Prime, Secor & Co., the sum of $115,539 01; to Harrison Loring, $38,513; to the Atlantic Iron Works, of Boston, Massachusetts, $4,852 58; to Aquilla Adams, the sum of $4,852 58; to M. F. Merritt, the sum of $4,852 58; to Tomlinson, Haterpee & Co., $15,171; to Harlan & Hollingsworth, the sum of $38,513; and to Poole & Hunt, the sum of $3,694 81, being the amount found to be due to each of the parties herein respectively named by the Secretary of the Navy under an act of Congress entitled "An act for the relief of certain contractors for the construction of vessels of war and steam machinery," approved March 2, 1867.

Mr. CORBETT. I ask if there is any provision that this allowance shall be in full of the claims of these parties?

Mr. HENDRICKS. This is a bill that was reported by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs before he was called away. It has been carefully considered by that committee; and the present acting chairman, the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY,] and myself, were desired by the committee to call it up in the absence of the chairman. There is not a provision that this shall be in full, for the reason that there are certain other vessels that were constructed by some of these parties, and they desire, in regard to those other vessels for which no provision is made in this bill, that they may go with their cases to the Court of Claims, under the bill reported by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. DRAKE.] One of these firms constructed five or seven vessels, perhaps more, losing on all of them. An allowance was made by the board on two or three of them, not allowing anything on some three or four of the vessels constructed by them. Therefore the committee did not provide that no further allowance should be made, because the committee was of opinion that it was fair to allow them in regard to those other vessels to go before the Court of Claims as in other cases.

I will state to the Senate that this bill is reported under the act of March 2, 1867, which provided for a board to examine these cases on certain established rules, and the allowance has been made to these parties under that act. The bill is simply an affirmation of the allowance that has been made. In my judgment, the allowance is not one half what the parties were really entitled to, but the probability is that they cannot get more.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, my attention is just called to this bill this moment. It is some time since I have seen it or heard of it, and I have forgotten just what my impressions were about it when I last knew it. I am not entirely sure now whether the bill before the Senate is the one to pay an award that was made under the act of 1867 or whether it is a bill to refer other claims to the Court of Claims.

Mr. HENDRICKS. This is a bill to pay the award simply.

Mr. HOWE. Very well; then I believe I have no objection to that, as near as I can remember. There were two bills.

Mr. HENDRICKS. This is to pay the award; the other bill will be for the consideration of the Senate when called up.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, that we may understand this all alike, will the Senator from Indiana tell us whether this bill is to pay the awards treating the awards as a finality, or whether the bill itself implies that after the awards are paid the same claims upon which the awards have been made are to be further adjudicated?

Mr. HENDRICKS. In regard to the particular vessels, where allowances have been made by this board, I regard the award as a finality, and I should not hesitate to say that the Court of Claims would be required to regard it as a finality; but when Congress has made provision for them, of course the Court of Claims would not have any jurisdiction of those particular vessels. But in the case of one or two contractors, they constructed other vessels that were not before the board; and if it is the pleasure of Congress to allow the contractors to go before the Court of Claims, I suppose that in regard to those vessels not provided for in this bill at all we have the right to allow them to go.

Mr. CONKLING. Then, if the Senator will allow me a little further, the act of March, 1867, provided for the submission to a board of these claims. Am I to understand that the claims were submitted to the board, upon which the award was adverse, and that those claims thus adversely decided are to be now resubmitted to the Court of Claims?

Mr. HENDRICKS. That question is not raised by this bill at all. That question will come up on another bill, but it is not in this bill. This bill simply stands upon the award. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. DRAKE] has charge of the bill to which the Senator from New York now refers.

Mr. DRAKE. There is one point about this bill which it seems to me should engage the attention of the Senate. The parties named in the bill constructed a number of iron-clad vessels for the Government. The Navy Department, in the course of the construction of those vessels, directed alterations from time to time, which greatly increased the expense of them. The parties came to Congress for compensation for the increased expense to which they were put over and above the contract price for which they had agreed to make them. A naval commission was appointed by the Navy Department to investigate the subject, and sat some seven months engaged in that work with regard to all the cases of the construction of iron-clad vessels in which the Navy Department had made alterations so as to increase the expense. That commission made a very elaborate and careful report in regard to the whole of them, showing all the facts in every case. For some reason or other, another commission was subsequently organized by the Navy Department to whom all these matters were referred, and that commission was not in session as many weeks as the prior commission had been in session months. They did not bring before them any witnesses at all, as the prior commission had done, and after the lapse of about seven weeks of existence, they reported against every one of the claims except the five that are named in the pending bill. I believe five.

Now, sir, instead of throwing all the claims of that description before a tribunal where the Government would be represented and the claimants would be represented, and having the whole subject investigated by the Court of Claims, the proposition is to single out in the pending bill the cases where that second commission made an allowance, and pay them. The point that is needing the attention of the Senate, in my judgment, is this: that whereas the individuals named in this bill have a gross amount allowed to them, it is not stated in the bill on account of what vessel the allowance is made; it is made to them on account of all their claims; so that if the matter should ever come to be referred to the Court of Claims hereafter, and they present their claims, they may get allowances made in the Court of Claims on the very same basis upon which these allowances are now made.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. If the Senator will permit me, the report of the commission shows on what these items are allowed.

Mr. DRAKE. I submit, in reply to the honorable Senator from New Jersey, that the bill should specifically apply these amounts to the particular things upon which they are intended to be allowed, and not that these parties constructing, for illustration, ten vessels, and getting an allowance upon five of them, should bring in their whole claims for the whole ten vessels afterwards, and spread this amount allowed by the pending bill over the whole of them. That is one point of objection that I have to this bill.

Another point of objection is that through some means that we do not comprehend this second commission in the Navy Department, sitting not as many weeks as the first one sat months, have just thrown out altogether all the other claims, which, I venture to say, upon investigation would be found equally meritorious with these, and singled these out for the favor of Congress, leaving the others entirely out in the cold. Now, sir, there is pending here a joint resolution which sends the whole of these claims to the Court of Claims. That joint resolution has been before the Naval Committee of the Senate and reported back without amendment, and its passage recommended; and the point with me is, why should we take up these five and ignore all the rest? As I do not happen to have in my possession at this moment, but have left them at my room, the documents which bear on this matter, I would much prefer that the consideration of the pending bill should not be pressed to a conclusion to-day.

Mr. CORBETT. In my opinion, it should be expressed in the bill either that this amount which is to be paid shall be in full for the claims of these individuals, or else that it shall be for their claims for particular vessels, as suggested by the Senator from Missouri. I think it will be entirely wrong to leave the matter open for a readjustment of the claims in the Court of Claims after we have made a partial allowance. Either the whole matter should be referred now, before this appropriation, to the Court of Claims, or else, if this allowance is to be made, the bill ought to specify particularly for what vessels it is made, so that the parties may not go to the Court of Claims with the same claims again.

Mr. CRAGIN. Mr. President, I have before me the report of the commission appointed by the Secretary of the Navy, and it will be found by examination that this report makes a distinction between the different contractors and different vessels. The report names the different vessels for which the contractors are to receive an allowance, so that it is not necessary to specify in the bill the particular vessels upon which the allowance is paid.

In the first place the commission examined the accounts of all these contractors, and report here the amount that it cost each contractor more than he received from the Government to build the vessel which he contracted to construct. That is put down in a separate column, and then there is a column containing the amount of loss to each contractor occasioned by alterations and delays ordered by the Government, and it is on account of these alterations and delays that the awards are made in these five cases.

In the case of Secor & Co., and Prime, Secor & Co., the description of the work is, "River and harbor monitors Manhattan, Tecumseh, and Mahopac," and the actual cost of these three vessels, over and above the contract price, was $1,236,101 22, and the amount of such increased cost caused by the delay and action of the Government as determined by the board was $115,539 01, and the commission report that the Government shall pay the latter amount, being the actual increased cost to the contractors caused by the delay of the Government and alterations ordered by it. The next case on the list is that of Alexander Swift & Co., builders of the river and harbor monitors Oneota and Catawba. The board report the actual cost of those vessels, over and above the contract price, to be $665,757 22; but the board did not find that there was any loss occasioned by the delay of the Government and alterations ordered by the Government, so that they did not report anything in favor of these parties. So it is throughout, and hence it will be seen that if this bill passes it will simply pay the contractors named the money that the board awarded to them as the increased cost of their work occasioned by the delay of the Government and by the alterations ordered by the Government. It leaves all the other cases where the contractors claim that they suffered loss in consequence of the increase of labor and materials to be referred to the Court of Claims. This bill simply singles out those cases where loss was occasioned by the action of the Government as ascertained by this commission. The cases are distinct and separate entirely. The Committee on Naval Affairs had this matter under careful consideration, and reported this bill to cover the cases reported by the board, and reported another bill covering the other class of cases where the increased cost was occasioned by the increase of labor and materials, referring them to the Court of Claims; but where the cost to the contractors was increased by the direct action of the Government, as in all the cases embraced in this bill, the committee say these men ought to be paid; and when they are paid they lose millions and millions of dollars.

Mr. CORBETT. I should like to inquire whether this bill as now reported requires this money to be paid as per the report made by the commission, or has any reference to that report? If not, why cannot these persons apply this money upon the whole claims, claiming that it is paid upon any other work they may have done?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask the Senator if the insertion of this language would be agreeable to him: "which shall be in full of all claims upon the vessels on which the board made the allowance under the act of March 2, 1867."

Mr. CORBETT. Do I understand that this is a report of a board of naval officers, or the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs?

Mr. HENDRICKS. The report of the Committee on Naval Affairs is based on the report of the board. This bill is simply to carry out the report of the board.

Mr. CORBETT. If it is the report of the board, it is satisfactory. If the report of the committee is substantially the same as that of the board of naval officers, it is satisfactory.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It is just the same.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, this case is a very simple one. I want to say a word, as the two subjects are connected. This bill of the Senator from Indiana certainly ought to pass; and the other bill which has been talked of, to refer this whole subject again to the Court of Claims, I certainly think ought not to pass. The act of 1867 provided that there should be a commission appointed who should examine all these claims on this basis; that they should pay whatever was the additional cost from changes made by the Government; that they should pay for all additional expense in consequence of delays occasioned by the Government and the advance of labor and materials during those delays which the contractors could not avoid by any prudence. That was referred to this commission. The contract price for these vessels was $14,000,000. The contractors claimed as additional $10,000,000; the Department allowed them $5,000,000, so that the contractors claimed $5,000,000 more. That was referred to this board. They examined the whole subject, and they have reported about one hundred and fifty-eight thousand dollars to be due, which this bill provides for.

Now it is proposed to have the claims which were before the commission referred to the Court of Claims, where the commission allowed nothing. There is no propriety in that. There is not the slightest evidence before the Naval Committee that that commission's report was not a just and correct report; and if Congress is going to refer cases over and over again, until they can get a report against the Government, they will be gratified. And more than that, if this subject ever is investigated again, it ought not to be brought before the Court of Claims, because all these contractors of course have their witnesses, while the Government will not be prepared to meet them at all. If there is to be a reinvestigation it ought to be before another commission, who are not tied down by the strict rules which regulate a court.

Mr. DRAKE. Mr. President, I would ask the honorable Senator from Indiana to oblige me so much as to allow this bill to go over until to-morrow. Not expecting it to come up this morning I did not bring the papers and documents that I had connected with it. I do not wish to interpose any opposition to the bill that would look at all like interfering with the passage of a bill which is right in itself. I merely wish time to examine the matter. If the honorable Senator would allow the bill to go over until to-morrow I think it might be disposed of then.

Mr. ANTHONY. If this bill is to go over, or if it is not to go over, I do not wish to allow it to pass from the Senate without expressing, as one of the Committee on Naval Affairs, my opinion that the refusal to pass this bill is working a very shameful injustice. This subject has been fully investigated by the Committee on Naval Affairs, and I believe the bill has received the assent of every member of that committee; and now we are asked to put it over because some other people who have as good claims upon the Government are not connected in the same bill.

Mr. DRAKE. I do not ask it on that ground, I will say to the honorable Senator.

Mr. ANTHONY. I understood the Senator to make that objection.

Mr. DRAKE. I do not ask the postponement of it until to-morrow on that ground. I simply ask that I may have one day to re-examine the matter, and I shall certainly make no objection to its coming up to-morrow.

Mr. ANTHONY. I misunderstood the Senator greatly if I did not understand him to object to this bill because other people who had as good claims were not included.

Mr. DRAKE. I did; but I do not urge that as the ground for my asking the postponement of it until to-morrow.

Mr. ANTHONY. If we are never to pay one creditor of the Government until we can get a bill to pay all the others I do not think we shall render justice to our citizens. There are a great many people who seem to think that a contractor with the Government must necessarily come here to cheat the Government. I never saw these men except such of them as appeared before the committee, and saw them only there; none of them have been before me or written to me except to make communications in regard to their claims which were laid before the committee, as they had a perfect right to do; and no class of persons ever appeared before me with any claims upon the Government that made a better impression, and hardly any class ever made so good an impression as these men. I think their claim is manifestly just; and I am quite sure, if every member of the Senate had an opportunity to examine it as the Committee on Naval Affairs have examined it, the bill would pass the Senate unanimously.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The circumstances of these contractors are pretty well known to Congress; and I have always felt that it was a shame to Congress that they should allow these men, who constructed the Navy that accomplished so much during the war, to be broken up. I do not feel that they ought to lose one dollar. Every Senator knows that while they were constructing these vessels materials and labor advanced so upon their hands that it was utterly impossible for them to construct the vessels within the provisions of the contracts. I feel that there are very many of the contractors not provided for in this bill and not provided for by the report of the board who ought to be provided for; but a board appointed under the law of Congress that has made a very limited and a very economical report has furnished to the Committee on Naval Affairs the basis of this bill. We have not gone a dollar beyond that. We have taken just what they reported under this carefully worded law of the 2d of March, 1867, which only provided that they should be paid where the delay and the increased cost were occasioned by the Government in changing the plans and specifications of the work as it went on. Is any Senator willing to allow men to lose money under such circumstances? Is there any Senator here who would employ a carpenter to build a house for him, and after that carpenter had laid the foundations and had made the framework of the building he should go and order a change of the work, and who would then in court say to the contractor, "You shall stand by your contract, and I will not pay you for the increased cost of this work caused by the change that I myself ordered?"

This is the basis of the relief that is provided for in this bill. It is a relief so palpable to my mind that it seems to me to be a public wrong to refuse it or to delay it. The Senator from Missouri was upon the committee; he participated in the discussions in that body, and I think it is rather hard now after this bill has been delayed so long, in part by the sickness of the chairman of the committee who reported it, that the Senator should now ask this delay. I am ready to aid him in giving all proper relief to the other contractors. I do not occupy the ground stated by the Senator from New Jersey; I am willing to give the other contractors some relief; but the board has not reported in their favor. The board has reported in a most careful report—careful, I mean, in guarding the Government, careful in cutting off all possible allowance that might be based upon any principle except that mentioned in the law—in favor of the parties provided for in this bill. Therefore I think the bill ought to pass at once.

These men have sustained very heavy losses. It is known to every member of the committee that, instead of being a couple of hundred thousand dollars, their losses are certainly beyond two million dollars. I have no doubt of it. Another board made a report, and I will say to the Senator from Missouri that the first board made a report upon very different principles; that board was allowed to report all losses without reference to the causes of the loss; but under the act of 1867 this board was allowed to report only such losses as were occasioned by the act of the Government in making a change in the plan and specification after the work was commenced—just as contracted in the allowance as it is possible to be; and I feel ashamed that we shall delay these men longer. It is a heavy thing to carry in the banks at interest all the time a loss of this amount. One contractor came before the committee for whom we provided in the last Congress, and who was imprisoned in the city of Boston because of the debt that he contracted in constructing a vessel which fought at Fort Fisher and which fought at Charleston, and I felt that the whole nation was disgraced when that man was imprisoned for such a debt as that. Now, to see enterprising and useful citizens, men whose enterprise adds so much to the respectability and wealth of the country, embarrassed because they abandoned private enterprises and the construction of vessels upon private account to build them for the Government, is not just. Do Senators know the fact that in all the Government work-shops I believe not one single ship was finished which fought the enemy, that all the fighting was done by vessels constructed by these private contractors? And are Senators willing to delay, are Senators willing to refuse them this pay which is based only upon the act of the Government itself?

The Senator from New Jersey is somewhat mistaken as to the amount involved in the bill. The amendment of the chairman of the committee carried it up to about two hundred thousand dollars, or, perhaps, a little above that. The allowance, in my judgment, is not more than one fourth of what it ought to be; but it is based upon the report which is provided for in the act of 1867. That bill was carefully guarded after consultation between the naval committee and the Committee of Claims of the other House. Every point was considered and everything provided that would secure the rights of the Government in every possible way, as we thought; and now that a report has been made, after a year's delay and more, this allowance, so small in comparison with the general loss, so inconsiderable and contemptible in comparison to the great work that these contractors accomplished for the Government in time of war, it seems to me ought not to be delayed a day longer. The Senator from Missouri has charge of another bill. I ask him why, as that bill comes from the same committee, he shall antagonize that to this? They are not in antagonism. This bill rests upon the report of the board, and I think he has no right to antagonize the two measures.

Mr. DRAKE. I will state to the honorable Senator that the claims which are represented in the bill I reported come equally from a board established under the very act that the board was established under that his bill represents.

Mr. HENDRICKS. No, Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri is mistaken. The board that he speaks of was organized not under a law of Congress, but simply under a resolution of the Senate passed at an executive session. It did not have the force of law, and therefore the report of that board was not in the nature of an award, and that resolution of the Senate allowed that board to take into consideration all losses from whatever cause. This is under the law of Congress, a board organized under the law which restricted it in the allowance to such losses as were occasioned by the Government directly, and not occasioned by the general appreciation in labor and materials.

Mr. NYE. The resolution referred to by the honorable Senator from Indiana I introduced myself at an executive session. Under it the first board was formed, and after that board reported, the honorable Senator from Indiana, one of the Senators from West Virginia, [Mr. WILLEY,] and myself had it referred to us, as a sub-committee of the Committee on Naval Affairs, to report the amount due. We reported a bill. The chairman of our committee moved an amendment to reduce the amount, and that bill was lost. Now, Mr. President, I have only a word to say. It seems to me that the interests of these men who so faithfully served this country in the hour of need are being trifled with by this delay. They are hanging on the very verge of bankruptcy. They have been for three or four years struggling with Congress with all their might to get temporary relief from the embarrassments that are oppressing them. Now, I appeal to the honorable Senator from Missouri whether it is worth while to ask delay on these amounts that are adjudicated by the chosen officers of this Government, who have acted with great caution at least in allowing under the terms of the law itself only what they would be entitled to allow.

Mr. DRAKE. All I asked was an opportunity to refresh my knowledge of the facts of the case from the documents; but if these gentlemen take it so much at heart, I do not know that I shall insist on that request.

Mr. NYE. The facts have been put before the Senate during the last half hour so that the honorable Senator cannot fail to see them. It is a case so clear that I submit to the Senate it is trifling with these men, who are trembling on the verge of bankruptcy, to attempt now to delay their payment a day longer, and I hope it will not be done.

Mr. DRAKE. I will not press the postponement.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope the order of the day will be proceeded with.

Mr. CORBETT. I desire to offer an amendment, and I think if the Senator from Illinois will permit it to be voted upon the bill may be passed in a few minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is it the pleasure of the Senate to pass over informally the unfinished business of the last sitting?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope not. It is very manifest, I will say to the Senator from Oregon, that this bill cannot pass without discussion. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] wishes to look into it, and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. DRAKE] has asked to have it go over. Two or three Senators rose to take the floor when I called for the order of the day. It seems to me we ought to proceed with that business at once.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order of the day is the bill (H. R. No. 1058) to admit the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, and Alabama to representation in Congress, upon which bill the Senator from Maryland [Mr. VICKERS] is entitled to the floor.

TRANSFER OF A SUIT.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish to ask the consent of the Senator from Maryland, who is entitled to the floor, and also of the Senator having in charge the bill which is the regular order, to allow me to call up a joint resolution which I think will meet with no objection and can be passed in a moment, and which is a matter of some consequence in point of time. The chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary knows the resolution to which I refer. A suit has been brought in the West Virginia State courts to recover a very valuable part of the Harper's Ferry property. The court is to occur in about a week; and for reasons which can be stated in a moment it is very important to authorize the transfer of the suit to the Federal courts. The House of Representatives has passed a resolution to that effect and sent it here. The Maryland delegation know personally the facts, and are interested in having it done. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. WILLEY] knows also about them and has a letter explaining them. I ask that the regular order be laid aside for a moment, that we may take up the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is it the pleasure of the Senate to pass by the order of the day informally for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the resolution indicated?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Before that is done I will suggest to the Senator from New York that a bill proposing to take a single case out of one court into another will hardly pass without some examination.

Mr. CONKLING. I think if the Senator will hear a brief letter read in reference to this it will pass without any discussion or opposition from him, at all events; but if he says he will discuss it I will not press it now.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not say that.

Mr. CONKLING. It is simply a proposition to get a fair trial in a case in which the United States is interested in the Federal courts, in place of having it disposed of under local influence.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator move to postpone the order of the day?

Mr. CONKLING. I do, unless some Senator says he means to discuss the resolution, and insists upon debating it. In that event I shall not press it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The object of my statement was merely to suggest to the Senator that this was a matter about which we should know something before acting.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask that the joint resolution be read, and then, if any one insists on debating it, I will withdraw the suggestion for its consideration.

The joint resolution was read as follows:

Joint resolution to provide for the removal of a suit pending in the circuit court of Jefferson county, West Virginia, to the circuit court of the United States.

Whereas a suit in ejectment is now pending in the circuit court of Jefferson county, in West Virginia, against the tenant in possession, to recover possession of the Harper's Ferry property, owned by the United States, and it is doubtful whether under any existing law of the United States the said suit can be removed to the circuit court of the United States:

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it shall be the duty of the circuit court of the United States for the district of West Virginia, in session, or of the judge thereof in vacation, on the application of the defendant in said suit, showing that the property sought to be recovered by the said suit is owned or claimed by the United States under color of title, and verifying the facts set out in such application by his affidavit, to issue a writ by certiorari, directed to the said State court, directing it to send the record and proceedings in said suit to the said circuit court of the United States, a duplicate of which writ shall be delivered to the clerk of the said State court, or left at his office by the marshal of the said district, or his deputy or other person thereto duly authorized, and thereupon the said State court shall stay all further proceedings in said suit; and upon the return of the said writ the said suit shall be docketed in the said circuit court of the United States, and there proceed in according to law, and all further proceedings had therein in the said State court shall be null and void.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suggest to the Senator from New York whether it is not advisable to put in the names of the parties to the suit. The resolution speaks of a suit pending for property owned by the United States, but the names of the parties are not given. It seems to me rather indefinite. While I am up I wish to ask whether there is authority to order such a transfer from a State court, whether you do not bring about a collision by authorizing the United States court to direct a State court to transfer a suit brought there? Has that ever been done?

Mr. CONKLING. It has been done repeatedly and by general act in cases which involve the interests of the United States Government not more directly and not as much so as the interest involved in this case. As to the description of the suit, that is very definite; the resolution describes the property, and describes it so definitely that there can be no mistake as to the suit intended. The only objection to changing the preamble in that respect is that, if amended, the bill must go back to the House and there encounter delay, when time is of the essence of the whole proceeding.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not make a motion; I merely make the suggestion.

Mr. CONKLING. I move to postpone the regular order for the purpose of taking up the joint resolution.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am willing that the regular order should be passed by informally by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By unanimous consent the joint resolution referred to by the Senator from New York will be considered as before the Senate.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, it must be done by motion. The Senator from New York moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House joint resolution No. 284.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution (H. R. No. 284) to provide for the removal of a suit pending in the circuit court of Jefferson county, West Virginia, to the circuit court of the United States was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I am not in favor of legislating in regard to particular law-suits. This action of ejectment can only settle a possessory right, and of course it must be a suit between some person in possession as a defendant and some person claiming the right of possession. If this property belongs to the United States, of course it can only be the right of a tenant which will come in litigation in that case. I want to know upon what principle we can transfer from the State court to the United States court a case pending between two men in regard to a piece of land. If we can do it in regard to Harper's Ferry we can do it in regard to the city of Indianapolis. If I should come in and say to the Senate that there is a piece of land in the city of Indianapolis for which John Brown has sued John Smith, and that the United States claims some interest in that land, could I ask to have that suit transferred to the United States court? I do not see how that can be. I think when we transfer a case to the United States court it must be upon some ground of jurisdiction such as is given by the Constitution of the United States. Congress cannot transfer all suits from State to Federal courts.

Another thing I will add. This case cannot prejudice the United States. No suit that is tried in that State court can decide the rights of the United States. The United States cannot be made a party in a State court or in any other court, perhaps, against her pleasure. She is not a party to the case; she is not affected by the result; her rights are not affected; she has no interest in that law-suit; it is between two parties, each claiming the right of possession; she cannot be committed or concluded by any verdict or judgment rendered. It is not proper to send it there, in my judgment; therefore I move that this joint resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WILLEY. I desire to make a short statement in regard to this matter. This action is brought to recover the most valuable part—it may be said to include the whole in point of value—of the United States property at Harper's Ferry. It is an action of ejectment, which, under our law as now existing in West Virginia, settles the title to the property. It is brought against the officer whose name is Captain D. J. Young, now in charge and possession of that property. The suit is pending in the circuit court of West Virginia for the county of Jefferson. That court will be in session in a few days. The issue is made. The trial was postponed at a previous term of the court in order to enable action to be had in Congress to remove it from the jurisdiction of the State court of West Virginia to the jurisdiction and decision and arbitration of the Federal court. This joint resolution has been drawn, I understand, under the supervision of the acting Attorney General, and it is very much desired on his part that it should be passed immediately. The grounds upon which he desires the passage of this resolution are not that they have any particular objection to the decision of this case by the circuit court in Jefferson county, but it has come to his knowledge, as it has come to my knowledge, that a fair trial of the rights of the parties litigant cannot be had in Jefferson county.

It is vain to attempt to evade the fact that there is a very bitter hostility in that county against the United States, against the interests of the United States in any respect; and it has, moreover, I understand, come to the knowledge of the authorities that there is a combination there, and that there exists a prejudice in the community rising out of our late difficulties and arising out of local influences that would prevent anything like a fair trial of the issue there made. Inasmuch as the property belongs to the United States, it is but just, I think, and so the Attorney General thinks, that the rights of the United States should be tried in its own courts, where the Attorney General can act in his official character, and where the trial of the issue can be removed from the immediate vicinity of the premises, and where there can be a jury selected from the State at large that will not be under the influence of the prejudices, local and otherwise, that are known to exist in the minds of the community in that vicinity; and inasmuch as it is simply the transfer of the jurisdiction to try the title to a piece of property belonging to the United States from a State court to the Federal court, I am myself at a loss to see any feasible objection why it should not be done. Why any person representing the interests of the United States should desire, should insist, that the right to this property, in which every Senator here is just as much interested as I am, should be tried in a local State court rather than in a court of the United States, is what I cannot appreciate and cannot understand. All that is desired by the United States authorities is to take the trial of this issue from the vicinity of these prejudices, local and otherwise, which, in their belief, prevent a fair hearing of the cause, and transfer it to the courts of the United States, whose property this is; and I am sorry that there is any objection to the passage of this joint resolution.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will ask the Senator from West Virginia who is the party plaintiff and who is the party defendant?

Mr. WILLEY. A man by the name of Brown, a resident of Jefferson county, is the party plaintiff; and the defendant in possession is Captain D. J. Young, United States Army, the officer of the United States locally and personally in charge of the premises.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. POMEROY.) The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana, to refer the resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CONKLING. But one remark needs to be made on that motion. If the resolution is to be recommitted to the Judiciary Committee and reported here it may just as well be postponed indefinitely.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Has it ever been committed?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that it has not been to a committee.

Mr. CONKLING. That is true. I should not have said "recommitted," but "committed" to the Judiciary Committee. The court is to occur, I think, in a week from the time the letter was dated which is in the possession of the Senator from West Virginia. My impression is, further, from what I was told, that it will commence next Monday. Unless the resolution is to be passed now the object of it is lost; therefore we may as well vote on it now.

The motion to refer was not agreed to.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I cannot believe that the statement made to us is accurate in regard to this case. If private parties bring a suit against an officer of the United States in regard to the public property, there can certainly be no difficulty in setting up that he holds it under the United States and going into the Federal courts under our general laws. If that is all that is involved, this joint resolution is manifestly unnecessary. There must be something else in the case. If Mr. Binkley, the Assistant Attorney General, desires us to interpose by an act of Congress in this case, he should send us some official report setting forth the nature of this issue and the grounds upon which our interference is asked. It must certainly be that some private interest, rather than the interest of the United States, is involved in this case, or there would be no desire for the interposition of Congress in regard to it; or it must be a very—I will not, however, express what I intended to. I will say it must be a very serious mistake on the part of this Assistant Attorney General.

This resolution is in the nature of a judicial mandate. Congress proposes to pass a law ordering the State court in West Virginia to do this, that, and the other thing; to stop their proceedings at once and turn the case over to the United States court. Our general laws conferring jurisdiction upon the courts of the United States, in cases which may arise under the Constitution, are prospective. Our laws on that subject are all prospective. They apply to future cases. Congress has never attempted to single out a particular civil issue, an issue upon the title to either real or personal property, and to order by its sovereign mandate that one court shall turn it over to another. Why, sir, it is a perfect novelty in legislation, and upon the ground which is stated here to the Senate as an excuse for our passing this extraordinary resolution there is no reason whatever for its passage, because, unquestionably, this case could be turned over with entire convenience into the courts of the United States. If it be a suit against a public officer to recover possession of that property to which the United States claims title, and to which no doubt it has good title, and if the Attorney General, or his office, or the Assistant Attorney General, enlists in behalf of this party, he will have no difficulty in getting into court. I believe, judging from the general probabilities of this case, that this is an attempt to bring in the authority of Congress in the interest of some private party.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 319) granting a pension to Bridget W. McGrorty and the minor children of William B. McGrorty, deceased;

A bill (S. No. 339) granting a pension to Sarah Webb, widow of William R. Webb, and her minor children;

A bill (S. No. 419) granting a pension to Mary Atkinson;

A bill (H. R. No. 1039) to admit the State of Arkansas to representation in Congress;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 284) to provide for the removal of a suit pending in the circuit court of Jefferson county, West Virginia, to the circuit court of the United States; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 287) for the restoration of Captain James F. Armstrong, United States Navy, to the active list from the retired list.

REPRESENTATION OF SOUTHERN STATES.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) The unfinished business of Saturday, being the bill (H. R. No. 1058) to admit the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, and Alabama to representation in Congress, is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, the pending question being on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] to the amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary, to insert the word "Alabama" after "Georgia," in the fourth line of the first section of the committee's amendment; and upon that question the Senator from Maryland [Mr. VICKERS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. VICKERS addressed the Senate in opposition to the bill. [His speech will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I have listened with a great deal of pleasure to my honorable friend from Maryland, and I congratulate him upon the able speech he has made to the Senate. My honorable friend has not been a member of this body very long. Had he been he would have discovered ere this that that instrument, the Constitution of the United States, to which he has so justly and aptly referred in his remarks, has long since been ignored in the legislation of this country. It is an old, worn-out instrument without binding force. It has been quoted so often during the legislation of the last few years that I must suggest to my honorable friend that, however able the speech he has made is, and however attentively we have listened to him, yet it has been labor lost. Does my honorable friend seriously believe that any member of this body supposes that the bill now under consideration has constitutional warrant or authority? Does anybody suppose that any gentleman in this body thinks that it is in the power of the Federal Congress to annex terms and conditions to the right of admission to representation upon this floor? When the Constitution of the United States declares that each State shall be entitled to two Senators in Congress and to Representatives according to its population, and when nothing is said in that instrument as to the power to limit or restrict this right of the States, does my honorable friend suppose that any gentleman here seriously thinks that there is such a right, such an authority in this body, when that right and authority are viewed in the light of the Federal Constitution? Let me say to my friend, away with this notion that the Constitution has any binding force or operation here?

Mr. President, it is not my intention to make a speech upon this question, but the particular phraseology of this bill is such that it necessarily attracts attention. Has there been some compromise upon phraseology invoked in reference to this bill? While one portion of the American Senate and of the dominant party claim that these States have been out of the Union, that by their ordinances of secession, followed by actual hostilities, they forfeited the right to representation upon this floor and all the rights that they had while States of the Union under the Constitution, another portion have contended to the contrary, that these States never forfeited those rights, that they never ceased to be States of the Union; and now comes this bill. What for? It is popularly supposed to be, the newspapers would have you believe, a bill for the admission of five States into the Union. Not so. Let the champions of the doctrine that ordinances of secession followed by acts of hostility took States out of the Union rise and proclaim manfully, in the face of the Senate and before the country, that such is the fact, and that the intention of this bill is to bring back States into the Union which are not in the Union. Sir, if your doctrine be that these States are out of the Union, and that they must be brought back, so frame your bill; so word your enactment that your doctrine shall be apparent upon the face of the bill. But not so. Your bill does not declare that these States were ever out of the Union. It does not declare that you propose now to admit them into the Union or readmit them into the Union; neither does it declare in so many words that they are States in the Union; but it is a bill to admit certain States "to representation" on this floor.

I take it then, gentlemen, that you are bound by the face of your bill to the doctrine that these States are and ever have been States in the Union. If they are not now States in the Union, if they have ever been out of the Union, why do you not say so? You treat them now as existing States by this bill. You have been proclaiming, and the country has heard you in thunder tones proclaim from one end of the land to the other, that these States were out of the Union; and yet instead of bringing in an open, manly bill for the readmission of States into the Union which by rebellion had forfeited the right to a place in the Union; you simply bring in a bill to readmit these States as States not into the Union, but to the right of representation.

I know that my honorable friend, the Senator from Maine, [Mr. MORRILL] once held the doctrine that by the act of war these States ceased to be States of the Union, and hence it was that he advocated your reconstruction policy; hence it was that in the very able and ingenious argument which he made upon the question of reconstruction, he could find no warrant of authority for your action except upon the doctrine that they had ceased to be States of the Union and had forfeited their existence as States by reason of rebellion and actual hostilities. I call upon him, if such be his doctrine, if such be the doctrine of this party which lately met in convention and hoisted the names of Grant and Colfax—those names which were to frighten somebody, which were to sweep all over the country like wild-fire, which were to awaken enthusiasm and stir the souls of the American people, and whose onward march to the presidential and vice presidential chair was to be nothing but one march of triumph—if he is sincere in his doctrine that these States forfeited their rights in the Union by ordinances of secession coupled with acts of hostility, I ask him to make it plain; rise and say that "Whereas the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, and Florida, by their ordinances of secession and by rebellion, forfeited their rights as States in the Union and ceased to be States, therefore be it enacted that the States be readmitted into the Union."

But instead of that we have now, as far as this bill goes, a total abandonment of the cardinal principle of your political faith, and you come now and you tell the American people, and you tell the country, "Here are five States in the Union that are unrepresented, and we, in the plenitude of our generosity, in the exuberance of our magnanimity, will allow these States, (which if they be States are States equal in right to all the other States in the Union,) to come in and take seats among us. But we will not do that exactly as the thing ought to be done; we will annex certain terms and conditions to this right of representation; although these are States in the Union and have equal rights with us, we will put some limitations upon them; they must ratify a certain article which we proposed as an amendment to the Constitution!"

Then I hold you to this, gentlemen: you mean to say that notwithstanding they are States in the Union you will not allow them a constitutional right to representation in this body unless they ratify what you propose to them. You mean to say to the American people, and that is the doctrine in your bill, "True, you are States in the Union, but you shall have none of the benefits of the Union; you shall have no voice in the legislation of the country unless for the sake of having that benefit you shall do our bidding by adopting the proposed constitutional amendment, which you would not adopt if left to your own free will and choice."

According to the doctrine of this bill, upon its face as you present it to me, notwithstanding your theory has heretofore been that these States are out of the Union, now treating these States as States in the Union, I say you have just as much right to say that my State or Maryland or New York or any other State in the Union shall not be represented upon this floor unless they will adopt a constitutional amendment, or do some other thing which you have bid them do.

Hence I say that my remark to my distinguished friend from Maryland was just and proper, that invoking the Constitution of the United States in this body upon this bill is entirely out of place, with all due deference to him, because when you look to that worn-out instrument, that disregarded instrument, that ignored instrument, you can find no power in the Federal Congress to put limitations upon the right of a State to representation upon this floor or in the other House of Congress. If they be States in the Union and you can find no limitation upon any such right as that, what business has it in your bill? If they be States of the Union, point me, if you can, to your authority to impose such a limitation and such a restriction in reference to those States which does not exist in reference to any other State of the Union.

Another proposed condition is that they shall never abridge the elective franchise from any consideration of race or color. My remarks in reference to the other proposition will apply to this. Where is your authority in reference to those States any further than that authority exists in reference to States now represented upon this floor? And yet is it seriously contended, does any man suppose, that these States will admit that any condition which you may annex to their right of representation will be binding upon them? When once they have representatives on this floor and in the other House of Congress, and they meet in State convention, will they not have the same powers as States that the other States of the Union have? Cannot the people of Maine and New Hampshire and the other States meet to-morrow in State convention and say who shall be voters within those States, and cannot they base a distinction between voters or the qualification of voters upon color or race, intelligence, property, or anything else? Why does this result? It is because the people of those States, acting in their sovereign capacity, have the right to determine the character of their own political institutions. There is no warrant of authority in my friend's worn-out instrument which he has dragged out from some dark hole and brought in here before the Senate of the United States—the Constitution, or what was once the Constitution, of the United States—there is no authority in that old, worn-out, and discarded instrument to interfere with the exercise of just State authority. When these States get here with their representatives, what power have you to expel their representatives because they have disregarded this fundamental (I believe it is so called) condition which you choose to annex, not to their admission or their readmission into the Union, and not to their right of representation either, but to the fact of their being admitted on this floor. It is not even a condition annexed to the right of representation, but it is a condition annexed to the fact. Having the power to keep out their representatives here and in the other House of Congress, in the exercise of your power you say to them, "You are out, we are in, and we will keep you out until these fundamental principles are adopted."

Looking at this question, sir, with the eyes of a lawyer, I confess that while I once thought I knew something of the law if I stay in this body much longer I expect to forget what little I ever did know. I say so with all due respect to gentlemen, because I hear so many wild notions advanced; things told me as law that I never heard of away down in that benighted country from whence I came; things told me as constitutional law which I can find in none of the teachings of the fathers, which I never heard until this great and glorious and magnificent party, six or eight years old, the party of progress, of moral ideas, of economy, of retrenchment, of reform, of freedom, through the active agency of the Senator from Massachusetts and the distinguished gentleman who now presides over the deliberations of this body, and other distinguished gentlemen, was brought into existence! Then it was that all the old landmarks were erased. Then it was that all the teachings of the great and mighty intellects of the noble men who laid the foundations of this Government deep in the principles of constitutional law and civil liberty were forgotten, and new lights, rockets to be sure, as comets, flying rapidly through the air, with more tail than head, blazed and lighted up the political firmament! Then it was that we heard that there could be no republican government in the sense of the Constitution of the United States where Mr. Sambo was not invited into the public councils to illuminate by his superior wisdom the deliberations of the representatives of States and of people! Then it was that we heard it proclaimed throughout the length and breadth of this land, under the new regime, under the new political dispensation of which my friend from Maine, I believe, is a high priest, that the founders of the Constitution, the men who made your Government, who put it in motion, who guided it on step by step, were old fogies; that they were not up to the spirit of the times. It is true that in the short space of some seventy-five years we had grown to be one of the greatest and most powerful nations of the earth. Peace was in all our borders; plenteousness everywhere abounded. Under the guidance of that good old Democratic party which, thank God, is not dead, but which is living, striving, moving, and which, in November next, will meet your standard-bearers and their followers and make places for these States in the Union as States of the Union, through the mighty voice of the people. While that party guided public affairs you ceased to be a comparatively small territory, with a few millions of inhabitants dotted along the Atlantic sea-board; you extended from ocean to ocean, and from the frozen regions to the torrid zone, until, like Jeshurun, you waxed fat and kicked, and the people, in a moment of blindness and folly, listened to your siren voice of reform, retrenchment, liberty, and freedom. The public debt was enormous in those days, you said; it amounted to some ninety millions. You have been in power a few years, and you have run it up to billions. In your Chicago platform, which nominated Lincoln and Hamlin, you talked of freedom of speech and freedom of the press; and you are the only party in existence in this country that ever suppressed a newspaper; and you suppressed hundreds of them. You talked of freedom of speech, and you are the only party that has ever been in existence in the United States which has converted the public forts into bastilles. You have illustrated your love of freedom by imprisoning citizens without warrant or authority. You have illustrated your regard for freedom of the press by suppressing papers which opposed your policy. You have illustrated your love of economy by squandering millions and millions, and billions.

True, I may be answered that most of this money has been expended in suppressing what you call a rebellion; but you know that hundreds of millions have been squandered and wasted through your extravagance, keeping up your negro bureaus, and all such things foreign from the nature of our system of Government. And, sir, recently, in your convention at Chicago, you resolved in favor of economy once more! You declared that retrenchment is needed, and you condemned the wasteful extravagance of Andrew Johnson's administration. Andrew Johnson! Your President, made so by you! A man who cannot spend a dollar unless you appropriate it; a man who has not touched, and cannot touch a dollar, even for the necessary purposes of the Government, until you have appropriated it! The wasteful extravagance of Andrew Johnson's administration must be rebuked, and lo and behold! you nominate a ticket to do that thing!

I know, Mr. President, that these remarks are foreign to the matter under consideration; but I see some of my good, reforming friends kindly smile; and you know we are told in the Good Book to stir up the purer minds occasionally by way of remembrance. I have just been fulfilling that injunction of the Good Book. [Mr. MORRIS rose.] Mr. President, I will not detain my friend from Indiana much longer. I know he has a sledge-hammer when he comes; but never mind, I have learned to bear blows, and to receive his with great pleasure.

I know that my friends here will not take offense when I tell them (inasmuch as I know they are very fond of the term) that I look on all this legislation as merely ad interim, for the time being, to last for a few days. Do you suppose, sir, that the great American people, North, if you please—those who never took up arms against the Federal Government—when they come to think upon and consider your measures, will approve of putting the South under the control of the negro population? Do you suppose they are going to let such legislation as that stand? No, sir. You will find reformers—true reformers—coming up here. It is said one of the best lessons that can be learned is to unlearn what you have learned amiss. They will learn to unlearn what you have taught them amiss, and they will correct your legislation. They will never allow the people of the South to be placed permanently under the control of their former slaves. They will not allow limitations to be imposed upon some States of the Union as to their representation upon this floor which are not imposed on all the States of this Union; for if there be one doctrine dearer to the American heart than another, and especially dear to the great Democratic heart, it is the equality of rights of the people and the equality of the rights of the States.

The other day you passed "A bill to admit the State of Arkansas to representation in Congress." What is its preamble? Whereas Arkansas has done so and so; that is, whereas Arkansas has adopted a constitution republican in form and has ratified the fourteenth proposed amendment to the Constitution, therefore she shall be entitled to representation. What is the inference to be drawn from that? It has passed, I know; but it is a kindred measure to that now before the Senate, and hence I am justified in alluding to it. What is the inference to be drawn from such a preamble? Your "whereas" is the reason for your action. You do not simply do the act, but you assign the reasons, and one of those reasons is that Arkansas has adopted a proposed amendment to the Constitution. The inference is thereby irresistible that if Arkansas had not adopted the proposed amendment to the Constitution you would not admit her to the right of representation on this floor. Tell me where is your authority in the Constitution of the United States for putting the right of representation on this floor upon the ground that a State has ratified any amendment of the Constitution or done any other preliminary act of that sort? You can only do it by coming out manfully and saying, as my friend from Maine says, that these States are out of the Union, and therefore you can do what you please, impose any conditions when you admit them into the Union; but your bill does not do that. I can understand that on his theory you might in an act admitting Arkansas to representation in the Union annex to it a fundamental condition, planting yourself upon the doctrine that they were out of the Union, subject territory lying at your feet and subject to your absolute will. I can understand that; but the hypothesis on which your bill is based is that they are States—States to-day.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Will my friend allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am always glad to hear my friend.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will call his attention to this preamble, and see what he thinks of it:

"Whereas the people of North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, &c., have, in pursuance of the provisions of an act entitled 'An act for the more efficient government of the rebel States,' &c., framed constitutions of government which are republican in form."

I ask the Senator what he thinks the indication from that preamble is; whether they are in or out?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will answer my friend. Taking the bill as it stands by itself, unconnected with any antecedent measure, I would put this interpretation on it: you say that the people of North Carolina, South Carolina, and other States, have done so and so, thereby recognizing them as States; and I say that you recognize them as States of the Union, but as States which have not had governments which you thought republican in form, and, therefore, you passed an act for their more efficient government, and to enable them to create a republican government, still claiming, however, that they were States. But the bill you passed a year ago—your bill for reconstruction—was a bill which totally denied the existence of these States as political communities, and, as I attempted to show on a former occasion, was destructive of all government, of all property, all law; and which was in itself a declaration of the dissolution of society in all these States. But taking the preamble to this bill by itself, I should take it that the draftsman of the bill had in view what I have sometimes heard on this floor, "disorganized States."

We live to learn, Mr. President. We have learned a great many things during the discussions upon these so-called reconstruction measures and measures of a kindred character; things that we never dreamed of in our early days, which our fathers never taught us, which the wise men who went before us never left a record of an opinion on. But we hear them now, and we must meet them, and meet them as they are presented to us.

Mr. President, I did not intend to say one tenth as much as I have said. Allow me now to say in conclusion, that, in my judgment, no State that was ever in the Union has been out of the Union. You fought secession four long years on that principle. Your declarations on that subject were uniform during the existence of the war. Being in the Union when hostilities ceased, the right existed inherently in the people there to meet in conventions and frame their constitutions, so that there should be no provision in them repugnant to the Constitution of the United States; and they had the right, under the terms and provisions of the Federal Constitution, to immediate representation on this floor, without the let or hindrance of the Federal Congress; and the only right and the only authority you had in the premises was, when their representatives were presented here, to inquire whether they had the constitutional qualifications. You have not done so. If you had acknowledged that right when peace was restored, when the clangor of arms was no longer heard, when not an armed soldier was to be found in all that country, you would have had these States long ago not only in the Union, as they always have been, but represented on this floor, and you would have had your Government going on harmoniously, the people happy and contented, and as prosperous as a people could be after such a long and devastating war. You have got to come to that yet, sir. You cannot subvert the laws of the Almighty. You cannot place the degraded African above the white man. You cannot so legislate as to place that class of people over the whites. Although I do not charge individuals with having a design personally to see the white race degraded, yet such is the effect of this legislation, because you know that under your enactments it must be so necessarily. With a large portion of the southern people excluded from the right of voting, the blacks enfranchised, and in some States being more numerous than the whites, you know that in some States, at least, the local legislation must be under the control of the negro race according to your measures.

And pray, sir, have you had no examples of the state of society which must exist in those communities when you shall have accomplished your purposes? Have you forgotten the midnight parades in this city? Have you forgotten the disturbances, the murders, that have occurred in the capital of the nation? And do you suppose that in the South, when the negroes are armed with the political power of those communities, the state of society will not be equally bad? Mr. President, I have but one hope for my country and the prosperity of my country as against your—you will allow me to say it, for I absolutely believe it—unwise legislation, and that is that the animosities and the bitter feelings engendered by the war cannot always last; the feeling of kindness, the sense of justice will after a while not only plant itself in the great public heart and stir and move the great public soul, but it will find expression in popular action through the agency of the ballot-box. Much of the strife engendered by the war, much of the animosities then aroused has passed away; it is daily passing away; and now, from one end of the country to the other, the grand inquest of the nation is sitting upon the wisdom or folly of your action here. They are giving out some feeble indications of what their verdict will be in November next. From the Pacific there comes a voice admonishing you of the judgment of the people upon the Pacific slope. Wherever elections have been held, the indications are that your policy is to be repudiated, that wiser counsels are to prevail, that the spirit of justice and the love of justice is again to influence and control the action of the people; and the prospect is bright. I will say to my friend from Indiana before I feel the weight of his blows, that in November next the people will not only sit in judgment upon your action, but that they will condemn it, and that a wiser policy will be inaugurated, and that we shall indeed have hereafter, if not through your agency, through that of others, a restored Union and a happy and contented people.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I will say a word in answer to the Senator from Delaware, and then I propose to offer an amendment to this bill. The Senator from Delaware concludes by saying that the prospect of the party opposed to the Republican party or the party of the Union, is bright, and that they expect to gain the victory next fall. I would say to my friend from Delaware and to my friend from Maryland, also, that they should be careful how they denounce negro suffrage and talk about Sambo, for the prospect now is that on the next 4th of July, they will be placed on a platform of universal suffrage and universal amnesty, and we shall then find our friends engaged in the pleasing occupation of proving that they always stood there. [Laughter.]

It is a little remarkable, Mr. President, that whenever any allusion is made to placing the negro upon a political equality with the white man, they call it placing him over the white man; thereby conceding, as they do, that if he is made equal to the white man in political rights he will become his superior. I have never insulted the white race in that way. I have always supposed that they were capable of taking care of themselves; especially when their numbers were equal, and certainly when they were superior; but Senators are constantly admitting and affirming the superiority of the black race, by saying that it is putting the black man above the white man, whenever you put the black man simply on a political equality. They have lived among the negro race more than I have; they perhaps know them better than I do; they seem to distrust the ability of the white man and to stand in dread of the ability of the black man; therefore they look upon political equality as equivalent to putting the negro over the white man. That may answer as a description of the capacity of the whites of Maryland, and even of those of the State of Delaware, but it will not answer for that portion of the white race with which I am acquainted.

Mr. President, we hear this constant declamation against the degraded negro race, ignorant, imbruted, and half civilized. I would say to the southern men that there ought to be a sense of modesty, there ought to be a feeling which should, at least, prevent them now from slandering the colored man. After having in their States forbidden by law, made it a penitentiary offense to teach the negro to read and write, after having withheld from him all the means of education and intelligence, after having degraded him by slavery on their part, and after they have lived off his labor for generations, labor unpaid for, labor which has never even been remembered in gratitude, after they have lived off him for generations and grown rich and proud, it ill becomes the southern people now to slander and traduce the negro. If he is degraded, they have made him so; slavery has made him so. If he is ignorant, they have made him so by making it a crime to teach him to read and write. And now, after he has won his liberty, after he has failed to go into insurrection and commit deeds of blood, but has patiently, intelligently, waited his time, and now comes out a freeman, with no other antipathy to his late master except that he shall not be again reenslaved, it is in bad taste for the southern people to denounce him as ignorant, uncivilized, and imbruted.

Now, Mr. President, allow me to say one word in answer to my friend from Maryland. He again adverted to the question of the guarantee of a republican form of government, and insisted that we have no right under the Constitution to reconstruct the governments of these States as we are trying to do, and he read a paper from Madison, which I think my friend misunderstood, to show that there must be an antecedent government of the same character with the one we propose to establish by our method of reconstruction. The Constitution says that the United States shall guaranty to each State a republican form of government. There is no mistake about the language. It is a plain phrase. It uses the word "guaranty," a law term, the meaning of which is well settled and well defined and understood, at least by every lawyer. What is the contract of guaranty? It is to undertake to do something in case somebody else does not. It is a collateral undertaking as distinguished from an original undertaking, as lawyers would say. To guaranty a debt is to agree to pay the debt provided the original debtor does not, not to pay it in the first place, but to pay it if he does not. That is the guarantee of a debt. Now, what is it for this government to guaranty a republican form of government to a State? It is the duty of the States themselves to maintain a republican form of government in the same sense as it is of the maker of a note to pay his own debt; but if the State fails to maintain a republican form of government the United States, as the guarantor, must come in and use such means, resort to such instrumentalities, and, if necessary, raise up such persons to the right of suffrage as will enable the Government of the United States to maintain a republican form of government in the State, and thus execute the guarantee. There is no mistake about it. That is the sense in which it was put into the Constitution; and that is the simple original sense in which that power has been resorted to by the Congress of the United States.

My friend from Delaware is in great trouble as to whether these States are in or out of the Union. If we say that they are still in the Union, he imagines that there is a great Radical difficulty; that if they are still in the Union and have been all the time they must ex necessitate from the very beginning be entitled to Senators and Representatives in Congress. No such thing, sir. A people may have been in rebellion and destroyed their own State governments so that they could not elect Senators. They have been in rebellion and arms, so that they have no right to send a representative here according to the common principles of justice and of loyalty; and it is when a State is in that condition that this clause of the Constitution comes in and covers it, that the United States shall guaranty to each State a republican form of government. What is that? That clause does not apply to Territories, and never did. You never heard of Congress assuming the power to govern a Territory by virtue of that clause. It applies to States, and to States only, and in such a case it gives this Government the right to intervene and to reestablish State governments upon such terms as will secure the future peace and safety of the Republic and will exclude from power the men who have overwhelmed the country with blood and with a vast squandering of treasure. Enough upon that point, Mr. President. I shall offer the following amendment to the amendment of the committee, as additional sections:

And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the commanding generals of the different military districts in which said States are situated, to cause all officers duly elected under the constitution of either of said States, not disqualified as hereinafter provided, to be installed into their respective offices within twenty days after the passage of this act, and to afford ample protection to such officers in the rightful discharge of their duties: Provided, That such officers shall be deemed provisional only and subject to the paramount authority of the United States until the provisions of the first section of this act shall have been complied with.

And be it further enacted, That no person prohibited from holding office under the United States or under any State by section three of the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States known as article fourteen, shall be deemed eligible to any office in either of said States, and when any person declared elected to any office is thus disqualified the person having the next highest number of votes for the same office shall be intrusted with the discharge of the duties of such office until such time as a new election can be held in accordance with the provisions of the constitution of the State in which it occurs.

One word in explanation of these amendments. The first is intended to meet the case of Louisiana, where General Buchanan has by a general order provided that the State officers elected shall not be installed until the first Monday in November. He has, I believe, arrested the chairman of the board of registration created by the constitutional convention in Louisiana, and has postponed the installation of the State officers until the first Monday in November, thus leaving the rebel officers, State and county and township, in possession of the State until that time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is not in order at this time, but it will be hereafter.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The amendment of the Senator from Indiana is not in order at this time.

Mr. MORTON. But does that make any difference?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Not at all.

Mr. MORTON. I have a right to have it read for information.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. In regard to the second clause, it is intended to meet this difficulty: to make ineligible officers who have been elected in the recent elections who would be ineligible when the fourteenth article becomes a part of the Constitution; in other words, to prevent the installation in advance of officers who would be ineligible and disqualified when the fourteenth article becomes a part of the Constitution by having been ratified by enough States. It is to prevent the anomaly of now installing officers that in a month or six weeks might become incompetent and ineligible by reason of the fourteenth article becoming a part of the Constitution.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, I have received from a gentleman from Louisiana, who claims to speak in behalf of the memorialists, whom he states to be about four thousand in number of the bona fide citizens of Louisiana, a paper in the nature of a memorial to the Congress of the United States. I do not rise for the purpose of making any argument myself, but I ask that this statement of his, as Louisiana has no representative here, may be read. It is respectful in its terms.

Mr. POMEROY. Whom is it from?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Austin is the name of the gentleman.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paper will be read if there be no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I inquire if that is a private letter.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. No, sir; it is addressed to the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON. Let the Clerk read the address.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin asks that the memorial be read as part of his argument.

Mr. CONNESS. The Senator from Maryland asks for the reading of the title of the paper. I hope that will be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The address will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The paper is addressed as follows: "Mr. President."

Mr. CONNESS. I object to the reading unless the honorable Senator shall address the Senate and make it a part of his speech.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, in relation to that, I will regard it as a part of my speech and allow the Clerk to read it.

Mr. CONNESS. No, Mr. President, that cannot be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. When the reading of a paper is objected to it can only be read by the consent of the Senate. It is usual for gentlemen to read papers as part of their argument; but the reading of this paper is objected to, and the question is, shall it be read?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will inquire if that is not in the nature of a speech addressed to the Senate of the United States by some person outside of this body? Is it not produced here for the purpose of addressing the Senate by a person who has no right to address this body? If that is the nature of the paper I object to its being read. If it is any statement of fact addressed to the Senate, let it be received like other memorials.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule of the Senate is very clear on the subject. When a paper is offered it cannot be read if objected to unless the Senate consent, and that question is to be decided without debate.

Mr. CONNESS. Now, before the question is taken, I ask what name or names are signed to it?

The CHIEF CLERK. The paper is signed "H. N. Austin for the memorialists."

Mr. NYE. Who are the memorialists?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the reading of the paper. The question must be taken without debate?

Mr. THAYER. I desire to ask a question of the Senator from Wisconsin: is it in the shape of a memorial?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I understand it to be in the shape of a memorial, but it was handed to me by this gentleman, claiming to speak in behalf of these memorialists, and he says they are about four thousand in number.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This matter cannot be argued.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If in order I move the reference of the paper to the appropriate committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on allowing the paper to be read, its reading being asked for and objected to.

The question was put; and there were 7 in favor of the paper being read and 21 against the reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paper cannot be read. ["Vote!" "Vote!"] The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Wilson] to the amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary, to insert "Alabama."

Mr. CONNESS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Before the vote is taken on that question, I wish to correct one or two statements which have been made, doubtless inadvertently, by Senators in regard to Alabama. The question arises in this way: the Senator from Massachusetts moves to amend the amendment of the committee by inserting "Alabama" as one of the States which is to be entitled to representation in Congress; and that is the precise question upon which we are now about to vote.

The distinction between Alabama and the other States is to my mind very clear. The other States, Georgia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, and Florida, have all adopted constitutions in accordance with the reconstruction acts and sent their constitutions here; they have ratified those constitutions by a vote of the people in accordance with the reconstruction acts. The State of Alabama has not done that. At the time the State of Alabama voted this was the law:

"That if, according to said returns, the constitution shall be ratified by a majority of the votes of the registered electors qualified as herein specified, cast at said election, at least one half of all the registered voters voting upon the question of such ratification, the president of the convention shall transmit a copy of the same, duly certified, to the President of the United States, who shall forthwith transmit the same to Congress."

It was only in case the constitution was ratified by "a majority of the votes of the registered electors cast at said election, at least one half of the registered voters voting upon the question of such ratification," that the constitution was to be transmitted to the President. These words, "at least one half of the registered voters voting upon the question of such ratification," were inserted in this law after debate, after much controversy, in the Senate, and at the present time are insisted upon by several Senators as very proper words to be in the law.

The people of Alabama voted upon their constitution under that law by which the Congress of the United States said to them that the constitution, in order to be valid, must be ratified by a majority of those voting, and that at least one half of all the registered voters must vote upon the question. That was put in as meaning something. Now, it is proposed to recognize the State of Alabama as entitled to representation in Congress when not one half of the registered voters have voted upon the question. Can we do that without breaking faith?

Mr. SUMNER. Breaking faith with whom?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Breaking faith with ourselves, with the Congress of the United States, breaking our own faith.

Mr. CONNESS. Permit me to ask the Senator if there is not a similar breach of faith whenever we amend a law that we have once passed?

Mr. TRUMBULL. By no means. Here the people have acted under an assurance from Congress given to the people of Alabama, that unless a majority of all the registered voters voted upon the question the constitution was not to be transmitted at all.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not propose to debate this matter at any length.

Mr. STEWART. I simply wish to bring the Senator right to the point. What object did we have in providing for a vote at all? Was it not simply to ascertain if a majority of the loyal people of Alabama, the people we allowed to vote, were in favor of the constitution? And, comparing this vote with the vote taken in the other States, Alabama having cast the greatest number of votes of any State except South Carolina for the constitution, in proportion to the whole number of registered voters, does it not clearly indicate that a majority of the loyal people of Alabama do desire to come in under this constitution?

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Nevada is entirely mistaken. Alabama has done no such thing. She has not cast as many votes in proportion for her constitution as any other State. Every one has cast more in proportion.

Mr. SHERMAN. I beg pardon of the Senator for interrupting him, to say that Alabama has cast more votes in favor of this constitution in proportion to her registered voters than any other State in the South has cast for its constitution.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I beg the Senator's pardon. I have the figures here before me officially, and I say every State in the South has cast more votes than Alabama, and I will show it.

Mr. SHERMAN. In proportion to the registered voters?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I say in proportion to the registration.

Mr. SHERMAN. For the constitution?

Mr. TRUMBULL. For the constitution.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. TRUMBULL. We shall see who is mistaken. I rose for the purpose of correcting these mistakes which Senators have made here without the facts before them; but I shall come to that branch of the case in a moment.

We said to the people of Alabama that the constitution would be adopted only in case a majority of the registered voters take part in the election. Now, after having said that, when there are in Alabama one hundred and seventy thousand registered voters, and only sixty-nine thousand have voted for the constitution, you propose to declare that the constitution of the people of Alabama! One hundred thousand voters did not go to the polls at all, sixty-nine thousand only voted for the constitution, and seventy thousand took part in the election under it. They had a right to stay from the polls; you said so by your law. Having published this law to the people of Alabama, under which they were to reconstruct their State government, and said to them that unless a majority take part in the election on this constitution it was not to be transmitted as the constitution, can you turn around now to-day and say, "It is the constitution of your State; your people should have known better than to have stayed away from the polls?" Here may have been loyal men, good men, to whom it was inconvenient to take part in the election; and how did they reason? They said, "If we do not go to the election our vote counts just the same as if we do go." Now, after you have held this out to them, and said to them that their votes should count the same, you propose to turn around and say, "We will put the constitution upon you at any rate." It is the old Lecompton principle over again. We cannot stand upon such a position as that before the country.

Mr. CONNESS. We can.

Mr. TRUMBULL. No; my friend from California, and nobody else, in my judgment, can stand before the intelligent people of this country on such a proposition. When we have authorized the people of a State to form a constitution and State government, and have said to them that that constitution was to be adopted only in case a majority of their registered voters took part in its formation, I do not think we can afterward turn around and adopt that constitution as the fundamental law of that State when only a minority less by thirty thousand than those not voting have taken part in the formation of the constitution.

It has been repeatedly said on this floor that a larger number in proportion voted for the constitution in Alabama than elsewhere. I will correct that. I have here the official report, which will be found in Executive Document No. 53, which is a "letter of the General of the Army of the United States, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of December 5, 1867, a statement of the number of white and colored voters registered in each of the States subject to the reconstruction acts of Congress, with other statistics relative to the same subject." The first State to which I will turn the attention of the Senate is North Carolina. In the State of North Carolina, according to this official report, there were registered 179,653 voters, half of which is 89,826. According to this official report from the General of the Army it appears that in North Carolina there were cast for the constitution 92,500 votes. More than one half of all the registered voters voted for the constitution in North Carolina, so that even if the law never had been changed North Carolina adopted the constitution by those who voted affirmatively in its favor. There were cast against the constitution in North Carolina 71,820 votes, so that one hundred and sixty-four thousand voted on the question, and a majority of all the registered voters in North Carolina voted for the constitution. Now, I ask the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Nevada if they are satisfied that a larger proportion voted in North Carolina for the constitution than did in Alabama according to the vote? Do they "give it up" in reference to North Carolina? It was but a moment ago it was stated by both these Senators that there was a larger vote cast for the constitution in Alabama than in any other State. I show you the official vote, that a majority of all the registered voters voted for the constitution in North Carolina. Now, what becomes of that misstatement?

Mr. SHERMAN. When the Senator is through and does not address himself in that way, I will reply to him. I have the facts before me.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Well, if there is any other official statement, I should be glad to see it. I read from this executive document. Now I will read as to South Carolina. According to the official report which I hold in my hand there were in the State of South Carolina 127,432 registered voters. The half of 127,432 is 63,716. There were cast for the constitution in the State of South Carolina, according to an official report from the General of the Army, made the 12th day of May, 1868, 70,758 votes; so that in South Carolina there were cast 7,042 votes, more than half of the registered voters, in favor of the constitution, and the constitution was therefore ratified by a majority of all the registered voters of South Carolina; so that if the law never had been changed, the constitution would have been adopted by the voters of that State.

I next come to the State of Georgia. In the State of Georgia, according to this same official report made from the headquarters of the third military district by Major General Meade, there were 191,501 registered voters; the half of which is 95,750. There were cast for the constitution in Georgia, according to the same official authority, 89,007 votes, which deducted from 95,750, half of all the registered voters, shows that less than half voted for the constitution in Georgia by 6,743, but not so great a proportion less as in Alabama. In Alabama the difference between the vote for the constitution and half of the registered voters was 18,099, while in Georgia, with a much larger registered vote the difference was only 6,743, so that the State of Georgia adopted her constitution by a much larger vote in proportion than was cast for the constitution in the State of Alabama. There were cast against the constitution in Georgia, at the same time, seventy-one thousand votes, so that there voted on the question, in the State of Georgia, one hundred and sixty thousand.

I come next to the State of Louisiana. It appears by this same official report that there were in the State of Louisiana, 129,654 registered voters; one half of that number would be 64,827. There were cast for the constitution in Louisiana 66,152 votes. A majority of all the registered voters of the State voted for the constitution, a majority of 1,325, so that the constitution of Louisiana was adopted by an actual majority of all the registered votes, leaving out the large vote which was cast against the constitution in that State, being 48,739.

I come next to the State of Florida. In the State of Florida, according to the registration, there were 28,003 votes, one half of which is 14,001; and there were cast for the constitution, according to the report from the General of the Army, 14,511 votes which is a majority of 510 votes of all the registered voters of the State.

Thus it is seen that in every State except Georgia an actual majority of all the registered voters voted for the constitution. In the State of Georgia it only lacked 6,743 of being a majority of all the votes voting for it, and one hundred and sixty thousand voters in Georgia voted on the question. Now, what becomes of the statement made in the Senate in order, to induce the Senate to adopt a constitution for the people of the State of Alabama, which was only carried by a minority vote, that that constitution had more votes in its favor than the constitution in any other of these reconstructed States? The gentlemen have labored under a misapprehension in their zeal and their anxiety to have these States recognized, which is no greater than mine. I am as anxious for the early recognition of these States as any member upon this floor; but I cannot consent to violate fundamental principles; I cannot consent to force upon the people of any State by a minority vote a fundamental law; I cannot consent to break the faith of this nation for the purpose of bringing Alabama into this bill.

With all these facts before us, how is it that the State of Alabama is to be forced in here to embarrass the bill under consideration? We have a bill here embracing five States, North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, and Florida, each one of which has ratified its constitution in accordance with the law.

Mr. MORTON. With the permission of the Senator I should like to ask him a question.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator quotes from the law the provision requiring a majority of the registered voters to vote on the question. Now, I wish to quote from the latter part of the same section and ask him the construction he gives to it:

"And if it shall moreover appear to Congress that the election was one at which all the registered and qualified electors in the State had an opportunity to vote freely and without restraint, fear, or the influence of fraud, and if the Congress shall be satisfied that such constitution meets the approval of a majority of all the qualified electors in the State, and if the said constitution shall be declared by Congress to be in conformity with the provisions of the act to which this is supplementary, and the other provisions of said act shall have been complied with, and the said constitution shall be approved by Congress, the State shall be declared entitled to representation, and Senators and Representatives shall be admitted therefrom as therein provided."

I want to know what meaning is to be attached to that part of this section which says that if Congress shall be satisfied that the constitution is approved by a majority of the registered voters, the State shall be received? Does it mean anything, or not?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will tell the Senator from Indiana what I suppose it to mean. I recollect very well when this clause was put in, and the object that was had in view in inserting it. It was this: that Congress meant to hold in its hands the power to still refuse to recognize these States in case it was satisfied that the constitutions were carried fraudulently; or if there was any cause which, in the opinion of Congress, ought to prevent the recognition of a State, it would not tie up its hands in advance, so that it could still refuse to recognize them. It was to reserve this power, but it was never intended to do away with the previous provision in the first part of the section.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The provisions are not at all inconsistent.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Not at all. The object of the latter clause was what I have just stated, and it never entered into the mind of anybody, when this law was passed, that a State was to be recognized as having adopted its constitution unless a majority of all the registered voters took part in the election. The Senator from Indiana knows that very well, for he and I both struggled against the adoption of that clause.

Mr. MORTON. One question more. Was not that clause equally intended to cover a case where the constitution was defeated by fraud or the use of improper means?

Mr. TRUMBULL. In my judgment it was not.

Mr. MORTON. I think it was.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let me ask the Senator from Indiana how can he reason that Congress should be satisfied that "the constitution meets the approval of a majority of all the qualified electors" in the State, when it appears that one hundred thousand took no part under a law that did not require them to take part? I objected to that part of the law; but nevertheless it was the law. How can he say that sixty-nine thousand votes in favor of a constitution afford any evidence that it is a constitution which is satisfactory to one hundred and seventy thousand?

There is another view of this case which I will present, although I have spoken at greater length than I intended when I rose. I think we must pass some bill in regard to Alabama, and I shall be ready to cooperate in the passage of a bill in regard to the State of Alabama, and perhaps to pass the bill which the House of Representatives has already passed. That House has passed a bill recognizing the State officers elected there under this constitution in order to put the government in the hands, as they say, of loyal men. That bill, which is similar to the one that was introduced in this body by the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. STEWART,] has already passed the House of Representatives and is now pending in the Committee on the Judiciary, and I trust, if Alabama is not inserted in this bill, we shall take up that bill and act on it. But I beg of Senators, whatever may be their views in regard to Alabama, to look for a moment at this other view: there is certainly distinction between the condition of Alabama and that of any other of these States; and why not let Alabama go by itself even if you propose to recognize the State government? If you put it in this bill you embarrass the bill, and there is very great danger of our losing the whole; and shall five States be held back in consequence of this difference between the condition of Alabama, and the condition of each of the other five States? Senators will bear in mind that Alabama was inserted in this bill in the House of Representatives by a tolerably close vote. I do not recollect the exact vote, but it was only a small majority. I believe it was at one time voted out and afterward put in by a small majority. Although it is possible that the two Houses might agree if the Senate should insist upon keeping Alabama in this bill, to pass the bill in that form, we still run a hazard of losing the bill by reason of putting another State into it; and what reason can be given for it? I do not see what the reason is. There certainly is no reason for putting any two States together. It may be a little more convenient in legislation, but there is no principle in it. We might take each State up separately, Alabama, North Carolina, Georgia, and South Carolina. It is only a matter of convenience that they are here put together at all.

Mr. CONNESS. Will my friend permit me?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Certainly.

Mr. CONNESS. There are two reasons why more than one State should be put in at a time; first, convenience—

Mr. TRUMBULL. That I concede.

Mr. CONNESS. Next, necessity. The same necessities that exist for the admission of the other States, exist in like degree for the admission of Alabama, and it is not wise to be extending this session and introducing half a dozen bills for what we can do in one, and I would have been pleased that the State of Arkansas had been in the same bill.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I conceded that it would be a matter of convenience, but I do not see the necessity, nor do I see that the Senator from California gives any necessity for it. He says it will prolong the session; that may be so; but that is a matter of convenience and not of necessity. Each of these States might be in a bill by itself so far as any necessity is concerned, because surely admitting these States to representation one by one would accomplish the object just as well as if they were admitted altogether. The word "necessity" it seems to me can hardly be applied to it. There is a matter of convenience.

Mr. CONNESS. I used it in reference to this State and its conditions.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will admit that there is the same disorganization and difficulty in Alabama as in the other States, and I have already stated in the hearing of the Senator from California that I thought some legislation was necessary to remedy that condition of things, and I shall be quite ready to cooperate in such legislation as the Senate may be able to agree upon in regard to it.

I ought to say one other word in regard to the registration. The official documents from which I read are documents that were communicated before the correction was made in Alabama of the registration. The official document from which I read was communicated to Congress on the 7th of May, 1868, and it gives the registered voters in those States at the time the communications were made to the commanding general by the military commanders in the various districts; and in Alabama I see that the registered vote is stated at 165,813. I believe that does not contain the additions. I suppose it does not, because I have seen it stated somewhere else that there were one hundred and seventy thousand registered voters in Alabama; and I suppose that arises from the additions that were made after the registration was opened.

Mr. WILSON. Will the Senator allow me to say a word?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON. There were some four or five thousand added to the registration; but by a mistake in that State, which was not applied to the others, the people who had died or moved away were not stricken off by the registrars. There ought probably to have been eight or ten thousand names stricken off on that account. Then there were four counties with thirteen thousand registered votes, where there was no election; in one of them there were twenty-nine hundred votes, but the ballot-box was stolen. Take out thirteen thousand for those four counties and you reduce the registration to one hundred and fifty-six thousand. Now that I am up I will say to the Senator from Illinois that he has made a great mistake—

Mr. SHERMAN. I mean to correct him in regard to the figures.

Mr. WILSON. Then I will leave it to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I read from this document communicated on the 7th of May, and I was stating that I understood there had been in the correction of the registration in Alabama some four or five thousand added to it. That official statement I have not before me, but I suppose that accounts for the discrepancy between the one hundred sixty-five thousand reported in this document and the one hundred and seventy thousand. It is possible, also, that there may have been similar corrections in other States, though I have not the evidence of it.

Mr. WILSON. There were. The Senator's figures are the basis on which they voted for the convention, they were largely increased in some of the States, carried up several thousand.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Is there any evidence of that communicated to Congress?

Mr. WILSON. It is not communicated to Congress officially; but I have seen statements of the fact in the papers.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There may have been such statements in the public prints; but I have not seen them. This official document from the head-quarters of the Army on the 7th of May is a late document, in answer to a resolution of the Senate. It contains a statement of the number of white and colored voters in each of the States subject to the reconstruction acts of Congress. It professes to give the number registered up to its date, May 7. It also gives the vote upon the question of calling conventions. If there is any other official document giving a correction of any of these lists, I have it not before me and I have not seen it except as to the State of Alabama; I understand four or five thousand votes were added there.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the statement I made to the Senate was perfectly true; and yet one would think, from the very confident manner in which the Senator from Illinois addressed me when putting the question, that there was no way to answer him; but it seems to me that if he had examined this subject with the care and solicitude its merits require, he would have known that he was misleading the Senate by reading to them the figures he did. What I said was that the number of persons who had voted for the constitutional convention and for the ratification of the constitution was greater in Alabama than in any other of these States. I should, perhaps, except South Carolina, because I have not the final return of South Carolina before me. The document here produced would tend to deceive any one who had not examined it.

Now, what are the facts of the case? These documents show that the number of registered votes in the State of Alabama were first one hundred and sixty-six thousand. They were subsequently increased to one hundred and seventy thousand by an illegal rectification of the registry. The number of votes cast for the convention in Alabama at the first election, (because the Senate must keep the distinction between the two elections, one for the convention and one upon the ratification of the constitution,) was ninety thousand two hundred and eighty-three, or sixty per cent. of the entire registered vote, more than one half. That election occurred early, perhaps in October or November, when the people could attend the polls, and the number who voted for the convention was ninety thousand two hundred and eighty-three.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I said nothing about the convention election.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You were speaking of the vote on the ratification of the constitution.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am coming to that in a moment. Now, the Senator assumes that only seventy thousand votes were cast in Alabama in the following election in February on the adoption of the constitution, and he compares that vote in Alabama, the second vote, not the first, with the vote on the convention in the other States. I say that in the document he has read from, there is no report whatever of a single vote cast on the adoption of any constitution.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I read from another document that does state it. Let me read from it again:

"HEADQUARTERS, ARMY OF THE UNITED STATES, WASHINGTON, D. C., May 12, 1868.

"In compliance with the resolution of the House of Representatives of May 11, 1868, I have the honor to submit the following statement of the number of votes cast for and against the constitutions of North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Louisiana, and Alabama, as reported by the several district commanders.

"North Carolina for the constitution"—

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator has read all that paper.

Mr. TRUMBULL. But I understood the Senator to say that I read in the other States the votes for the convention. I never read any votes for a convention.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will compare the lists of votes as they are furnished to us, and show how that stands. Now, I say take the vote for the convention in Alabama, with the vote for the convention in any of these States, and how does that vote compare?

Mr. TRUMBULL and Mr. EDMUNDS. That is not the question.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know that; but I will come to it. More interest was taken in the question of a convention in Alabama than in any other State, because there were more loyal people there. The whole of northern Alabama is peopled by loyal people, who were loyal at the beginning of the war. How was it afterward? You compare the votes of these States afterward. What were the circumstances under which the election was held in February? The Senator from Illinois said only seventy thousand voted; but how many had an opportunity to vote? Did every registered voter in Alabama have the opportunity to vote? Does the Senator say that? There were one hundred and sixty-six thousand registered. There was no election held in four counties where nobody could vote, and more than thirteen thousand registered voters lived in those four counties. Deduct those thirteen thousand and you have your registered list reduced to one hundred and fifty-three thousand. Under the law as it then stood nobody could vote unless he voted in the precinct where he was registered, and inconvenient polling places were selected. How many could not vote because of change of residence, of death, of many other causes? I have no doubt that the number who could vote in the election in Alabama was far less than one hundred and forty thousand. Indeed, the evidence before us shows that the number of voters was far less than one hundred and forty thousand. Seventy thousand, notwithstanding all the difficulties, all the impediments, all the obstructions, all the force and fraud, voted for the constitution in Alabama; and I say, in proportion to the actual number of votes and the legal votes that could have been cast in the election on that day, it was more than in any of these other States.

Now, let us look a little further. I will take the State of Virginia.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The State of Virginia has not voted on the constitution.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know that; but I wish to compare the vote. The total registered vote in the State of Virginia was 225,933. There were voting for the convention only 107,342. Only forty per cent. of the registered vote in Virginia was cast for the convention, while over sixty per cent. in Alabama was cast for the convention; and more than one half of those who could legally vote on the day of election voted for the constitution.

Take the case of North Carolina, where the vote for the constitution, it is true, was 92,690, and where the aggregate registered vote was 179,653. That is about fifty-five per cent. It is less than the proportion voting for the convention in Alabama, and more than the proportion voting on the constitution. But Senators must remember that when the voting occurred in North Carolina the law had been changed; people could vote where they lived; they had convenient voting booths; every man who was registered could vote in any part of the State wherever he was without regard to his place of registry; and yet I say, considering that circumstance alone, taking even North Carolina, where there was a greater and fuller expression of opinion than in any other of these States, the proportion is in favor of Alabama, because out of a total aggregate of one hundred and eighty thousand who could vote anywhere in the State of North Carolina only ninety-two thousand voted, while in Alabama, where not more than one hundred and thirty or one hundred and forty thousand could by possibility vote under the existing law, seventy thousand were found in the dead of winter, in February, under all the difficulties that surrounded them, to go to the election and cast their votes.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Do I understand the Senator to say that only ninety thousand voted in North Carolina?

Mr. SHERMAN. For the constitution.

Mr. FESSENDEN. But a great many voted against it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know that. The rebels in North Carolina, when the election came on, voted because we had changed the law; but now you want to enforce a law which you yourselves abandoned, a law that you yourselves confessed to be wrong, although you try yet to find reasons why you should not condemn it in your own mind, a law which we were compelled by public opinion and by our own judgment to abandon—you want to enforce that against the first and most eager of these States, that which was determined first to embrace the provisions of your law, that which did more to execute your law than any other, that which this day is as loyal as any State in the South, and perhaps more so. You have abandoned this stipulation and limitation as to all the other States. You have enabled their people, where ever they were in the State, without regard to the place of registry, to vote; you have enabled them to vote at a convenient season when they could go to the election polls; you have enabled them to vote under the most favorable circumstances; but you propose to enforce this hard restriction against that people who were most eager to accept your conditions. I say it is not right or fair.

Take the next case—South Carolina. There

I confess the statement I made was not literally true, because the aggregate registered vote was 127,432, and 70,758 voted for the constitution, or nearly sixty per cent. But even in South Carolina a less proportion voted for the constitution than had in Alabama voted for a convention; and when you compare the different circumstances under which the vote was taken in South Carolina, although the statement I made was not literally true, yet it was, considering all the circumstances, substantially true.

Now, take the State of Georgia. The total registered vote of Georgia—and here I beg the attention of the Senator who thought Georgia so strong a case—was 191,501. One half of that would be ninety-six thousand votes.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Ninety-five thousand seven hundred and fifty.

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, that is near enough; nearly ninety-six thousand. There were 89,070 votes for the constitution. I repeat that that is less in proportion than the vote cast in Alabama—not taking the whole registered vote, remember; but there were counties where a registered voter could not vote, and you have to deduct those, and I tell you the number of votes cast, of those who could by any possibility vote in Alabama, was forty-nine per cent. of the whole registered vote, while in Georgia it was only forty-six per cent. [Laughter.] Senators may laugh and jeer at this, but they cannot get over the facts. There were one hundred and eighty-nine thousand registered voters in Georgia. The election was held there in the most favorable season of the year, at a time when anybody could vote in any part of the State who had been registered according to law, and yet under that favorable condition only eighty-nine thousand voted for the constitution, or only forty-seven per cent. of the actual number of registered votes. When you make any fair and reasonable deduction from the aggregate vote of Alabama for the number of voters who could not vote in counties where there were no elections, and make a fair and reasonable calculation for those who could not vote on account of a change of residence, more persons voted for the constitution in Alabama than in Georgia, upon the figures presented by the Senator himself.

I have not had time to compare the case of Louisiana with that of Alabama; but take the case of Arkansas, where the number of registered votes—

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is not in this bill; not before us.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; but it was admitted under the lead of the Senator from Illinois. We passed a bill admitting the State of Arkansas; and what kind of an election was held there? A very dubious and doubtful one; a bare majority of voters in favor of the constitution; and the number of persons who actually voted for the constitution, if I am correct, were only two sevenths of the registered voters. I have not got the figures before me, because I have not had time to send for them, but that, if I remember aright, is correct.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Five sevenths altogether voted; about two and one half sevenths voted for the constitution.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator raises it a notch—two and one half sevenths voted for the constitution.

Mr. WILSON. Thirty-eight per cent.

Mr. SHERMAN. Thirty-eight per cent. of the registered votes, and yet we admitted them, although it was just an even scale whether a majority voted for or against the constitution; and yet now we propose to exclude, on a technicality which we ourselves have abandoned, a State which cast seventy thousand votes for the constitution and only fifteen hundred against it—a majority of over sixty-eight thousand for the constitution out of those who voted, at an election held under the most unfavorable circumstances. I say that such conduct as that would be utterly inconsistent, as it seems to me, with what is right and just and fair. I do not want to treat these new southern States in the spirit of technicality. I want to extend to them the welcome hand. God knows if I had my way I would sweep away all the disabilities that surround any portion of the people there. The very moment they yielded universal suffrage we ought to have cut away all the manacles that bound any portion of the people from participating in the elections. But taking your laws as they stand, I say that this State itself has done as much toward reclothing itself as any other State, and we cannot discriminate against it.

There is one argument that has been made in this matter that I never like to hear, and that is, that we cannot pass this bill over the veto because some Senators may hesitate about voting for the bill over the veto. Sir, we ought not to legislate in fear of any such declaration. I did not believe the declaration at the time when it was intimated, and I took the pains to ascertain, and I now say there is no ground for it. I believe that now Alabama stands as strong before this body as any other of these States, and a little more so. But if Senators will vote on this amendment according to their conscientious convictions of duty we can safely leave to other Senators who will haggle about Alabama to vote according to their sense of duty on this or the other votes. I have no doubt they will do as they think right in regard to all these votes; but I never could vote to except Alabama from this bill without doing violence to my conscience.

The Senator from Illinois seems to think we are lugging Alabama into this debate; that we are moving to put Alabama into this bill. Sir, Alabama is in the bill now. You are proposing to strike it out. It is true you do it in the form of a substitute by striking out the whole bill, Alabama, and all the rest, and putting in a substitute which has not Alabama in it. Now, we propose to amend your substitute so as to make it in harmony in that respect with the original bill. I say to the Senator from Illinois that if in this way, by a wholesale substitute, he strikes out Alabama from this bill, I will, as one member at least of the Senate, move to amend the House bill by adopting some of the wise provisions reported by the Committee on the Judiciary and leaving Alabama in. It is they that propose to strike Alabama out. It is they that propose to discriminate against a State that has done so much toward reconstruction. Sir, we stand here defending the proposition of the House—the action of the House. We are not here seeking to embarrass or defeat the bill by amending it. On the contrary, we are seeking to prevent the defeat or embarrassment of the bill by an amendment reported from the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. President, I am sorry that I have been led into this discussion, but I suppose there is no help for it. I trust we shall have a vote.

Mr. STEWART. I wish to say one word with regard to this subject. It will be recollected that immediately after we passed the law requiring a majority of the votes cast, instead of a majority of the votes registered, there was a large amount of registration immediately had. It is estimated that in some States it went as high as fifteen or twenty thousand. The lowest estimate made for Georgia was ten thousand. There has been no official promulgation of the number; but taking the best estimates we can get of that—and my statement was made upon those estimates—Alabama cast a larger vote in proportion to the registered votes than almost any of the other States. In the case of Alabama they also continued to register up to about the time the vote was taken, and those were all counted. They returned the registration up to the time of election, because then it was material to have that return to know how many were registered, to see if there was a majority voting.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator from Nevada will allow me, in my statement I took the registration of Alabama at the same time that I took the others.

Mr. STEWART. Made at a subsequent period.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I did not take the last into my calculation. I just took the official document of all of them as given at the same time.

Mr. STEWART. I want to explain that the official document does not show the real facts.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It shows as near the real facts in the other States as in Alabama. The presumption is, it would show it as near in any other State as it did in Alabama; that it would be fair in reference to one as well as the other.

Mr. STEWART. The Senator does not understand the facts yet. In Alabama you have returned with the return of the election the whole number of votes registered and the whole number of votes cast. In the other States in this list you have not the whole number of votes registered, but you have got the whole number of votes cast. Now, I wish the Senate not to be misled with regard to it. Senators will remember seeing it in the public prints that the whites started in and registered very rapidly immediately after we passed the law making a majority of the votes cast determine the question. The whites then at once registered. In Georgia the estimate is that ten, fifteen, or twenty thousand registered. There has been no return of it, but certainly it was a large number. Take the lowest estimate and add it to the number of registered votes returned, and you will find that Georgia did not begin to do as well as Alabama. I have not the figures before me, but a gentleman called at my room and took the estimates made in the public prints of the increased registration, and he came to the conclusion, upon a very careful examination, that Alabama had cast a larger vote in proportion to the registration at the time the election took place than any of the other States except South Carolina, and I believe that to be true.

Mr. HOWE. I wish to ask the Senator where he gets the number who were registered in Alabama under the operation of this last law?

Mr. STEWART. There was no further registration had there under the last law. They had taken their vote; but in order to determine the question whether the constitution was adopted or not they give us the whole number registered up to the date of voting, and they give us the vote; but subsequently—

Mr. EDMUNDS. Where do you get the evidence of that?

Mr. STEWART. I have no official evidence of the number that were registered after we passed the law; but we must take newspaper reports and the statements of gentlemen. We know that the registration was opened in every State, and that the whites commenced registering; and from those who have given the subject careful consideration and the best information I can get I have come to the conclusion that the statement I made was strictly correct. That it is substantially correct there is no doubt.

Mr. HOWE. Has the Senator any evidence which satisfies him that the percentage of the people in Alabama who registered after the change in the law was not as great as it was in Georgia?

Mr. STEWART. Yes; I have enough to satisfy the Senator. There was no registration in Alabama after the change in the law, because the vote had already been taken before the change of the law.

Mr. HOWE. But I understood the Senator to say that the registration was opened in Alabama and the rest of these States?

Mr. STEWART. No; I say the registration was opened from time to time in Alabama; there was more registration after the first registration; but it was all counted at the time in the return of the vote, because it required a majority of the votes registered to carry the constitution. So the district commander, in making his return, gives the number of votes registered at the time of the election, and the number of votes cast at the election. Then we passed a law making the majority of the votes cast determine the election. Immediately after that there was a large amount of registration in each of these States. In Georgia the lowest estimate of it is ten thousand. Add ten thousand to the registered vote of Georgia, as returned here, and then take the vote of Georgia for the constitution, and the percentage of votes for the constitution in Georgia will fall far short of being as great as it was in Alabama. Take North Carolina, and add some fifteen thousand there to the registered vote returned, and you will produce a similar result.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You have got into the region of speculation now.

Mr. STEWART. It is not in the region of speculation. We know it as a matter of fact. We have not the report of the registration; but we know that the registration went on rapidly and vigorously after we passed that law. We have got no report on the subject; but we know it as a matter of fact.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The fact that you do not know it makes it speculation.

Mr. STEWART. We know it went on. We do not know the full extent; but the lowest estimate will fully bear out the statement made by the Senator from Ohio and myself as substantially true.

Mr. HOWE. I should like to ask the Senator one more question. Is there any evidence which ought to satisfy us that the percentage in Alabama who did not register at all, and who would or might have registered if the time had been extended to them as it was to the others, was not as great as those who did register in Georgia or South Carolina?

Mr. STEWART. Is there anything to show that if they had registered they would not have voted on our side?

Mr. HOWE. No; I have not anything to show that.

Mr. STEWART. Does that affect the proposition that we made? I say you have not the full registered vote here in this statement; and that, taking the public prints and making a fair estimate as given in the public prints, the statement I made was substantially correct.

Mr. HOWE. Now, I meet the Senator by saying I am perfectly willing he should make the estimate for the other States if he will let the Senator from Illinois make the estimate for Alabama or let me do it.

Mr. STEWART. But the Senator from Illinois was not making estimates. He was taking the account of the registration. That was given before the registration was complete; but there were ten or fifteen thousand added to each registration after this report was made and after we passed our law. With these facts before us, and the further fact that they did not vote in several counties of Alabama, the further fact that these storms existed, and the crowning fact that Mr. Forsyth, the mouthpiece of the gentlemen who called upon Congress to instruct us, stated that by removing a loyal general of the Army, General Swayne, they had prevented twenty thousand Union votes being cast.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think all that was prevented by that removal was that distinguished general coming to the Senate.

Mr. STEWART. Then you and Mr. Forsyth differ. Mr. Forsyth said in his paper, "As we predicted, and as we told Mr. Johnson, we have gained twenty thousand votes by the removal of General Swayne."

Mr. NYE. I hope my colleague will not get up any question of veracity between the Senator from Indiana and Mr. Forsyth, because they will come together next month, and it may be unpleasant. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEWART. Mr. Forsyth says he told Andrew Johnson that if he did not take General Swayne away they would lose the State, and taking him away enabled them to prevent the consummation of what he terms this "great wrong," by keeping twenty thousand loyal voters from voting. That is a matter of speculation to be taken into the account when everything else is. This was the boasted fulfillment of a prediction Forsyth & Company had made with regard to Alabama if they could get General Swayne away.

Sir, Alabama can stand as well as any other State, and I reiterate that the object of submitting this question to a vote at all was to ascertain if there were loyal men enough in the State willing to accept the congressional plan, to sustain a loyal State government. That was the object, and the whole object. We could have admitted them without having any voting done at all. We could have admitted them just as we pleased. The object was to test that fact. Any man who will investigate what has been done in Alabama and what has been done in the other States, will come to the conclusion that Alabama is the foremost of them all; perhaps the strongest in its loyal element of any except South Carolina. South Carolina appears to stand first; Alabama is only second to South Carolina; so that, with the evidence before us, it seems to me we have ascertained beyond a doubt that Alabama is as well prepared as any of the other States, and a little better prepared than most of them to be received. Why keep her out? Upon what basis do you let the others in?

I repeat, Alabama has shown herself as well entitled to be admitted as any of these States, and it is necessary to have her and Florida admitted for the purpose of ratifying the constitutional amendment. Another thing that makes me more in favor of it than I was is, that I find Forsyth & Company are very much opposed to it; I find those who are opposed to the Government opposed to it; and I find my Democratic friends rallying against it; and therefore I am pretty certain it is right. I find my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. DOOLITTLE] against it, and that is the highest evidence that it is right. That will be conclusive to his constituents that it is right. I find the same elements against this measure that I find against any effort that has been made to restore the Union. I find the friends of restoration, the loyal men in Alabama, and the loyal men in the South and in the North in favor of it. I find myself in favor of it in very good company, and I find myself against the common enemy. I do not think, therefore, that we are called upon to split hairs in regard to this matter.

We have got the substantial thing. We have ascertained the will of the majority of the people of Alabama. If the rebels have been able, through getting a loyal general removed, through violence at the polls, through fraud, to prevent a technical majority; if they have been able by means of all the elements in their favor, by means of counting all the dead, all the missing, all that had left the State, and all that they could change from one plantation to another, to prevent a majority of the registered votes being cast for the constitution, it matters not to me so long as there is substantial evidence that they are not able to drag down the government if we set it up; and that is as much evidence that Alabama can stand as any other of these States.

If Alabama cannot stand, there is no use in setting up any of them; they will all be in rebel hands and the loyal men will be driven out of all of them, if they are driven out of Alabama. Why not let them all stand together? It will make them stronger, and they will be the more likely to stand? Why cast a doubt upon the ability of Alabama to maintain a republican form of government by making this unjust discrimination when every man knows that she is as well prepared in fact as any of the others? Why discourage the loyal men there and tell them they are weak and cannot stand, and ought not to come into the Union? Why this discrimination against Alabama? Is there any substantial reason for it? I do not believe in saying to a State that is as well prepared to come in as any, with the strongest Union party there is in any State in the South except South Carolina, "You are not strong enough to stand," and then postpone their admission until it gets so late that it cannot be consummated at this session, postpone it until you destroy the Union element there and wear it away.

These delays, these uncertainties, these disparagements are breaking down the friends of loyalty throughout the South. You have your Buchanans throwing their obstructions in the way. You have the emissaries of the dissolution of the Union, of destruction, of obstruction, at work upon your friends, the friends of the Union, and the friends of the Union doubting whether they have any friends anywhere. Receive them; stand by them; give them the hand of fellowship; and I tell you they will stand by us.

If, with all the patronage and power of these local State governments against them, with the military substantially against them, with the power of Andrew Johnson against them, poor, without patronage, without power, without position, without wealth, ignorant, as the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DOOLITTLE] says they are, they could get a majority for a convention, if they could make the showing they have made in the several States under such circumstances, I am willing to trust them under more favorable auspices. With the powers of these States in their hands, with legitimate protection, they will stay in the Union. If they cannot do it now, when can they? After this struggle, if you will not protect them now, when will they be better prepared? After they shall have suffered a defeat at your hands here, after they shall have been thrown aside without a rallying point, after you have said to them, "You have got no loyalty, no Union party, no strength, and we will have nothing to do with you;" after they shall have been trampled down for another six months by the power of that tyrannical local government, will they be better prepared to come here? Sir, we want action on the admission of all these States, and action promptly. Keeping part of them out will continue this discussion and this effort to bring them in until the session will have expired. Let us do the work now. Arkansas ought to have been with these other States. We should have had the whole of them in one bill. I am satisfied we made a mistake in that regard. Do not let us make any more.

Mr. WILLEY. If it be the desire of the Senate to take a vote upon the pending bill to-night, I, of course, do not desire to protract the discussion; but if the vote cannot be reached to-night, I should be very glad to have the privilege of submitting some remarks upon it. If there can be a vote reached now I will not trespass upon the attention of the Senate.

Mr. HENDRICKS. With the permission of the Senator from West Virginia, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before putting that question the Chair will lay before the Senate several bills from the House of Representatives for reference.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I suppose that resolution makes it proper that I should modify my motion that we adjourn to meet at eleven o'clock to-morrow. ["No!" "No!"] Senators say not. I do not understand the subject. Mr. NYE. I ask the Senator from Indiana to withdraw the motion to adjourn for one moment.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, it is usual to adjourn at religious meetings after a happy exhibition, and I thought the Senator from Nevada was so happy that it was about time to adjourn, and I therefore submitted the motion.

TAXATION OF UNITED STATES BONDS.

The SPEAKER. The next business in order during the morning hour is the call of States and Territories for resolutions, commencing with the State of Indiana, where the call rested on Monday last, at the expiration of the morning hour.

A resolution is pending, offered by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] the House having refused to second the previous question upon it. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The resolution was read as follows:

Resolved, That, in the judgment of this House, the bonds and other securities issued by the United States, and which are exempt by law from State and municipal taxation, ought to be taxed for national purposes in amount substantially equal to the average tax imposed on property in the several States for local purposes, in such manner as may substantially equalize taxation, the tax to be deducted from the coupons as they become due; and that the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to report a bill for the purpose above expressed.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE. Is a motion to refer this resolution to the Committee of Ways and Means now in order?

The SPEAKER. That motion is in order.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE. Then I submit that motion.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. My point of order is that there is now pending a motion to lay the resolution on the table. The Globe does not show that fact, but that is the entry upon the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The Globe shows that the morning hour expired pending the call for the previous question. And the recollection of the Chair is that the morning hour expired while the tellers were engaged in counting the House upon seconding the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN. The Journal shows that the motion to lay on the table was made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] and was pending when the morning hour expired.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no recollection of entertaining the motion to lay on the table pending the call for the previous question. [After a pause.] The Chair has examined the Journal, and it shows that the motion to lay the resolution upon the table was made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] and that that motion was pending when the morning hour expired. As the Journal is the authority for the House, the first question will be upon the motion to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. HOLMAN. Upon that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BLAINE. If the motion to lay on the table should not prevail, will a motion to refer the resolution to the Committee of Ways and Means be next in order?

The SPEAKER. The motion to refer would then be in order; but it might not be the next motion in order.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 16, nays 100, not voting 73; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, James M. Ashley, Dawes, Griswold, Harding, Higby, Hooper, Jenckes, Miller, Moorhead, Starkweather, Aaron F. Stevens, John Trimble, Van Aernam, William B. Washburn, and Wood—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Allison, Delos R. Ashley, Axtell, Baker, Barnes, Beaman, Beatty, Benjamin, Blaine, Boyer, Bromwell, Brooks, Buckland, Burr, Butler, Cake, Churchill, Reader W. Trimble, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upson, Van Auker, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Van Wyck, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, Windom, and Woodward—100.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Anderson, Archer, Arnell,

Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Woodbridge—73.

So the resolution was not laid on the table.

Mr. BLAINE. I move to refer the resolution to the Committee of Ways and Means; and upon that motion I call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to refer; for that is a motion to kill the resolution.

Mr. ALLISON. How does the gentleman assume that a reference to the Committee of Ways and Means will defeat the resolution?

Mr. HOLMAN. Of course every gentleman understands that the reference of this resolution will kill it; for it will bury it in the committee, and prevent an expression on its merits.

The yeas and nays were then ordered.

The question was taken upon the motion to refer; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 88, nays 34, not voting 67; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Beatty, Benjamin, Blaine, Bromwell, Buckland, Butler, Cake, Churchill, Reader W. Trimble, Van Auker, Van Trump, Windom, and Woodward—34.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Anderson, Archer, Arnell, Bailey, Barnum, Beek, Benton, Bingham, Blair, Boutwell, Brooks, Broomall, Cary, Chanler, Sidney Clarke, Covode, Dawes, Dixon, Ela, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Finney, Fox, Glossbrenner, Griswold, Halsey, Hawkins, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulbard, Humphrey, Hunter, Jones, Kelley, Kelsey, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Lynch, Marshall, Marvin, McCullough, Mungen, Nicholson, Nunn, Orth, Perham, Pike, Plants, Poland, Pruyn, Robertson, Robinson, Ross, Sawyer, Shanks, Smith, Spalding, Thaddeus Stevens, Taffe, Burt Van Horn, Ward, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Woodbridge—67.

So the resolution was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

EXTRA PAY OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 291) giving additional compensation to certain employes in the civil service of the Government at Washington, on which he demanded the previous question.

Mr. UPSON. Is this resolution in order under this call?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. UPSON. Cannot the question of reception be raised?

The SPEAKER. The question of reception can be raised on any proposition of this kind. If the gentleman raises the question of consideration, the Chair will submit it to the House.

Mr. SELYE. I want to debate this resolution. I am opposed to it.

The SPEAKER. If the previous question should not be seconded, the gentleman will have the privilege of debating the resolution whenever it may come up for consideration; but debate upon it to-day will carry it over.

Mr. UPSON. Let the resolution be read.

The joint resolution, which was read, provides that there shall be allowed and paid out of any money applicable to the purpose, heretofore or hereafter to be appropriated to the same classes of officers and other persons in the civil service of the United States Government at Washington embraced in the joint resolution of Congress entitled "Joint resolution giving additional compensation to certain employes in the civil service of the Government at Washington," passed February 28, 1867, an additional compensation of twenty per cent. on their respective salaries as fixed by law, or where no salary is fixed by law upon their pay respectively from and after the 30th day of June, 1867, to the 30th of June, 1868. But if any such officer or other person shall have performed service for less than one year, he is to be allowed the twenty per cent. only upon the actual sum he shall have received for such service. So much of such additional compensation as may be due to the employes of the Patent Office is to be paid out of the funds of that office. The resolution is not to apply to persons whose salaries as fixed by law exceed $2,500 per annum. No person who has served in the confederate army, so called, is to be entitled to the additional compensation. The resolution includes such persons as have been employed in any capacity as laborers in any of the Departments.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be considered as read a first and second time, and the question is on ordering it to be engrossed for a third reading, on which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WASHBURN] demands the previous question.

Mr. MULLINS. I hope the previous question will not be seconded.

Mr. SELYE. I move that the resolution be laid on the table.

Mr. COBB. I desire to ask a question.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection, the gentleman can ask the question; but debate is not in order without unanimous consent.

Mr. COBB. I wish to inquire whether this resolution includes watchmen on the public grounds?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I will modify the resolution by changing the last clause. I desire it to include every laborer.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I wish to inquire whether the resolution includes clerks in the commissary department. They are as much entitled to extra compensation as any others.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. It includes all persons employed in any capacity in any department.

Mr. KOONTZ. Does it include the employes in the Government Printing Office?

Mr. MULLINS. Does it include the taxpayers, and that twenty per cent. shall be handed back to them?

Mr. HOLMAN. I also would like to know whether it embraces the $900 female clerkships?

Mr. RANDALL. I object to debate.

The question first recurred on Mr. SELYE's motion to lay upon the table.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 39, noes 48; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana, and Mr. SELYE.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. We will have to have the yeas and nays; and I demand them.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 44, nays 71, not voting 74; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Baker, Beaman, Beatty, Benjamin, Benton, Bromwell, Buckland, Butler, Reader W. Clarke, Coburn, Cook, Covode, Cullom, Eggleston, Fields, Getz, Haight, Harding, Hill, Holman, Hulburt, Judd, Koontz, Laffin, George V. Lawrence, Loughbridge, Maynard, McCarthy, Mercer, Mullins, Newcomb, Nunn, Pile, Polsley, Scofield, Selye, Taylor, Upson, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Welker, and William Williams—44.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Delos B. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Axtell, Baldwin, Banks, Barnes, Boyer, Barr, Calk, Churchill, Cobb, Cornell, Dawes, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eldridge, Ferriss, Ferry, Golladay, Gravely, Grover, Higby, Hopkins, Hotchkiss, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Johnson, Julian, Kerr, Kitchen, Lincoln, Logan, Mallory, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrell, Morrissey, Myers, Niblack, O'Neill, Paine, Peters, Plants, Pomeroy, Randall, Raum, Schenck, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Starkweather, Aaron F. Stevens, Stokes, Stone, Taber, Taffe, Thomas, John Trimble, Lawrence S. Trimble, Trowbridge, Twichell, Van Auker, Burt Van Horn, Van Trump, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, Windom, and Woodward—71.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Anderson, Archer, Arnell, Bailey, Barnum, Beck, Bingham, Blaine, Blair, Boutwell, Brooks, Broomall, Cary, Chanler, Sidney Clarke, Delano, Dixon, Ela, Eliot, Farnsworth, Finney, Fox, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Griswold, Halsey, Hawkins, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Hunter, Jones, Kelley, Kelsey, Ketcham, Knott, William Lawrence, Loan, Lynch, Marshall, Marvin, McClurg, McCormick, McCullough, Munger, Myers, Nicholson, Orth, Perham, Phelps, Pike, Poland, Price, Pruyn, Robertson, Robinson, Ross, Sawyer, Shanks, Smith, Spalding, Thaddeus Stevens, Stewart, Van Aernam, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Wood, and Woodbridge—74.

So the House refused to lay the joint resolution on the table.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I have not time.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 46, noes 38; no quorum voting.

The morning hour expired, and the resolution went over to Monday next.

RECEPTION OF CHINESE EMBASSY,

The SPEAKER. The pending question is the motion to lay upon the table the conference report on the Arkansas bill. But the Chair will now lay before the House his correspondence with the Chinese embassy.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

WASHINGTON, June 6, 1868.

YOUR EXCELLENCIES: I am directed by a unanimous vote of the House of Representatives to tender you a public reception and welcome, at its Representative Hall, on Tuesday next, at eleven a. m., and to solicit your acceptance thereof. If your duties allow you to respond favorably, a committee of members of the House will, at that hour, accompany you from the Speaker's room to the Hall.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, yours,

SCHUYLER COLFAX,

Speaker.

To the CHINESE EMBASSY, Metropolitan Hotel, Washington.

THE CHINESE LEGATION,

WASHINGTON, June 8, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 6th instant, acquainting me that the House of Representatives has been pleased by a unanimous vote to tender myself and associates a public reception.

We are deeply sensible of the distinguished honor it is thus proposed to do us; and we shall not fail to be in waiting at the Speaker's room at the hour designated to-morrow morning.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient humble servant,

ANSON BURLINGAME.

Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that a committee of three be appointed.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed as such committee Mr. SCHENCK, Mr. BANKS, and Mr. WOOD.

Mr. BROOKS. This will be a great occasion, and I suggest whether the Speaker should not invite the Senate to meet us here at that hour.

The SPEAKER. That would have to be done by resolution of the House.

Mr. BROOKS. I have such a resolution. This is a great Hall, and will accommodate a large number of spectators. It will probably be the only opportunity many will have to see the Chinese embassy.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Have the Senate taken any steps to invite the embassy to their Hall?

Mr. SCHENCK. It is probable that the Senate will do so.

Mr. BROOKS. If it does not meet with the approbation of the House I will not present it.

Mr. BUTLER. I object.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President, communicated to the House by Colonel WILLIAM G.

MOORE, his Secretary, informed the House that the President had approved and signed bills and a joint resolution of the following titles, namely:

An act (H. R. No. 658) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1869, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. No. 1117) to partially supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending on the 30th of June, 1868; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 278) to supply books and public documents to the national asylums for disabled volunteer soldiers.

RECUSANT WITNESS.

The SPEAKER. The attorneys of Charles W. Woolley request the Speaker to present his petition, which they think will purge his contempt. Any citizen of the United States has the right to petition the House of Representatives for reference under the rules. But the Chair, of course, when this is presented to him, has only the same privilege that any member of the House has, and no more, to submit it to the House.

Mr. BUTLER. I object. I move the following resolution, which I send to the Chair:

Mr. NIBLACK. I object. There is a privileged motion pending.

Mr. BUTLER. I withdraw it until Arkansas is disposed of.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Will the gentleman from Indiana allow me to offer a resolution of inquiry?

Mr. NIBLACK. I have no objection.

HAY CONTRACT.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Retrenchment be directed to inquire into all the facts and circumstances connected with alleged fraudulent hay contracts entered into in 1864 at Fort Smith, Arkansas, by W. J. Chandler, and report to this House.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Indefinite leave of absence was granted to Messrs. PERHAM, POLAND, CARY, and VAN HORN, of New York.

ADMISSION OF ARKANSAS.

The SPEAKER. The House resumes the business pending at the adjournment on Saturday last, being the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 1030) to admit the State of Arkansas to representation in Congress. No quorum voted on the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] to lay the report on the table. The tellers [Messrs. ELDRIDGE and BEAMAN] will resume their places.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 29, noes 89.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 27, nays 102, not voting 60; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Axtell, Barnes, Beck, Boyer, Brooks, Burr, Eldridge, Getz, Golladay, Grover, Haight, Holman, Hotchkiss, Johnson, Kerr, Morrissey, Niblack, Phelps, Randall, Sitgreaves, Taber, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Auker, Van Trump, Wood, and Woodward—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Delos B. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Banks, Beaman, Beatty, Benjamin, Benton, Blaine, Blair, Bromwell, Buckland, Butler, Calk, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Cornell, Covode, Cullom, Dawes, Delano, Dodge, Donnelly, Ferry, Fields, Garfield, Gravely, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Perry, Judd, Julian, Kitchen, Koontz, Laffin, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, Loughbridge, Mallory, Moore, Moorhead, Morrell, McClurg, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Nunn, O'Neill, Paine, Mullins, Myers, Newcomb, Nunn, O'Neill, Paine, Phelps, Pile, Plants, Polsley, Pomeroy, Price, Raum, Peters, Schenck, Scofield, Selye, Shellabarger, Starkweather, Aaron F. Stevens, Stewart, Stokes, Taffe, Taylor, Thomas, John Trimble, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upson, Van Aernam, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, William Williams, and Windom—102.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Anderson, Archer, Arnell, Bailey, Baker, Baldwin, Barnum, Bingham, Boutwell, Broomall, Cary, Chanler, Dixon, Eggleston, Ela, Finney, Fox, Glossbrenner, Halsey, Hawkins, Hill, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Jones, Kelley, Kelsey, Keycham, Knott, William Lawrence, Lynch, Marshall, Marvin, McCormick, McCullough, Mun- gen, Nicholson, Orth, Perham, Pike, Poland, Pruyn, Robertson, Robinson, Ross, Shanks, Smith, Spalding, Thaddeus Stevens, Stone, Burt Van Horn, Ward, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Woodbridge—60.

So the House refused to lay the report on the table.

The question recurred on seconding the previous question, and it was seconded.

The main question was then ordered.

Mr. BROOKS. I call for the reading of the conference report.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House No. 1039, to admit the State of Arkansas to representation in Congress, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment to the House bill, and agree to said bill with the following amendment added thereto: "Under laws equally applicable to all the inhabitants of said State: Provided, That any alteration of said constitution prospective in its effect, may be made in regard to the time and place of residence of voters;" and that the House agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the preamble to the bill, and agree to the same.

THADDEUS STEVENS.

F. C. BEAMAN,

Managers on the part of the House.

LYMAN TRUMBULL,

C. D. DRAKE,

HENRY WILSON,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. BROOKS. I ask for the reading of the first section of the bill as amended.

The SPEAKER. That is not usual, with conference reports. If there is no objection it will be read.

Mr. UPSON. I object.

Mr. BROOKS. Is the report susceptible of division?

The SPEAKER. It is not. It must be agreed to or rejected as a whole.

The conference report was agreed to.

Mr. BEAMAN moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RECEPTION OF CHINESE EMBASSY.

Mr. BUTLER. I rise for the purpose of withdrawing my objection to the resolution of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks.]

Mr. BROOKS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to.

Resolved, That the Senate be invited to join with the House of Representatives, in the Hall of the House, in the reception of the embassy of the Chinese empire to the United States of America, at eleven o'clock on Tuesday.

RECUSANT WITNESS.

Mr. BUTLER. I rise to a question of privilege. I report from the committee of investigation the following resolution:

Resolved That any communication from C. W. Woolley or his counsel, placed in the hands of the Speaker, be sent to the committee of investigation of this House, before which Woolley has been called to testify, for examination and report.

I demand the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a question of order. I submit that it is proper that the communication referred to should be read to the House, so that the House may be informed upon what it is voting.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will first decide the point of order made by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I want to know if this is a privileged resolution?

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman makes that point the Chair will rule upon it before deciding the other question.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I do.

Mr. BROOKS. We both make that point.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the point of order that the gentleman from Massachusetts has no right to report the resolution. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. BROOKS. That is not the point of order I make. It is that the committee of managers has not been in session for some days—the committee of investigation so called; that there is not a majority of the committee present in the city, and that the whole business has been conducted by two members of the committee, a minority of the committee, Messrs. BOUTWELL of Massachusetts, BINGHAM of Ohio, and WILSON of Iowa, having gone home some days since, and Mr. WILLIAMS of Pennsylvania having been absent for some days. Therefore no such report as this could possibly be made from the committee of investigation.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will rule upon that question. The committee are authorized to report resolutions at any time. The Chair does not know what has happened in the committee-room, as the Chair was not present. They may have referred this question to a sub-committee. They may have authorized the gentleman from Massachusetts at some previous session to offer this resolution if he desired to offer it. The Chair is not cognizant of what took place in the committee-room, and the gentleman from Massachusetts states for himself that he is authorized to make the report.

Mr. BROOKS. I will waive the point of order for the purpose of obtaining information from the gentleman from Massachusetts whether this resolution of his has not come from two or three, or from three only, of the committee of investigation, the majority of the committee being out of town, and whether it is possible for them to have been consulted on Mr. Woolley's communication submitted this morning, when the majority of that committee were not in town this morning.

Mr. BUTLER. I know what took place in our committee-room and the gentleman does not. I am not allowed to state what took place in the committee-room, and the gentleman would not be if he had any knowledge on the subject. Therefore I do not answer.

Mr. BROOKS. I make the point of order, then, that it is not possible for the committee to make a report, with a majority of the committee out of town, upon a communication submitted this morning when the majority of the committee are not here to do it. The gentleman from Massachusetts evades my question and does not choose to answer it.

The SPEAKER. It is not within the province of the Chair to know whether a majority of the committee are in town to-day or this week, or whether they authorized the resolution to be reported at some preceding meeting of the committee, if the gentleman states that he has authority to report it. As the gentleman from New York raises the question of reception, the Chair will submit it to the House.

Mr. BROOKS. We have no security at all, under a ruling of that sort, that any gentleman may not rise and say that the majority of the committee has authorized him to make a report. The gentleman from Massachusetts does not say that the majority of the committee have authorized him to make this report. He does not say that, and he dare not say it.

The SPEAKER. The question of any gentleman daring to say anything is not a question for the Chair to rule upon. If the gentleman from New York himself should rise in his seat and say that he was authorized by the Committee on Reconstruction or the Committee of Ways and Means, of both of which committees he is a member, to submit a report to the House, the Chair would not feel privileged to ask him whether he had been so authorized to-day or yesterday, last week or last month.

Mr. BROOKS. It gives the majority of the House the right to act upon the assumption of that kind made by any member.

The SPEAKER. This point will be decided as a similar point raised by the gentleman from

New York [Mr. Brooks] was decided the other day. The Chair will direct the Clerk to read the rule, to be found on page 55 of the Digest.

The Clerk read as follows:

"If it is disputed that a report has been ordered to be made by a committee the question of reception must be put to the House."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has raised the point that this resolution was not authorized by the committee to be reported to the House.

Mr. BROOKS. And the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Butler] does not say that he was authorized by the committee to report this resolution; he has not said that yet.

The SPEAKER. That is a question for the House to determine, having heard what has been said by the gentleman from Massachusetts as well as by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. The Chair will first submit this question to the House before entertaining any other point of order.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. What I desire to say relates to a part of the point of order now pending. In order that the question should stand as the Speaker rules, I supposed it was necessary that the person assuming to make a report should submit that report on behalf of the committee, and so state to the House; and that this is not a report of the committee, unless it is so presented.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, however, will state to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Eldridge] that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Butler] rose in his place and said: "Mr. Speaker, I submit a question of privilege from the committee on investigation, and offer the following resolution." That is the usual way of making a report. It is not for the Chair to challenge the statement made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, or the statement which might be made in the parallel case of the gentleman from New York cited by the Chair. That is a question for the House to determine.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Then would not a member of the minority of a committee have the same right to rise in his seat and say that he desired to present a report from the committee?

The SPEAKER. He would not. The gentleman in that case would rise and say that the minority of the committee asked leave to submit a report.

Mr. WOODWARD. Is not the communication referred to in that resolution to be laid before the House before we are called upon to vote upon the resolution?

The SPEAKER. That is the point of order raised by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. Holman,] and reserved until the point of order now pending can be decided.

Mr. WOODWARD. My difficulty is, I do not see how the House is to vote understandingly upon any question connected with this resolution without knowing what the communication is.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will rule upon that point of order after the point now pending shall have been decided.

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to make an inquiry of the Chair. Suppose this resolution be not received, would not the communication received by the Speaker as one of the Representatives from the State of Indiana be referred to the committee under the rule of the House by filing it with the Clerk in the ordinary way?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not like to state what his action will be. The House has refused to grant permission to the Chair to lay the communication before the House.

Mr. MAYNARD. My action would be somewhat governed by the decision of the Chair upon that point.

The SPEAKER. Any member of the House can present the communication by that mode. The question now is upon the point of order raised by the gentleman from New York, that this report is not authorized by the committee of investigation. The question is, Shall the report be received?

Mr. BROOKS. Upon that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to inquire of the Chair whether the communication of Woolley having been objected to, it is anywhere where this resolution can reach it?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine has misunderstood the resolution, which does not refer specifically to the communication the Speaker asked leave to present, but to all communications.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to inquire what is the precise question to be submitted to the House; for, as I understand, there was a good deal of misapprehension when a similar question was before the House the other day. Is the question as to the authority of the committee or the validity of the report of the committee when it is not made by a majority of the committee, or is it whether the House will receive the report notwithstanding it may have been reported by a minority?

The SPEAKER. The point made by the gentleman from New York is that this resolution was not authorized by the committee of investigation; he has stated the reasons why he so thinks. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] has made his statement on the other side, and the House has heard the statement. The Chair does not decide, because he does not know whether a majority of the committee authorized this report to-day or last week, or at any other time. The question now before the House is that indicated in the following extract from the Digest:

"If it is disputed that a report has been ordered to be made by a committee the question of reception must be put to the House."

It is the question of reception upon which the House is to vote.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 86, nays 37, not voting 66; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Beaman, Beatty, Benjamin, Benton, Blaine, Blair, Bromwell, Buckland, Butler, Calk, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Cornell, Covode, Cullom, Dawes, Delano, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Gravelly, Higby, Hill, Hooper, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Hunter, Ingersoll, Julian, Kitchen, Koontz, Laflin, Lincoln, Loan, Loughbridge, Mallory, McCarthy, McClurg, Mercur, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrell, Mullins, Myers, Nunn, O'Neill, Plants, Polaisy, Pomeroy, Price, Raum, Sawyer, Selye, Shellabarger, Starkweather, Stokes, Taylor, John Trimble, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upson, Van Aernam, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elisha B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, William Williams, and John T. Wilson—86.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Axtell, Baker, Barnes, Beck, Boyer, Brooks, Burr, Eldridge, Garfield, Getz, Golladay, Grover, Haight, Harding, Holman, Johnson, Kerr, Knott, George V. Lawrence, Marshall, McCormick, Morrissey, Niblack, Paine, Phelps, Pile, Randall, Schepck, Stewart, Stone, Taber, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Auker, Van Trump, Wood, and Woodward—37.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Archer, Arnell, Bailey, Banks, Barnum, Bingham, Boutwell, Broomall, Cary, Chanler, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Eggleston, Eln, Finney, Fox, Glossbrenner, Griswold, Halsey, Hawkins, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Jencks, Jones, Judd, Kelley, Kelsey, Ketcham, William Lawrence, Logan, Lynch, Marvin, Maynard, McCullough, Mungen, Newcomb, Nicholson, Orth, Perham, Peters, Pike, Poland, Prayn, Robertson, Robinson, Ross, Scofield, Shanks, Sitgreaves, Smith, Spalding, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Taffe, Thomas, Burt Van Horn, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—66.

So the resolution was received.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] will now state the point of order which he reserved.

Mr. HOLMAN. My point of order is this: that as this resolution refers to a paper or a communication, the House cannot be called to vote on the proposition without the paper itself being submitted to the House.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution, which will probably answer the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That any communication from C. W.

Woolley, or his counsel, placed in the hands of the Speaker, be sent to the committee of investigation of this House, before which Woolley has been called to testify, for examination and report.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order, as the resolution does not allude to any specific communication. Nor is the communication referred to by the gentleman from Indiana now in the hands of the Speaker, it having been taken by a member of the House.

Mr. WOODWARD. Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask a question.

The SPEAKER. It must be a question of order. Business cannot be interrupted except by a point of order.

Mr. WOODWARD. It is a parliamentary question, if not a question of order. If the Speaker has received any communication which is fit to be submitted to any committee of this House, I suppose it is fit to be submitted to the House; and I ask the Speaker to rule that any communication received by him in his character as Speaker of the House, if it be in decorous and proper language, belongs to the House, and that he is bound to lay it before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order, and will state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WOODWARD] that petitions are received by the Speaker every day, and that his uniform practice, as the gentleman will see by looking at the Globe, is to refer them, under the rules, to the appropriate committees, in the same manner as petitions presented by members are referred. The Speaker has not the right, under the rules, and does not claim to exercise it, to present petitions publicly except by the consent of the House.

Mr. WOODWARD. Now, Mr. Speaker, one other point, and I will trouble you no further. If I am wrong in supposing that the Speaker has received this as the organ of the House I have this to submit. If a paper received by the Speaker of this House be in the nature of purgation of the contempt which Woolley, the witness, has committed against this House, I submit it is his right that it be laid before the House, for that contempt, if any was committed, was against the House. There was no offense against the committee of which the gentleman from Massachusetts is spokesman this morning. The offense is against the dignity of the House. If that witness at any time, in any form, communicates to the House through the Presiding Officer, I suppose it is his right to have the paper laid before the House.

The SPEAKER. If the House authorized the Chair, as it has authorized this committee, to report propositions at any time, the Chair would exercise that power in this or any other case; but the House has conferred no such authority upon the Speaker, and he does not arrogate to himself any right not conferred by the rules.

Mr. RANDALL. Here is an American citizen in confinement who presents to you, Mr. Speaker, for presentation to this House a certain communication, and this House is called upon to vote in reference to that communication; and I say it is the privilege of any one member to call for the reading of that paper before the vote is taken.

The SPEAKER. If the paper had been received by the House when presented by the Chair that point would be well made; but the Chair does not believe, as the gentleman so seems to indicate, that the witness who, by the order of the House, is regarded as a recusant witness has the right to present a question of privilege. Questions of privilege are peculiar, and the rules in reference to them will be found in the "Digest." If a person in contempt of the House, declared to be in contempt of the rules and in defiance of the laws of the land, can raise a question of privilege, then every one of the forty million people not in contempt of the House can raise questions of privilege. Although the Speaker told the counsel that he was willing to present this paper, he does not see how he could rule this to be a question of privilege.

Mr. RANDALL. You received that communication.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did have it.

Mr. RANDALL. I say it was put in your possession as Speaker of the House, and the House ought to be made aware of the contents of that paper.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania as he has already stated, that he receives petitions every day, sometimes ten or a dozen, but he never claims that he has the right to present them as questions of privilege. Sending papers to the Speaker does not put them officially before the House.

Mr. BURR. Is there any way, but through the mercy of these two members of that committee, for this witness to purge himself of contempt?

The SPEAKER. Every Monday the States are called for resolutions, as the Chair stated some time ago, and when the State of Indiana was called, as it was to-day, any gentleman from that State had the right to offer a resolution on the subject.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Would not that deprive a citizen of his liberty for one week without opportunity for redress?

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot answer that. The State of Indiana was called for resolutions this morning, and a gentleman from that State [Mr. HOLMAN] introduced a resolution in reference to the taxation of Government bonds, on which the yeas and nays were taken several times. Any other gentleman from Indiana could have offered a resolution at that time on this subject as a matter of right.

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire to ask the Speaker whether his attention has been called to the one hundred and thirty-first rule, which is as follows:

"Members having petitions and memorials to present may hand them to the Clerk, indorsing the same with their names, and the reference or disposition to be made thereof; and such petitions and memorials shall be entered on the Journal, subject to the control and direction of the Speaker; and if any petition or memorial be so handed in, which, in the judgment of the Speaker, is excluded by the rules, the same shall be returned to the member from whom it was received."

I say when a member from Massachusetts presents a petition nobody can have supervision over it, as to whether there is anything disrespectful in it, but the Speaker. Is this not interposing a committee of this House to revise petitions? I am willing to do everything proper to push this investigation as much as any gentleman—to push it to the utmost against every man who may have offended against the laws. But I am not willing to abridge the right of petition. The point upon which I wish to ask information, without raising a point of order, is whether this resolution does not abridge the right of petition, by discharging the Speaker from the duty of looking into a petition to see whether it is respectful and within the rules of the House?

The SPEAKER. The uniform usage of Speakers has been, when petitions were sent to them, either to ask unanimous consent to present them, if they are of that character that they think the House would desire to have them presented, or to present them under the rule, as is the right of the Speaker as a member from a congressional district. The Chair has repeatedly presented petitions under the rule. Of course he examines them, and if he finds them improper to be presented he would not present them. He has received hundreds of petitions from the States of the South, and has always submitted them under the rule to the Journal clerk.

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to present a point of order. The Speaker having presented this petition, and the gentleman from Massachusetts having objected to its reception, what is its status? Is the paper anywhere within the control of the House?

The SPEAKER. It is a paper which has been handed to the Speaker by the counsel for the witness, they desiring him to present it to the House. The Speaker asked the consent of the House to receive it. It was objected to.

It would then be within the power of the Speaker, unless the counsel asked its return, to submit it under the rule, or return it at the request of a member to himself. The paper is not now in the possession of the Speaker; a member who thought he was authorized to ask for it on behalf of the witness has taken it.

Mr. SCHENCK. Is not the question now on the passage of the resolution which declares, in reference to a particular citizen, that his petition, memorial, paper, or whatever they may be, when presented, shall be sent to a committee to be investigated?

The SPEAKER. It speaks of all communications. It has been twice reported.

Mr. BUTLER. I would like to have a word to say about this resolution that almost every gentleman has raised a point of order upon or stated an objection to.

Mr. WOODWARD. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. BUTLER. No, sir; I will not. I have not had a word to say on this motion, and have been attacked on all sides.

Now, sir, I suppose that when a witness is in contempt of this House he has no right to make any communication to this body, except simply to say, "I am ready and willing to testify, and I will do as I was ordered;" and the House can protect itself against arguments or statements drawn up by counsel who are now on the floor of this Hall against the rules of the House, with the President's Private Secretary, consulting with members on the other side how this matter can be got through. I say I suppose that this House has a right to protect itself. And I suppose there is no necessity of any one's being exceedingly troubled about the right of petition. Nobody proposes to interfere with it. But we do propose that when a prisoner, for contempt of this body, is in the custody of the House, we can have his communication sent to some committee for the purpose of examining and making a report thereon, to be acted upon. And if any gentleman thinks the committee are too slow in reporting upon any communication he can ask for a report to be made. But I assure the House that the committee will not be too slow in this matter. The whole object of this is to get thirty or forty pages, more or less, by this perjured, defaulting, contemptuous, and contemptible witness published in the Globe. Do I understand the Speaker that the paper had been withdrawn?

The SPEAKER. It has been.

Mr. BUTLER. Well, that shows the utter contempt of the House. The question being raised in the House whether it will receive the paper, not wanting it to go to a committee, it is taken away from the Speaker's table while this matter is pending, and then the House of Representatives, representing the nation, is played with hour by hour by these conspirators, who are illegally upon this floor, undertaking to bring our proceedings into contempt.

Mr. BROOKS. I raise a question of order. I wish the gentleman's words taken down: "conspirators on the floor of this House."

The SPEAKER. The words will be taken down, and the Chair will rule upon them.

Mr. BUTLER. I said "illegally on the floor of the House."

Mr. BROOKS. The President's Private Secretary is legally on the floor of the House, and the counsel for the prisoner is legally here.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Is this question debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. BROOKS. Well, I make the point of order, and I ask that the words may be taken down.

The SPEAKER. The words have been taken down, and the Clerk will read them.

The Clerk read as follows:

"By these conspirators, who are illegally upon this floor, undertaking to bring our proceedings into contempt."

The SPEAKER. The words taken down do not embrace the previous words by which reference was made to certain individuals, and, as the Chair understood, to the counsel of the witness and the President's Private Secretary. The President's Private Secretary is, by the rules of the House, authorized to be on the floor of the House. He has just submitted a message from the President, and is, therefore, naturally here. The counsel for the witness, if they are not ex-members of Congress or otherwise coming within the rule, are not legally upon the floor of the House, as no consent has been granted to them to come upon the floor. The only remaining point is on the word "conspirators," and the Chair doubts whether the counsel for a person in imprisonment by the order of the House can be properly regarded as conspirators. It is their duty, as attorneys, to defend their client and to advance his interests within the range well known by the profession, and which the Chair will not attempt to limit; but they have no right upon the floor of the House, if the point is made, unless they are ex-members of Congress or privileged under the rules as holding some official position under the Government.

Mr. BUTLER. When I spoke of the President's Private Secretary—

Mr. BROOKS. I object to the gentleman going on until he obtains the consent of the House to proceed in order.

Mr. BUTLER. The Chair has not ruled me out of order yet.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York objects to the gentleman from Massachusetts proceeding except by the consent of the House.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not understand that the Chair has ruled me out of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has made a decision, but not ruled all the words out of order. The language on which the point of order was made involved three persons, and the Chair has decided in regard to one of those persons that the language certainly could not properly apply, the words used being "illegally upon the floor." In regard to the other two persons, the witness's counsel, the Chair thinks that the gentleman was not out of order in so stating, if they are not ex-members of Congress, and the Chair thinks they are not.

Mr. BUTLER. I was not speaking of any member of Congress. [Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to know whether the Chair has decided the point of order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has decided the point of order.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I understood him to rule the gentleman from Massachusetts out of order so far as his remarks applied to the President's Private Secretary.

The SPEAKER. So far as the Chair's decision went it was that that remark was clearly not in order, reference having been made, in previous words not taken down at the Clerk's desk, to the President's Private Secretary as one of the persons illegally on the floor of the House.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. And the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] objects to the gentleman going on without the consent of the House.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Speaker allow me an inquiry?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. How many Private Secretaries of the President have a right to come upon the floor?

The SPEAKER. Whoever is acting at the time as the President's Private Secretary in transmitting messages to the House.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I did not refer to any man acting as Private Secretary of the President. [Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object to the gentleman debating, after the point of order has been decided, until the question is determined by the House whether he shall be permitted to proceed.

Mr. BUTLER. I have not yet understood that I was ruled out of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decided that the gentleman's allusion to the President's Private Secretary was not in order.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Warden, the short-hand writer of the President, was the person I alluded to. [Cries of "Order!"]

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I desire to suggest that no allusion was made to the President's Private Secretary in the words to which the gentleman from New York took exception, and which were taken down.

The SPEAKER. The words taken down referred to the previous words which were uttered within the hearing of the House, but which were not taken down because they had been uttered some minutes before.

Mr. BUTLER. How does the Chair know that?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Butler] asks the Chair how he knows it. In the first place the gentleman from Massachusetts is not respectful to the Chair.

Mr. BUTLER. I beg pardon; I had no intention to be disrespectful. But how can the Chair know that certain words of mine referred to certain individuals? I referred to conspirators illegally on the floor of this House; there are more than one.

The SPEAKER. The words of the gentleman were, "these conspirators who are illegally upon this floor." The gentleman had previously stated that the President's Private Secretary and the attorney for the witness were illegally upon the floor of this House. Now, if the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Butler] will state that he did not intend these words—"these conspirators who are illegally upon this floor"—to be connected with the previous words—"the President's Private Secretary and the attorney for the witness who are illegally upon the floor of this House"—the Chair will withdraw his ruling.

Mr. BUTLER. I will state that I meant to refer to Mr. Merrick, the counsel for the prisoner, and W. W. Warden, the President's short-hand writer. And I want to know of this House if I have the right to refer to these men, when I have got telegram after telegram between these parties?

The SPEAKER. As the gentleman from Massachusetts does not say, in response to the inquiry of the Chair, that those words refer to different persons from those previously referred to by the gentleman, the Chair rules that the remark is out of order, so far as it relates to the Private Secretary of the President.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not refer to the Private Secretary of the President.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I insist that the gentleman from Massachusetts shall resume his seat until the House gives him permission to proceed.

Mr. MILLER. I move that the gentleman from Massachusetts have leave to proceed in order.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not care to say anything further now.

Mr. MILLER. Then I withdraw the motion.

Mr. BUTLER. I call the previous question.

Mr. SCHENCK. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I insist that the gentleman from Massachusetts cannot move the previous question while he is out of order.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman refer to the rule which sustains that point?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I refer to the rule which says that when a member has been ruled out of order he shall not proceed without permission of the House.

The SPEAKER. Shall not proceed with his speech. But he is not deprived of any right as a member reporting the resolution. He has the right to call the previous question; and if that call is sustained he will be entitled to the floor for one hour.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. While he is out of order, and without permission of the House?

The SPEAKER. Not in this hour, but in the hour after the previous question has been ordered.

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire to raise the point of order to which I referred when I was up before. I object that this resolution is not a resolution in order, as it proposes to change a rule of the House. I do this without any excitement, and with no desire for anything but justice to every one, no matter how wicked or bad he may be.

This resolution proposes that no communication coming from Charles W. Woolley to the Speaker shall be presented to the House, but it shall be at once sent to this committee for examination. The objection I have to the resolution is twofold: first, that it is out of order, because we cannot deprive the Speaker, as a Representative from the State of Indiana, of the right to present petitions, memorials, communications, &c., under Rule 131.

In the next place it is out of order because we cannot take away from the Speaker that supervision which we have given to him by the rule, to see whether a paper is proper to be presented to the House under the rules and to be referred to a committee. The object of that rule, I take it, was to enable the Speaker to see that nothing disrespectful to the House is presented.

I do not know what the paper is which the Speaker this morning asked permission to lay before the House, for it is not now before us. What is before us, as I understand it, is a general proposition contained in the resolution, that the Speaker shall no longer be trusted to exercise the discretionary power now vested in him to say whether any paper is proper to be laid before the House, but that a change shall be made in the rule. This, it strikes me, is a change of the rule adverse to the right of petition.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order made by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] because, if sustained, in the scope which it would naturally embrace, it would preclude the Speaker from presenting any petitions from his constituents. The argument of the gentleman from Ohio would go to this extent: that the Speaker cannot present a petition, because as by the rules he is required to supervise petitions and return to members any which he regards as excluded by the rules, therefore, if he presents petitions himself, they cannot be subject to the supervision contemplated by the rules. Now, there are in the constituency represented by the Speaker some forty thousand voters, and from some of these he is constantly receiving petitions. He also receives almost every day, and sometimes to the extent of a dozen a day, petitions from various parts of the South—the States not now represented. The Chair usually presents these petitions under the rules, as all previous Speakers have done; but in the case occurring to-day the Chair asked the consent of the House to present the communication publicly in the House. If the point of order made by the gentleman from Ohio should be sustained the Speaker would be required to hand to his colleagues for presentation all petitions received by him from his constituents and others, and afterward to examine them as Speaker to see whether they should be referred. The Chair could not make such a ruling as that; it would not be in accordance with the uniform usage.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not know whether I have been distinctly understood; but to narrow down the question, I would ask the Speaker's opinion upon this question of order: whether we can by a resolution change the rule of the House, so that a petition presented by the Speaker or any other member (for of course the rule applies as well to the Speaker as any other member) shall be submitted to some other authority than the Speaker for a decision whether it is proper to be entered on the Journal?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will respond to this branch of the point of order. He thinks the House can adopt a resolution of this kind, because it would be exactly in accordance with the rule, which provides that—

"Members having petitions and memorials to present may hand them to the Clerk, indorsing the same with their names, and the reference or disposition to be made thereof."

The resolution proposes to instruct the Speaker to refer petitions of a particular character in accordance with this rule. A note to the rule answers the point of order made some time ago upon the right of the Chair. That note states:

"There is now no other mode of presenting petitions prescribed by the rules; the old rule for presentation in the House having been rescinded December 12, 1853."

So that since December 12, 1853, it has been the rule that petitions cannot be presented in the House except by unanimous consent.

Mr. JONES. I rise to a point of order; but before making the point of order—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must make the point of order. A point of order is the only thing that can interrupt the action of the House, as the previous question is pending.

Mr. JONES. My point of order is this: whether any member of this body has a right to speak of a witness or a prisoner in the custody of this House as the member from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] spoke of the witness Woolley? He used these words: "this perjured, contemptuous, and contemptible witness." Now, I desire to say that I am not here to defend Mr. Woolley—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot debate the point of order. The Chair will rule upon it. He overrules the point of order, and if there were no other ground, certainly he must do so upon this, that the point was not made at the proper time. Any point of order upon language used in debate must be made at the time the words are spoken. But the Chair will state for the information of the House what his ruling would have been if the point had been made in time. In this case the committee of investigation charge the witness with having testified one way at one time and another way at another time. The question is whether that amounts to perjury. If the point of order had been made at the time upon the words uttered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, the Chair would have submitted that question for decision to the House, which, having heard the evidence submitted by the committee and knowing all the facts, could judge whether they justified the language used. But the point of order is not made at the right time, and therefore cannot be entertained.

Mr. JONES. Have I the power and the right to say a word?

The SPEAKER. Not now.

Mr. JONES. I should like to answer the member from Massachusetts.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. RANDALL. Was the petition addressed to you as Speaker?

The SPEAKER. It was addressed to me as Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. PILE. Has the petition been withdrawn?

The SPEAKER. It has not been withdrawn, but was taken by a member of the House.

Mr. PILE. If the resolution be voted down what disposition would be made of the paper?

The SPEAKER. The House has refused to receive the paper, and it is not now in the possession of the Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 50, noes 40; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. BUTLER and Mr. BURR.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 70, noes 37.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. This violates the rules of the House. The rules require that all petitions shall be sent to the appropriate committees. This declares that all communications from Mr. Woolley and his counsel shall go to the committee. It does not limit it to this paper, but says that all papers shall be sent to the committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order on the ground that, if made at all, it must be made at the time the resolution was presented. Since then the previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, and it is now too late.

Mr. GARFIELD. All communications in the nature of private letters which Mr. Woolley may desire to send to anybody must, under this resolution, go to this committee; and in the second place, this House cannot have possession of any paper Mr. Woolley may send to it unless the committee of investigation shall allow the House to have possession of it. He cannot make any communication to this House at all without the permission of the committee. If that is the meaning of the resolution I want to know it.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask leave to answer the question. In the first place, no one of the letters of Mr. Woolley go to the Speaker. That has been settled a long time ago. That objection is not founded on facts.

This only refers to the communications which are placed by Mr. Woolley or his counsel in the hands of the Speaker for the purpose of being presented to this House. This morning, for instance, a written communication of thirty pages was given to the Speaker to be presented to the House. The House have not done any more in this instance than in any other, saying they will make such disposition of such communications as they please. The House and the gentleman have overlooked this matter.

My friend from Ohio says we interfere with the right of petition. Here is a person in the hands of the House, in contempt of the House, and he has no right to make any communication to the House except by leave of the House. The House say that we will allow him to make a communication at any time in a certain manner, and in no other manner. We have the right to say it. Yet, when that favor is accorded to him we are told that he is denied the right of petition!

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. BUTLER. No. I was stopped by the other side.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Only when you were speaking out of order.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 66, nays 59, not voting 64; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Dolos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Banks, Beatty, Benjamin, Benton, Bromwell, Buckland, Butler, Cako, Churchill, Rendar W. So the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER. I move to reconsider the vote just taken; and to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. RANDALL. I call the yeas and nays on the motion.

Mr. BUTLER. I withdraw it.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, announced that that body had passed without amendment a joint resolution (H. R. No. 284) to provide for the removal of a suit pending in the circuit court of Jefferson county, West Virginia, to the circuit court of the United States.

Also, that the Senate had passed without amendment a joint resolution (H. R. No. 287) for the restoration of Captain James F. Armstrong, United States Navy, to the active list from the retired list.

RECUSANT WITNESS.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move to suspend the rules for the purpose of receiving the petition of Charles W. Woolley, which completely purges the contempt charged upon him, and ask that he be discharged. The facts, which he states fully, I think will satisfy the House that he ought now to be discharged.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman's motion in writing?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. It is; that is, the resolution for the discharge.

Mr. BUTLER. I rise to a question of order, and as preliminary to the point of order I ask if this is the same paper that was asked to be presented by the Speaker and was ruled out?

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman must state his point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is making a point of order. It is not argumentative; it is stating a point of order against a proposition.

Mr. BUTLER. My point of order is, that this paper was in the hands of the Speaker, and is improperly out of his hands.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order, and must necessarily do so, though he would like to have some other Presiding Officer do it, on the ground that it would be stating that he had done an improper act.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not wish to do that.

The SPEAKER. The point of order includes the statement that the paper was improperly out of his hands. It went by voluntary consent, as the gentleman who requested it said he desired to return it to the attorneys or some person who would have charge of it.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. To exculpate the Speaker entirely, I will state that the paper which was presented to the Speaker and offered by him I called upon the Speaker for, at the request of the attorneys for Mr. Woolley.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understood.

Mr. BUTLER. The point I mean to make is this: after a document from a witness, in contempt and in custody of this House, is put in the hands of the Speaker, with a written request to present it to the House, and after the document has been offered to the House and it has acted on the question of its reception, it cannot be withdrawn without the consent of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will see that the action of the House is directly the reverse of the point of order he has made. The Chair presented the paper and asked unanimous consent of the House to receive it. The House, on the objection of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] refused to receive it. Therefore the House has nothing more to do with it than with any resolution which it refuses to receive. It then remained in the custody of the Speaker, and he had either to keep it with his own private papers, refer it under the rule, or hand it to some member who might request it on behalf of the witness. The Chair handed it to the member after the House refused to receive it.

Mr. BUTLER. I object to the reception of the paper.

The SPEAKER. It is not yet before the House. The gentleman moves to suspend the rules for the purpose of offering a resolution.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I present a petition of Mr. Woolley which fully purges his contempt in my opinion. If that is received, I have drawn a resolution that he be discharged.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for a division of the question, first on the motion to suspend the rules and then on discharging the witness. They are distinct propositions.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Of course the House will act on the resolution as it sees fit, if it receives the petition.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that if the House suspends the rules for the purpose of receiving the paper it will then be before the House, and any resolution that naturally grows out of it would then be in order. The gentleman from Wisconsin can therefore withhold his resolution until after the question is taken on the reception of the paper.

The question was put on Mr. ELDRIDGE's motion, and there were thirty-four in the affirmative.

Mr. ELDRIDGE demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were yeas 38, nays 79, not voting 72; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Axtell, Baker, Barnes, Beck, Boyer, Brooks, Burr, Eldridge, Getz, Golladay, Grover, Haight, Holman, Hotchkiss, Ingersoll, Johnson, Jones, Knott, Marshall, McCormick, Morrissey, Niblack, Nunn, Phelps, Polesley, Randall, Ross, Schenck, Sigreaves, Stewart, Stone, Taber, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Auker, Van Trump, Windom, Wood, and Woodward—38.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Beaman, Beatty, Benjamin, Benton, Bromwell, Butler, Calk, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Covode, Callom, Delano, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Garfield, Gravely, Griswold, Harding, Higby, Hooper, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hunter, Judd, Julian, Kitchen, Kootz, Laffin, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, Lougbridge, Maynard, McClurg, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Morrell, Mullins, O'Neill, Paine, Pike, Plants, Raum, Sawyer, Seofield, Shellabarger, Starkweather, Aaron F. Stevens, Stokes, Taffe, Taylor, Thomas, John Trimble, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upson, Van Aernan, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, William Williams, and John T. Wilson—79.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Archer, Arnell, Bailey, Baldwin, Banks, Barnum, Bingham, Blaine, Blair, Boutwell, Broomall, Buckland, Cary, Chanler, Coburn, Cornell, Dawes, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Ela, Finney, Fox, Glossbrenner, Halsey, Hawkins, Hill, Asahel H. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Jencks, Kelley, Kelsey, Kerr, Ketchum, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Lynch, Mallory, Marvin, McCarthy, McCullough, Moorhead, Mungen, Myers, Newcomb, Nicholson, Orth, Perham, Peters, Pike, Poland, Pomeroy, Price, Pruyn, Robertson, Robinson, Selye, Shanks, Smith, Spalding, Thaddeus Stevens, Burt Van Horn, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Woodbridge—72.

So two thirds not voting in favor thereof, the rules were not suspended.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HOLMAN, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 419) granting a pension to Mary Atkinson; and

An act (S. No. 319) granting a pension to Bridget W. McGrorty and the minor children of William B. McGrorty, deceased.

RECUSANT WITNESS.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I rise to a question of privilege. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That Charles W. Woolley, now under the arrest of this House for contempt of the authority of the House, be ordered to the bar of the House, for the purpose of making such statement as will purge him of his contempt of such authority.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Does Woolley desire that?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I answer the question that Woolley has, by the voice of one of the members of this House, indicated to the House that he desires to make a statement to the purging himself of the contempt under which he is. That, in my apprehension, is authority or indication enough to authorize the House to adopt the action proposed by this resolution. This House cannot divest itself of one of its inherent rights. As for example, it cannot refer to a committee the matter of its right to adjourn. Its right at all times to hear a prisoner who is alleged to be in contempt of the authority of the House is one of those inalienable rights which the House cannot commit to the discretion of a committee, and which is not included, as I understand the resolution of my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] within the design of his resolution. It is, therefore, a privileged question, I suggest to my friend from Illinois, which at all times the House, from its own nature and character, must have the privilege at once to enter upon and consider. It is a matter relating to the organization and business and dignity of the House. It is a privileged question, and a prisoner having indicated his purpose to purge himself of his contempt, it must at all times be in order to hear his answer and purgation of contempt.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] presents this resolution as a question of privilege; the witness having been imprisoned by the authority and order of the House for an alleged contempt of its authority. It is a question for the House to determine, whether they will entertain this as a question of privilege. If there is no objection the resolution will be entertained.

Mr. BUTLER. I object, unless the gentleman from Ohio says that he submits this resolution at the request of the witness.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. It is not submitted in pursuance of any suggestion of the witness to me personally, for I have never seen him; but it is presented upon a formal statement made here in the hearing of the House by a member of the House, who alleges, upon his character as a member, that he holds in his hand what, in the judgment of that member, is a complete purgation of contempt. That, it seems to me, is and must be, in the very nature of the case, authority for the House to at least hear the prisoner's statement.

Mr. BUTLER. I withdraw my objection.

No further objection being made, the resolution was received.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded upon a division—yeas sixty-six, noes not counted.

The main question was then ordered.

The question was taken upon the resolution; and the Speaker announced that it was adopted.

Mr. PAINE. I rose to call for the yeas and nays upon the adoption of the resolution, but failed to obtain the recognition of the Chair in time to do so.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I raise the point of order that the call for the yeas and nays is made too late.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] will state that he did call for the yeas and nays in time the Chair will consider it as in time.

Mr. PAINE. I did not say in so many words, "I call for the yeas and nays;" but I said, "Mr. Speaker." As I was not recognized by the Chair, I did not say anything more.

The SPEAKER. The Chair always, in taking a question, says, "The yeas appear to have it," or "the noes appear to have it," as the case may be, and it is perfectly in order for any member at that time to rise, interrupt the Speaker, and demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. PAINE. I rose for that purpose, but did not make the demand. I would be glad to have the yeas and nays upon this resolution.

The SPEAKER. It is now too late, except by unanimous consent.

Objection was made by several members.

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the rules be suspended, in order that the yeas and nays may be ordered on this resolution.

The question was taken upon suspending the rules, and (two thirds not voting in the affirmative) it was not agreed to.

The resolution was accordingly declared to be adopted.

Mr. SHELLABARGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. HOLMAN, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill and joint resolutions of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 1039) to admit the State of Arkansas to representation in Congress;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 284) to provide for the removal of a suit pending in the circuit court of Jefferson county, West Virginia, to the circuit court of the United States; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 287) for the restoration of Captain James F. Armstrong, United States Navy, to the active list from the retired list.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. ELIOT. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SCHENCK. For what purpose?

Mr. ELIOT. I gave notice more than a week ago that at the expiration of the morning hour to-day I should seek to obtain the floor for the purpose of moving that House bill No. 1046, being the river and harbor bill, be taken from the Committee of the Whole and assigned for action in the House.

Mr. SCHENCK. I cannot yield the floor for anything that will occasion debate or lead to a call of the yeas and nays.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not believe there will be any objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts. When the bill was reported I objected to its consideration because I had an amendment which I wanted to come in. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] agreed that when the bill was taken up for action I should have the opportunity to submit my amendment, together with my report. Under these circumstances I hope there will be no objection to the arrangement proposed.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have said that if it is a mere question of that kind occasioning no debate I will yield. But if it occasions debate or a vote by yeas and nays I must object.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would inquire of the gentleman from Massachusetts at what time he proposes to consider that bill?

Mr. ELIOT. I will make my motion, and then the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] will understand what I want. I desire to move that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of House bill No. 1046, which is the river and harbor improvement bill, and that the same be postponed until Friday next after the morning hour, and then considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, without the necessity of voting upon the separate items of the bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I must object to anything that suspends the rule which gives the House the power to vote on every item of the bill.

Mr. BLAINE. Certainly, you cannot do that; say "considered as in Committee of the Whole."

Mr. ELIOT. If there is any desire to vote upon any special item of the bill, of course I will not object. But it does not seem to me to be worth while, upon a bill containing thirty or forty different items, to have a separate vote upon each clause, unless such is the desire of the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That is a rule of the House now, and for one I object to its being changed.

Mr. WOOD. So do I.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It is one of the best rules of the House.

Mr. ELIOT. I will modify my motion so that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole on Friday next after the morning hour.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I wish it to be understood that the right to have a separate vote upon every item is not waived.

Mr. ELIOT. It will not be waived unless on my motion; and I have already withdrawn that part of my motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] moves that the rules be suspended, and that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the river and harbor bill, and the same be assigned for consideration on Friday next after the morning hour, and from day to day until disposed of. This motion requires for its adoption a two-thirds vote.

Mr. SCHENCK. If that motion be adopted will it interfere with my right to move to go into Committee of the Whole on the tax bill?

The SPEAKER. On the expiration of the morning hour upon Friday this order, if adopted by a two-thirds vote, would operate, and would preclude the motion to go into Committee of the Whole on that day until this bill had been in some way disposed of.

Mr. SCHENCK. Then I cannot give way to the gentleman from Massachusetts for any such motion. I am willing that the gentleman's bill shall come in after the tax bill, but not before.

Mr. ELIOT. Will the gentleman agree to the proposition if I say a week from next Friday?

Mr. SCHENCK. Let the gentleman say immediately after the termination of action on the tax bill.

Mr. ELIOT. I will do no such thing. I give the gentleman notice that we shall send the tax bill back to his committee before the time I have named.

Mr. SCHENCK. Well, Mr. Speaker, I suppose that is a declaration of war. [Laughter.]

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD, EASTERN DIVISION.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a communication from General Hancock, respecting assistance from the Government to the Union Pacific railroad, eastern division; which was referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and ordered to be printed.

BENJAMIN MALONE.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of Judge Advocate L. C. Turner, on the case of Benjamin Malone, late a paymaster United States volunteers; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

TAXATION OF UNITED STATES BONDS.

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Speaker, is it in order for me to ask to have my vote recorded upon a proposition voted on this morning in my absence?

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot ask unanimous consent for that purpose; but it would be in order for the gentleman to move to suspend the rules.

Mr. MARSHALL. I will not ask that, but will merely state that I was necessarily absent this morning on important business at the Departments; but if I had been present when the vote was taken on the resolution of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] relative to the taxation of United States bonds, I should have voted against laying the resolution on the table, against the motion to refer, and, if the question had come before the House, in favor of the adoption of the resolution.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. On account of the state of my health, I ask to be excused from attendance at the evening sessions of the House.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection, the gentleman will be excused.

There was no objection.

NIAGARA SHIP-CANAL.

Mr. COOK. At the request of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. VAN HORN,] who is necessarily absent, I ask consent to make a report from the select Committee on the Niagara Ship-Canal.

There being no objection,

Mr. COOK reported back, from the select Committee on the Niagara Ship-Canal, a bill (H. R. No. 792) to provide for the construction of a ship-canal around the Falls of Niagara; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the tax bill.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I rise to a question of order. The House has ordered the Sergeant-at-Arms to bring Mr. Woolley to the bar of the House, and it should be done immediately. The liberty of the citizen is of more value than the tax bill, which we have been notified by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] will be referred back to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] that the resolution to which he refers, like all similar resolutions, requires to be engrossed. It is now being engrossed, as the Chair learns from the Journal clerk, and will be handed to the Sergeant-at-Arms immediately. If the House had ordered that all business should be suspended until the resolution had been engrossed and the witness brought to the bar of the House the gentleman's point of order would be sound; but such is not the order of the House.

Mr. ELIOT. I rise to a point of order, and it is this: when on Monday morning after the morning hour notice is given of a motion to suspend the rules for the purpose of removing an appropriation bill from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, it takes precedence of a motion to suspend the rules to go into Committee of the Whole. Since I have been in Congress it has been the uniform rule, so far as I recollect, to give precedence to similar motions to the one I have made.

Mr. SCHENCK. But I had the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order on another ground. The gentleman from Massachusetts is familiar with the practice of the House, and he knows that the rules have been suspended and the tax bill made the special order in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union after the morning hour from day to day until disposed of. The two orders stand upon the same ground exactly, excepting that the one in regard to the tax bill was first made.

Mr. ELIOT. I believe the Chair is right.

INTERNAL TAX BILL.

The motion of Mr. SCHENCK was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 1060) to reduce into one act and to amend the laws relating to internal taxes.

The pending section was section fifty-three, which had been amended to read as follows:

SEC. 53. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is hereby authorized, on appeal to him made within fifteen months from the date of assessment thereof, to remit all taxes erroneously or illegally assessed, and to refund by requisition on the Treasury all taxes erroneously or illegally collected; such power to remit and refund to extend to moneys assessed or collected as penal tax in cases where an assessor or collector assessor has or shall have added such penal tax to the assessment, and the Commissioner shall be of opinion that this addition was improper. The Commissioner shall also have power upon such appeal being made to him as aforesaid, to refund in like manner all fines or penalties collected without authority, or collected in cases where the tax shall have been refunded under the power herein given: Provided, That where a second assessment has been or may hereafter be made in case of a return which, in the opinion of the assessor or assistant assessor, was fraudulent, or contained any understatement or undervaluation, such assessment shall not be remitted, nor shall taxes collected under such assessment be recovered or refunded, unless it is proved that said return was not fraudulent. And if such proof shall be furnished, the sum remitted or refunded shall not include the amount, if any, which should have been assessed or collected had there been no understatement or undervaluation. The circuit and district courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction in all cases at law or in equity arising under the internal revenue laws. But no suit shall be maintained in any court for the recovery of any tax alleged to have been erroneously or illegally collected, until such appeal shall have been duly made to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and a decision of said Commissioner had thereon, and no such suit shall be maintained in any court unless brought within six months from the time of such decision; but if the decision shall be delayed more than six months from the date of appeal, then suit may be brought at any time within twelve months from the date of such appeal. No suit commenced after March 2, 1867, for the purpose of restraining the assessment or collection of tax shall be maintained in any court.

The pending amendment was to strike out the last sentence.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw that amendment, and move to add the words "except in the courts of the United States."

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that it would be exceedingly unwise to deprive the courts of justice of all power to interfere in a case where it is manifest that the taxes have been improperly assessed. It is a well known fact if a citizen is compelled to pay taxes and go before the department for the purpose of obtaining the refunding of the money unjustly taken from him that it will take at least a year or eighteen months. It is not only attended with great delay, but it is also attended with great uncertainty, as it is impossible in the nature of things that officers connected with the revenue should be able to decide questions of this character as well as courts of justice. It seems to me that Congress ought not to refuse jurisdiction to the Federal courts in this class of cases.

The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] had occasion to illustrate the enormity of the proposition submitted to the House on last Saturday excepting from the operation of the act appeals already pending. It does seem to me it would be without precedent for Congress to refuse to the Federal courts power to interpose between the Government and citizen where an attempt is made to enforce a tax in violation of law.

I think that no instance can be found in legislation where the courts of a country have been expressly deprived of all jurisdiction in preventing a wrong from being done. The question presents itself in this form: shall a citizen who is able to make out a case for an injunction against a tax which he alleges is unjustly levied upon him, be entitled to enjoin it until the courts have decided the question, executing the proper bond therefor, or shall he be compelled to pay the tax and resort to the long, tedious, and uncertain delay of a legal proceeding in order to obtain the refunding of his money? not the money with interest, not the damages, but the simple sum of money he has had to pay. It seems to me the courts of justice should be left open for this class of cases as for all other classes.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Chairman, as the proposition presented to the committee by the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana is an exceedingly important one, I trust it will receive the attention of the House. Following the existing law, the committee reported, as a part of this section, "that no suit for the purpose of restraining the assessment or collection of tax shall be maintained in any court." The gentleman first moved to strike out that provision entirely. He now proposes, as I understand, not to strike out that, but to amend the section by confining suits to the courts of the United States, thus, if his amendment prevails, leaving it in the power of any officer at any time to stop the collection of any tax.

Now, sir, the bill provides clearly and distinctly for an appeal to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for a remission of tax or for an alleviation of tax. It gives full privilege to appeal to the courts to recover back the tax. Thus there is no taking away of his day in court for any tax-payer. What the gentleman proposes, however, is that the door shall be opened, thus far repealing the present law of the land, and refusing to reenact the same law, so that in any court of the United States a suit may be brought to enjoin the collection of any tax. Let this become law and no one can fail to see what would be the consequence. Every distiller, every tobacco dealer, every man who has a question in regard to this income tax, who desires time, who desires to thwart the Government in the attempt to secure its revenue, will be found by petition to the courts, asking to enjoin and prevent the collection of the tax until a long hearing can be had. And it is a question very seriously to be considered whether the Congress of the United States, in enacting laws for the collection of its revenue, will enact laws crippled by such conditions, such incidents attending the execution of the law, as this would open to any one who was disposed not to meet a requisition made upon him for his contribution for the support of the Government.

I submit the question, therefore, to the House whether it is expedient, whether it is wise to abandon the law to these men by refusing to reenact it in a revision of the law, so that all persons shall have the privilege of rushing into court in advance, not satisfied with having reserved to them fully their right to their day in court afterwards, and cripple the Government if it attempts to raise its revenue by taxation.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of hearing a statement of Mr. Woolley, who is now on the floor of the House.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope not. The question was put; and there were—ayes 33, noes 47; no quorum voting.

A MEMBER. Let him wait.

Mr. MULLINS. We have waited for him three weeks.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Messrs. ELDRIDGE and ALLISON.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Would it not be agreeable to the chairman of the committee to have Mr. Woolley make his statement now? The gentleman does not desire to keep him in prison, I presume?

Mr. SCHENCK. We shall lose our opportunity of continuing in session this evening by taking a recess of the committee at half past four o'clock.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Not at all; we can get through with this matter in a few minutes.

Mr. SCHENCK. I prefer to go on with the tax bill.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The gentleman, I presume, does not wish the prisoner to remain in the bastille any longer than he is obliged to.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is out of order. The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 47, noes 43.

So the motion was agreed to.

So the committee, rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. POMEROY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 1060) to reduce into one act and to amend the laws relating to internal taxes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

RECUSANT WITNESS.

The Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar of the House, accompanied by Charles W. Woolley, and said: Pursuant to the order of the House, I now have Charles W. Woolley at the bar of the House as directed.

The SPEAKER. Charles W. Woolley, the House has adopted a resolution, which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That Charles W. Woolley, now under the arrest of this House for contempt of the authority of the House, be ordered to the bar of the House for the purpose of making such statement as will purge him of his contempt of such authority.

The SPEAKER. Are you ready to make such statement as will purge you of your contempt of the authority of the House?

Mr. WOOLLEY. I am, sir; this paper is my answer.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Mr. Speaker, the witness has been committed, as appears by the Journal of the House, for refusing to answer certain questions put to him by a committee of the House. The contempt consists in the refusal to answer, not questions put by the House, but questions put by the organ of the House, to wit, the committee, and the contempt can only be purged by the witness declaring that he is now ready to comply with the order and authority of the House, and to do it by making proper answers to the committee.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I rise to a question of order. The resolution was not to that effect; and I deny that it is either the requirement of law or the rule of the House. In order that the witness may purge his contempt the House call him before them, and, for the purpose of determining all questions with reference to the contempt with which he is charged, the witness stands here before them. And if the House decides that he shall answer questions or go back before the committee and answer certain questions, then the witness stands ready to obey that order, as I understand from him, or any order that the House shall make in regard to the case. But he has already, as the House is aware, complained as to the manner in which he was treated by the committee; and he has properly presented the case to the House, and asks that the House shall put to him here before them such questions as they desire him to answer, and that he may give such answers and make such statements as shall purge his contempt fully. He appears now at the bar ready to do that, as I am informed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot repeat the point of order on account of its length; but the Chair will read the resolution showing that allusion is made in it twice to the contempt of the authority of the House. As to what has previously occurred, and as to the witness standing at the bar willing to answer any questions, that does not properly come up under this resolution. The resolution is as follows:

Resolved, That Charles W. Woolley, now under the arrest of this House for contempt of the authority of the House, be ordered to the bar of the House for the purpose of making such statement as will purge him of his contempt of such authority.

It first charges that he is under arrest for contempt, and then orders him to the bar of the House for the purpose of making such statement as will purge him of his contempt. Whatever statement he now desires to submit the Chair will receive and submit to the House, and it will be for the House to say whether they will receive that statement, or whether he shall make his statement to the committee.

Mr. WOOLLEY. I have my answer here in writing. That is my statement.

The SPEAKER. The witness replies that he has a statement in writing which he desires to present to the House.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I see by the record of the House that the following questions were put to the witness, and it was for refusing to give satisfactory answers to them that he is now under arrest:

"1. What excuse have you for refusing to answer before the managers of impeachment of this House, in pursuance of the summons served on you for that purpose?"

"2. Are you now ready to appear before said managers and answer such proper questions as shall be put to you by said managers of impeachment?"

Although I was not here at the time, I understood from the gentleman who is in charge of this matter [Mr. BERLIN] that the order for commitment was for a refusal of the witness to make satisfactory answers to these two questions. Most clearly the contempt is in refusing to answer in the only place where the answer can be properly heard and the witness cross-examined as to matters upon which he is examined by order of the House. The contempt is not in refusing to answer here, but in refusing to answer in the place where the House has ordered that he shall answer; and I submit that anything else than a proper answer before the committee is not a purgation of the contempt; the contempt being, as I have said, a refusal to answer before the committee.

I have carefully drawn this resolution so that the witness shall only make such statement as will purge him of the contempt of the authority of the House, that authority being exercised in directing him to answer the committee. He cannot here give answers to the questions of the committee. All that he can say is, "I am now ready," or "not ready," as the case may be, "to appear before the committee and make answer to the questions for refusing which I am in contempt of this House."

Mr. WOODWARD. I suggest that the witness having been brought here under the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHELLABARGER,] he has a right to purge himself in his own terms, and that no man can dictate to him the terms in which the purgation shall be made. This witness, as I understand the preceding resolution, is in contempt of the House for not answering certain questions before the committee. Upon a resolution of the House the witness is now brought to the bar of the House to purge himself of that contempt. He is here for the purpose of offering a written communication to the House for that purpose. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] argues that he can purge himself in no other way than by answering the precise and specific questions of the committee. I submit to the House that neither the gentleman from Ohio nor any other gentleman can prescribe the terms in which the witness may purge himself. The House will judge, after hearing what the witness has to say, whether he has employed terms that are satisfactory to the House. Let me illustrate: suppose this written communication of the witness—I do not know what it contains—suppose it contains such statements as will satisfy the House that the questions addressed to him by the committee ought not to be answered.

Mr. GARFIELD. The House has already agreed that these questions were proper, and has committed the witness for contempt because he has not answered these very questions.

Mr. WOODWARD. It is still an open question before the House. And the witness may be able to convince the House that the questions, in the form and manner in which they are put, ought not to be answered; the witness has a right to convince the House of that if he can.

I submit that the witness, being brought here for the purpose of purging himself, has a right to purge himself in his own way. It is impossible that the gentleman from Ohio can purge him; he must purge himself. And whenever he shall have submitted whatever he has prepared for that purpose, the House will judge whether it is purgation or not. That is my suggestion, that the witness alone can make his purgation. The House can judge of it after they have heard it; they cannot before.

Mr. COVODE. The proceedings of the gentlemen on the other side are entirely unprecedented. There has never been a single case in this House, since I have been here, of a witness in contempt being brought before the House and asked to do more than to agree to go before the committee and testify. It is the business of the committee to receive the testimony of the witness, and not the business of the House. Every member of this House knows that this man is not only guilty of contempt of the House, but also guilty of perjury. And it is the time of the House to be taken up—

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I call the gentleman to order. He is out of order in saying that the witness is guilty of perjury.

The SPEAKER. The question will be submitted to the House. The same question has been adverted to once before. The committee of investigation have submitted their report in regard to the answers of the witness at various times; that report has been printed by order of the House, and the facts are in possession of the House. The question is whether the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COVODE] are in order.

Mr. COVODE. The witness has admitted it himself.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to raise a question of order upon the proposition of the Speaker to submit this question to the House. The same thing, I am aware, has been done heretofore, but without any action of the House. It seems to me that such a proceeding is in utter violation of all our rules.

The SPEAKER. Unless the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] thinks it the duty of the Chair to listen to these remarks the Chair will arrest them. The right way to traverse the action of the Speaker is by appealing from his decisions, not by indulging in criticisms upon them.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I did not mean to make any criticism upon the action of the Chair; but I wish to make this suggestion: that if the majority of the House can determine the construction of the rules, then the rules are of no possible use. The object of our rules is to protect the rights of the minority.

Mr. UPSON. Mr. Speaker, is debate in order?

Mr. SPEAKER. Debate is not in order. In reference to the point raised by the gentleman from Wisconsin, the Chair will state that the rules expressly give to the Chair the privilege of submitting questions to the House. The Chair therefore submits to the House, which is a higher authority than the Speaker, the question whether under the circumstances appearing in the report of the committee the remark of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COVODE] shall be regarded as out of order?

On the question there were—ayes 33, noes 63.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BUTLER. I rise to a point of order. The gentleman from Pennsylvania was speaking in my time, I having yielded him the floor. I propose now to resume the floor. That ends this proceeding, I believe.

The SPEAKER. It does not. During the time the gentleman from Pennsylvania was on the floor by the consent of the gentleman from Massachusetts words were uttered which it is claimed were out of order; and that question must be decided. The Chair will state that upon this question a precedent has just occurred to his mind, and as the gentleman from Wisconsin has indulged in strictures on the Chair he will say, with reference to the submission of questions by the Presiding Officer, that it has often been done in the Senate. During the recent trial its presiding officer, almost every day, submitted questions to the decision of the Senate without himself ruling on them, and questions of order have repeatedly been referred to the Senate for its decision. And in a case parallel to this, it occurring in the Thirty-Eighth Congress, when the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ORTH] alluded to a member from Maryland as a "traitor," after the House of Representatives had adopted a resolution that he had given aid and comfort to the enemy by certain remarks which he had made on the floor of the House, it was ruled, and the ruling was sustained on appeal, that the gentleman from Indiana had the right to make that charge, because the House of Representatives had, by its resolution, made such a declaration. In this case the House must, in like manner, decide whether the language used by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COVODE] is justifiable, in view of the facts and evidence within the knowledge of the House.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The Chair will allow me to say that in referring to his ruling I meant to indulge in no criticism upon the purity of his motives. I only meant to say that such a practice, if held to be parliamentary, would be subversive of the rights of the minority.

The SPEAKER. The Chair prefers to submit the matter to the House, as his ruling has been questioned.

Mr. COVODE. I had some idea of withdrawing the remarks, as I do not want to delay the action of the House.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays have been ordered. The question is whether the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania shall be ruled out of order.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 37, nays 70, not voting 82; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Axtell, Baker, Barnes, Blair, Boyer, Brooks, Burr, Cornell, Driggs, Eldridge, Getz, Golladay, Griswold, Grover, Haizell, Holman, Hotchkiss, Richard D. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Stone, Taffe, Thomas, Twichell, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Woodbridge—82.

So the remarks of Mr. COVODE were not ruled out of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts will proceed.

Mr. BUTLER. I desire to say this case has an exact precedent in the inquiry touching John Brown's raid. Thaddeus Hyatt was brought before the Senate and had certain questions put to him by the Senate. He refused to answer, and was committed to close confinement, and kept committed until he did answer. Continuing to refuse to answer, he was again committed, and was only finally discharged after the committee had made its report and was discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

Now, the only way this witness can purge himself of contempt is to say that he will go before the committee and answer the questions put to him, which the House shall decide to be in the proper line of examination. He can make no further purgation. He is not to be excused. It is not a question of motive or intention. It is a simple intention of will. Will he do it? If he does not, then he is to be recommitted, not to be brought up again until he manifests his willingness to do it. If he does, he is to go before the committee as early as it can receive him to answer the questions put to him.

Mr. WOODWARD. How does the House know but the gentleman's answer was an answer to the question?

Mr. BUTLER. That is not a question for the House. The only question for the House is whether he is ready to go and answer, and the House must learn from its committee whether he has answered or not.

Mr. WOODWARD. I do not know the House has all the confidence in the committee that it is possible to have, and it is possible the witness might convince the House that the committee had no complaint against him as he had already answered the questions put to him. When a witness is brought to the bar how can he purge himself unless his mouth is unstopped?

Mr. BUTLER. How easy it would be for him to say that he is willing to go and answer.

Mr. WOODWARD. That is dictating his purgation to him.

Mr. BUTLER. Undoubtedly it is. The committee dictated the resolution to the House. If he is willing to answer, he can say so and go before the committee. That is all he has to say. We do not want a speech.

Mr. WOODWARD. He comes here to purge himself of contempt and offers a paper which may purge him.

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman has long been upon the bench. Suppose a witness appearing before him and committed because he refuse to answer a question is again brought before him, the question he would put to him would be, "Are you willing to answer?"

Mr. WOODWARD. I will answer the question by saying that I know of no court of justice which, having committed a witness for contempt, any contempt which he may have been guilty of—

Mr. BUTLER. Keep to the contempt of refusing to answer the question.

Mr. WOODWARD. Very well. Where a witness was committed for refusing to answer a question, and that witness offers to go before the court and purge himself, I never heard of a court of justice refusing to hear what he had to say.

Mr. BUTLER. Nor I.

Mr. WOODWARD. That is this case, precisely.

Mr. BUTLER. But I never heard of a court of justice that would let a witness come before it and make a speech. The witness is to say simply whether he will or will not answer.

Mr. WOODWARD. The question of purgation is the witness's own affair.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I offer, for the purpose of closing this matter up, the following resolution; on which I demand the previous question:

Resolved, That in purging himself of the contempt for which Charles W. Woolley is committed by this House, said Woolley shall be required to state whether he is now willing to go before the committee of managers of the House, before which he has been summoned to testify, and make answer to the questions for the refusal to answer which he has been ordered into custody, and if he answers that he is so ready to answer before said committee, then the witness shall have that privilege to so appear and answer as soon as said committee can be convened, and that in the meantime the witness remain in custody; and in the event that the said witness answer that he is not ready to so appear before said committee and make answer to the said questions so refused to be answered, then that the said witness be recommitted for continuance of such contempt, and that such custody shall continue until the said witness shall communicate to this House through said committee that he is ready to make such answers.

Mr. JONES. I desire to offer an amendment to the resolution.

The SPEAKER. It is not now in order. If the previous question is not seconded it will be.

The previous question was seconded—ayes 80, noes 30—and the main question ordered.

Mr. BROOKS. I make the point of order that there is no such committee in existence in this House as was created by the House. Four of the committee of managers are absent from the city. Only two are here present. The proposition, therefore, is to doom this prisoner to a dungeon until four of the committee return from their travels in the country.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order, on the ground that the resolution appointing this committee authorizes them to investigate by sub-committees. There is specific authority, therefore, for an investigation by sub-committees.

Mr. BROOKS. This is a reference to a committee, not to a sub-committee, and it is within my knowledge that only two of the committee are here present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know whether two or more are present.

Mr. BROOKS. The Speaker must know what members are absent on leave, for the record shows it.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Three members are here.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know what members are absent, nor is it a part of his duty to examine the roll-call to see who are present or absent, except when a warrant is issued to have them brought to the bar of the House by order of the House. Then it is his duty to examine the record. The Chair has stated what he supposed the gentleman had forgotten, that the resolution appointing this committee empowered them to conduct the examination by a sub-committee; so that if this resolution is adopted the right of the sub-committee would accrue. Whether the committee are in the city or not the Chair does not know. He does not know who are the sub-committee. He has no official knowledge as to that nor has he a right to any.

Mr. BROOKS. If the Chair will permit me, the resolution instructs the committee, not the sub-committee, and the committee are absent.

The SPEAKER. The resolution of the House authorized the committee to depute power to a sub-committee to take testimony. The Chair will rule, in order that an appeal can be taken if any member disputes his decision, that an appearance of this witness before a sub-committee, which has been authorized by the resolution of the House, will comply with the resolution ordering him to appear before the committee. If any gentleman appeals the appeal will be entertained.

The question was taken on agreeing to the resolution, and it appeared to be carried.

Mr. BROOKS. I demand the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 93, nays 32, not voting 64; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Beaman, Beatty, Benjamin, Benton, Blaine, Blair, Bromwell, Buckland, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Cornell, Covode, Cullum, Dawes, Delano, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Garfield, Gravelly, Griswold, Harding, Higby, Hill, Hooper, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulbard, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Judd, Julian, Koontz, Laffin, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, Mallory, Maynard, McCarthy, McCreary, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Morrell, Mullins, Newcomb, O'Neill, Paine, Peters, Pike, Polesley, Pomeroy, Price, Baum, Sawyer, Schenck, Seefeldt, Shellabarger, Starkweather, Aaron, F. Stevens, Taffe, Taylor, John Trimble, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upson, Van Aernam, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, William Williams, and John T. Wilson—33.

NAYS—Messrs. Axtell, Barnes, Beck, Boyer, Brooks, Barr, Eldridge, Getz, Golladay, Grover, Haight, Hotchkiss, Richard D. Hubbard, Johnson, Jones, Knott, Marshall, McCormick, Morrissey, Niblack, Phelps, Randall, Ross, Sitgreaves, Stewart, Stone, Taber, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Auker, Van Trump, Wood, and Woodward—32.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Archer, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, Bailey, Baker, Banks, Barnum, Bingham, Boutwell, Broomall, Butler, Cake, Cary, Chanler, Churchill, Dixon, Ela, Finney, Fox, Glossbrenner, Halsey, Hawkins, Holman, Assahel W. Hubbard, Humphrey, Kelley, Kelsey, Kerr, Ketcham, Kitchen, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loughbridge, Lynch, Marvin, McCullough, Moorhead, Mungen, Myers, Nicholson, Nunn, Orth, Perham, Pike, Plants, Poland, Pruyn, Robertson, Robinson, Selye, Shanks, Smith, Spaulding, Thaddeus Stevens, Stokes, Thomas, Burt Van Horn, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—64.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. SHELLABARGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Mr. Woolley, I am instructed by the House of Representatives to propound to you the question whether you are now willing to go before the committee of managers of the House before which you were summoned to testify, and to make answer to the questions for the refusal to answer which you have been ordered into custody; and the resolution of the House then proceeds as follows:

"If he answer that he is so ready to answer before such committee the witness shall have the privilege to so appear and answer as soon as such committee can be convened, and in the mean time the witness shall remain in custody; and in the event of the said witness answering that he is not ready to so appear before the said committee and make answer to the said questions so refused to be answered, then that the said witness be recommitted." &c.

To this resolution, which I am directed to read to you, you can make one of two answers: first, that you are ready to answer before the committee of managers the questions for a refusal to answer which you were ordered into custody; and the second answer is, that you are not ready so to answer.

Mr. WOOLLEY. Can I have the questions read so that I can understand the question?

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection they will be read, although they are of some length. They are to be found in the Globe of the 27th of May.

No objection was made, and the Clerk read as follows:

"Question. Have you sent any telegrams from this city under a feigned name?"

Answer. I have, sir; but not to—yes, I have.

"Question. What was that name?"

Answer. I sent one under the name of 'Hooker,' and some under the name of 'Bismarck, junior.'

"Question. Under that feigned name did not you telegraph to have $10,000 put to your credit with the firm of Gilliss, Harney & Co., 24 Broad street?"

Answer. Not that I recollect of.

"Question. To Sheridan Shook?"

Answer. In regard to the impeachment trial? I decline to answer as to any dispatches not relating to the President's impeachment trial.

"At this point the statute relating to the obligation of a witness to testify was read to the witness—the same statute to which the Speaker referred yesterday—making the refusal to testify punishable by a fine and imprisonment. The witness replied:

Answer. I am willing to take the penalty. I refuse to answer, because I have sent no dispatch for Sheridan Shook to place $10,000 to my credit in New York, to be used in regard to the impeachment trial.

"Question. Do you still refuse to answer?"

Answer. That is the answer. I say I have sent no dispatch to Sheridan Shook to place $10,000 to be used in the impeachment trial.

"Question. Did you, on or about the 7th day of May, send a dispatch to Sheridan Shook, under the feigned name of 'Hooker,' to put $10,000 at your credit in the banking house of Gilliss, Harney & Co.?"

Answer. Not for the purpose of being used in the impeachment trial.

By Mr. WILSON:

"Question. Do you refuse to make any other answer than that which you have made?"

Answer. I am willing to answer any question concerning the impeachment of the President. I have sent no dispatch to Sheridan Shook relating to the impeachment or conviction of the President of a criminal character.

"Question. Do you refuse to make any other answer than that?"

Answer. I refuse to answer any question that does not relate—

"Question. I ask you if you refuse to make any other answer?"

Answer. I cannot say whether I refuse.

"Question. Will you make any other answer?"

Answer. I do not say that I refuse.

"Question. Have you sent anything respecting impeachment at all?"

Answer. Nothing at all, except as information; but nothing that looked directly or remotely to the purchase of any Senator.

By Mr. BOUTWELL:

"Question. Will you read this dispatch aloud, if you please?"

Answer. (Witness, looking at the dispatch.) That is not my dispatch, sir.

"Question. What do you say to the dispatch shown you?"

Answer. I have no recollection of having sent it.

"Question. Did you send a dispatch to Sheridan Shook substantially of the purport of that?"

Answer. Not to my recollection.

By Mr. BUTLER:

"Question. Did you not, on the next day, draw on Gilliss, Harney & Co. for the sum of $10,000?"

Answer. Not to my recollection.

"Question. Have you not testified that you did so draw?"

Answer. I do not think that I testified yesterday that I did.

"Question. Did you not state to the committee yesterday that you did so draw?"

Answer. I deny your right to ask the question as to what I stated. I do not know what I stated yesterday.

"Question. Is not that dispatch in your handwriting? [Dispatch exhibited.]

Answer. Yes, sir; it is.

The dispatch was as follows:

May 6, 1863.

To SHERIDAN SHOOK, 83 Cedar street, New York:

My business is adjusted. Place ten to my credit to-day with Gilliss, Harney & Co., No. 24 Broad street. HOOKER, Willard's.

"Question. What does the word 'ten' stand for?"
 "Answer. As it does not relate to impeachment, I decline to answer."

"Question. Is this dispatch in your handwriting?"
 [Dispatch exhibited.]

"Answer. As that does not relate to impeachment, I decline to answer; as it does not relate to anything connected with the purchase of a senatorial vote in connection with impeachment, I decline to answer."

The dispatch was as follows:

May 16, 1868.

To JOHN S. C. BURT, St. Nicholas Hotel, New York:

Where is Washington? I will dine with Hancock to-night or be at Fifth Avenue Hotel Sunday morning. Andry all right.

C. W. WOOLLEY.

The SPEAKER. Mr. Woolley you are now required to answer the question.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. The Speaker is engaged in obeying the order of the House.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Yes, but I understand that the Speaker has made a mistake in regard to the questions, for refusing to answer which the witness was put in prison. I do not understand that those questions which have now been read were included in the order under which he was arrested. There were but two questions, as I recollect, upon which the witness was in contempt, and they followed each other directly. I know that the questions which have been read were included in the report of the committee; but they are not, as I understand it, those for refusing to answer which the witness is in contempt.

The SPEAKER. The evidence as reported by the committee—the questions and answers just read by the Clerk—was what the Chair supposed the witness at the bar desired should again be read to him; but, as it appears from the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin that the Chair must have been incorrect in that supposition, the Chair will now read the resolution adopted by the House.

Mr. WOOLLEY. I can state the questions with the permission of the House, and I think Manager BUTLER will agree with me.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will read the resolution. He can only receive the answer according to the resolution of the House.

The resolution that was agreed to by the House required the Speaker to propound to the witness the following interrogatories:

1. What excuse have you for refusing to answer before the managers of impeachment of this House in pursuance of the summons served on you for that purpose?
2. Are you now ready to appear before said managers and answer such proper questions as shall be put to you by said managers of impeachment?

The debate was quite voluminous, and at the end of the discussion the resolution was again read as follows:

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House again propose to C. W. Woolley the question contained in the resolution this day adopted, and that said Woolley be informed that the House requires definite and explicit answers to the questions propounded, to be made forthwith.

Upon the suggestion of the gentleman from Wisconsin, if the House does not object, the Chair will propound to the witness the question which was based upon the evidence submitted by the managers, for him to say whether he is ready to answer or whether he is not ready to answer; it is: "Are you now ready to appear before said managers and answer such proper questions as may be put to you by said managers of impeachment?"

Mr. WOOLLEY. I am, sir.

Mr. UPSON. I would inquire of the Chair if that is a proper question to be put to the witness?

The SPEAKER. That has been pointed out by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] as the proper question. The gentleman will state whether he considers this the proper question to submit.

Mr. BUTLER. I think it is.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I think the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] is still laboring under a mistake. I understand that there are two specific questions that have been propounded to the witness before the committee and which he has declined to answer. And if the gentleman will listen to me, I think he will agree that when I was making my remarks I put the question to him whether the only questions in reference to which the witness was in contempt were not the questions relating to the draft for $5,000.

Mr. BUTLER. Oh! no.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. And the gentleman answered me that the witness was in contempt for that, and for the fact that he had represented to the committee that he was too sick to appear before them, and had then gone to New York and returned, thus imposing upon the committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] objected to the Chair reading to the witness the evidence reported by the committee of investigation, and desired the Chair to read to him the questions which had been agreed on by the House. The Chair finds, by reference to the Globe, that the following resolution was agreed to after discussion:

Resolved, That Charles W. Woolley, esq., of the city of Cincinnati, Ohio, now in custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, on an attachment for a contempt in refusing or neglecting obedience to the summons requiring him to appear and testify before the committee of managers of the House, be now arraigned at the bar of this House, and that the Speaker propound to him the following interrogatories:

"1. What excuse have you for refusing to answer before the managers of impeachment of this House, in pursuance of the summons served on you for that purpose?"

"2. Are you now ready to appear before said managers and answer such proper questions as shall be put to you by said managers of impeachment?"

The questions were propounded to the witness, and he made answer in writing. After the answer of the witness had been read to the House by the Clerk the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] offered the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House again propose to C. W. Woolley the questions contained in the resolution this day adopted, and that said Woolley be informed that the House requires definite and explicit answers to the questions propounded to be made forthwith."

The questions were again submitted to the witness, and not having answered in a manner satisfactory to the managers a resolution was offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] ordering the witness under arrest.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Does the Chair refer to the resolution by which the witness was ordered into confinement?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman refers to a resolution offered and adopted on a subsequent day. The Clerk will read the preamble and resolution subsequently offered.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas Charles W. Woolley has been brought before the committee and the following questions proposed to him by the committee, to wit:

"Question. The committee desire to know whether on the 6th of May you telegraphed over the signature of 'Hooker' to Sheridan Shook. 'My business is adjusted. Place ten to my credit with Gilliss, Harney & Co., No. 24 Broad street?'"

"Question. Did you also telegraph to Sheridan Shook, over the signature of 'Hooker', on the 12th of May. 'The five should be had. It may be absolutely necessary?'" which questions Woolley declined to answer, in the words following, to wit:

"This is a private and confidential communication, passing between counsel and client. It has reference to business in that relation and to nothing else, and has no reference whatever to the trial of the President on the articles of impeachment preferred against him, nor to the conduct or result of the trial, nor the vote of any persons on the trial, nor any allusion thereto whatever. That is my answer."

and whereas Sheridan Shook, the party to whom said supposed confidential and privileged communications are alleged to have been sent, has been examined by your committee and testified as follows in regard to the money mentioned in said telegram:

"By Mr. BUTLER:

"Question. Do you know Charles W. Woolley?"

"Answer. I do.

"Question. How long have you known him?"

"Answer. I do not think I have known him over a year.

"Question. Have you had business relations with him?"

"Answer. Very little, if any. I do not know that I ever had any transaction with him.

"Question. Did he deposit in your hands last Sunday night any sum of money?"

"Answer. No, sir.

"Question. Or during the day Sunday?"

"Answer. No, sir.

"Question. Has he ever deposited any sum of money in your hands?"

"Answer. I may have borrowed fifty or a hundred dollars of him at a time; but he has placed no sum of money in my hands.

"Question. Have you seen him lately?"

"Answer. I have not seen him since the Sunday of which you speak."

and whereas upon the same subject the said Woolley has testified before your committee as follows:

[From the testimony of C. W. Woolley, May 19, 1868.]

"By Mr. BUTLER:

"Question. Have you deposited any money, and where, since that time, i. e., May 8?"

"Answer. Not in any bank.

"Question. Have you with any individual?"

"Answer. No, sir.

"Question. Then why do you say 'not in any bank'?"

"Answer. Because it is not to my credit in any bank.

"By Mr. WILSON:

"Question. What do you mean by that answer?"

"Answer. I mean to say that I have not put it in a bank. I gave it to an individual who was owing me in New York and told him to keep that money until I arrived there.

"By Mr. BUTLER:

"Question. Who was that individual?"

"Answer. Sheridan Shook.

"Question. How much money did you give Sheridan Shook?"

"Answer. I think between sixteen and seventeen thousand dollars, as near as I can get it.

"Question. In what?"

"Answer. Greenbacks, I think.

"Question. What denomination of greenbacks?"

"Answer. Big bills; I cannot tell you. There may have been some $500 bills. I think in one package I gave him some small bills.

"Question. When did you give this to Sheridan Shook?"

"Answer. Sunday.

"Question. At what time?"

"Answer. In the afternoon; I cannot tell the hour.

"Question. Before or after you were summoned here?"

"Answer. Before, I think.

"Question. For what purpose did you give it to Sheridan Shook?"

"Answer. For safe keeping for me as an individual. Let me correct myself there. I gave that money to Shook to take over to New York to keep for me till a day or two, when I intended to go to New York. Then Dunleavy came and asked me to go West, and I thought I had better go. I made up my mind to go there instead of going to New York, and I let him carry it along.

"Question. Well, you gave it to him finally?"

"Answer. He kept it from the time I gave it to him.

"Question. Has he got it now?"

"Answer. I guess so, unless he spent it.

"Question. Did you take any memorandum for it?"

"Answer. No, sir; I did not want it.

"Question. Supposing he should have been killed?"

"Answer. I would have taken my chance.

"Question. Did you go on with Sheridan Shook in the same train?"

"Answer. Yes, sir.

"Question. What sort of a package was the money in?"

"Answer. No package at all.

"Question. Did you count it?"

"Answer. I do not recollect exactly. I kept what I thought I would want myself, and gave him the parcel. If I were to state closely it was about sixteen thousand one hundred dollars. It was not $17,000, I am satisfied.

"Question. Where did you get that money that you sent by Sheridan Shook?"

"Answer. That is a part of the money that came out of the bank."

and whereas your committee believe the reasons given by the witness in declining to answer are wholly untrue and evasive, and the refusal to answer is a deliberate contempt of the authority of the House, and done for the purpose of concealing the fact and embarrassing public justice: Therefore,

Resolved, That said Woolley, for his repeated contempt of the authority of the House, be kept until otherwise ordered by the House in close confinement in the guard-room of the Capitol police, by the Sergeant-at-Arms, until said Woolley shall fully answer the questions above recited, and all questions put to him by said committee in relation to the subject of the investigations with which the committee is charged, and that meanwhile no persons shall communicate with said Woolley, in writing or verbally, except upon the order of the Speaker.

The SPEAKER, (to the witness at the bar of the House.) Mr. Woolley, you have now heard the resolutions of the House and the report of the evidence as submitted by the committee. Are you now ready to testify before the committee of investigation and to make answer to the questions which were put to you by the committee, and for refusing to answer which you are now in contempt of the House?

Mr. WOOLLEY. As my client has testified in regard to those questions, and as I take this to be the order of the House that I shall answer them, I will do so.

The Sergeant-at-Arms then took the witness in charge and removed him from the bar of the House.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Leave of absence was granted to Mr. ARNELL for ten days, and to Mr. KERR for one week.

ORDER FOR A RECESS TO-DAY.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that when the House again resolve itself into Committee of the Whole upon the internal tax bill, the Committee of the Whole shall immediately take a recess until half past seven to-night.

The motion was agreed to.

INTERNAL TAX BILL.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and resume the consideration of the internal tax bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 1060) to reduce into one act and to amend the laws relating to internal taxes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee of the Whole, in pursuance of the order of the House, will now take a recess until half past seven o'clock to-night.

The committee accordingly (at four o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) took a recess until half past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at half past seven o'clock p. m., and was called to order by the Speaker.

INTERNAL TAX BILL.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and resume the consideration of the internal tax bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. ALLISON in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 1060) to reduce into one act and to amend the laws relating to internal taxes.

The pending section was section fifty-three, which had been amended to read as follows:

SEC. 53. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is hereby authorized, on appeal to him made within fifteen months from the date of assessment thereof, to remit all taxes erroneously or illegally assessed, and to refund by requisition on the Treasury all taxes erroneously or illegally collected; such power to remit and refund to extend to moneys assessed or collected as penal tax in cases where an assessor or assistant assessor has or shall have added such penal tax to the assessment, and the Commissioner shall be of opinion that this addition was improper. The Commissioner shall also have power, upon such appeal being made to him as aforesaid, to refund in like manner all fines or penalties collected without authority, or collected in cases where the tax shall have been refunded under the power herein given: Provided, That where a second assessment has been or may hereafter be made in case of a return which, in the opinion of the assessor or assistant assessor, was fraudulent, or contained any understatement or undervaluation, such assessment shall not be remitted, nor shall taxes collected under such assessment be recovered or refunded, unless it is proved that said return was not fraudulent; and if such proof shall be furnished, the sum remitted or refunded shall not include the amount, if any, which should have been collected, had there been no understatement or undervaluation. The circuit and district courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction in all cases at law or in equity arising under the internal revenue laws. But no suit shall be maintained in any court for the recovery of any tax alleged to have been erroneously or illegally collected, until such appeal shall have been duly made to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and a decision of said Commissioner had thereon, and no such suit shall be maintained in any court unless brought within six months from the time of such decision; but if the decision shall be delayed more than six months from the date of appeal, then suit may be brought at any time within twelve months from the date of such appeal. No suit commenced after March 2, 1867, for the purpose of restraining the assessment or collection of tax shall be maintained in any court.

The pending question was upon the amendment of Mr. HOLMAN to add at the end of the section the words, "except in the courts of the United States."

The CHAIRMAN. Unless there is objection the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] will be regarded as rejected.

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER. I move to amend by adding at the end of the section the following:

Unless sufficient security be given, to be approved by the court, for the payment of such tax as shall be found justly due.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this amendment will remedy the difficulties which have been referred to by several gentlemen in this debate, and that it should be agreed to. Such a provision would make the Government perfectly secure. If a man complains that he is overtaxed, let him give sufficient security to indemnify the Government for the recovery of the amount of tax which may ultimately be found due. Now, this section as it stands is a very extraordinary one.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman yield to me that I may make a suggestion?

Mr. MILLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand that my amendment, pending when the committee rose this afternoon, giving the Federal courts jurisdiction of actions to restrain the levying of taxes, has this evening been declared rejected. I desire to suggest to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, that a proposition of so much importance ought not to be voted on in so slim a committee. I trust, therefore, that by unanimous consent that proposition may be regarded as still pending. All I ask is a fair vote in a full committee: When I came into the House this evening, it was barely time for the committee to commence its session, yet I understood that my amendment had been voted on and rejected.

Mr. MILLER. I ask the gentleman whether the amendment I have offered will not accomplish his purpose. It proposes to allow the Federal courts to restrain the levying of taxes in case sufficient security be given for the payment of the amount of tax which may be found to be justly due.

Mr. HOLMAN. Of course no restraining order could be made except upon proper security.

Mr. MILLER. But this provides that the security shall be ample. Sometimes, as the gentleman knows, "straw bail" is put in.

It was suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] that an amendment of this kind is unnecessary, because the bill contains a provision that if taxes are wrongfully paid they may be recovered back. But how would it be in cases which I have known, where they have assessed taxes double what were justly due, and sold the property for one fourth of its value. Then, according to the provision of this bill, the remedy the person would have would be to collect back the money which the property sold for. The object of this amendment is, if the assessment is deemed to be wrong, that the person shall give ample security to pay if the case be adjudged against him. If that is done they will try how much is justly due, and there is no danger of the Government losing anything. Gentlemen would hardly say it was right that property worth $20,000 should be sold at a forced sale for $2,000 or $4,000, and that should be all the party could recover. I hope the House will adopt the amendment. It can do no harm, and will save a great deal of trouble and litigation.

Mr. SCHENCK rose.

Mr. JENCKES. I wish to say a word.

Mr. SCHENCK. I yield to the gentleman from Rhode Island.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object to the gentleman's farming out the floor.

Mr. SCHENCK. I merely give up the floor to the gentleman.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a question of order.

The chairman of the committee thought proper to have rejected a proposition which he deemed of sufficient importance to discuss it, and before there were three, certainly not five, members in the House.

Mr. SCHENCK. I did not know it was rejected, and knew nothing about it until it was disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) The gentleman will state his point.

Mr. HOLMAN. There was manifestly no quorum present for the transaction of business, but I will not press the point of order.

Mr. JENCKES. What is the question before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MILLER.]

Mr. JENCKES. Is that an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana?

The CHAIRMAN. No; it is to the section.

Mr. JENCKES. What has become of the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands it was rejected.

Mr. ALLISON. I will explain. I was in the chair at the time. When the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was called to order that amendment was pending, and the Chair stated if there was no objection the amendment would be considered as rejected. The gentleman from Indiana was not in his seat.

Mr. HOLMAN. How many were here?

Mr. MAYNARD. I must object.

The CHAIRMAN. The chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. JENCKES. The amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania amounts to the same thing as the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana. I presume the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana may be renewed, as it was declared to be rejected in an informal proceeding. Each of these amendments is based upon a principle which ought not to be recognized in any revenue law of the United States. They are based upon this idea that any person upon whom a tax is assessed under the law, in conformity with the provisions of the law as interpreted by the officers of the Treasury, may go into court and ask for an injunction against the assessment and collection of that tax for any reason they may choose, and as any one will see there may be many reasons. Some may say that the law is unconstitutional, and others that the law is construed improperly by the officers of the Treasury. These may sub-divide themselves into many.

Mr. Chairman, all those objections should be removed in the law itself. This idea of obtaining injunctions against the collection of taxes has obtained but a small foothold in the courts of the country. The district courts of some States have entertained suits based upon that principle, and mainly in the class of cases known as tax suits, suits to set aside tax titles under the revenue laws of the United States passed four or five years ago. The judges of courts of the United States followed those false lights. And I doubt if at the present day there can be found any considerable number of judges, either in the courts of the United States or in the courts of the several States, who believe they have or can exercise any proper jurisdiction to stay suits for the collection of taxes; and upon the principle which every lawyer will recognize and which the courts have declared whenever they have found occasion to do it, that the party who is aggrieved by a wrongful assessment has a perfect remedy at law. All that he has to do is to pay his tax under protest and sue the collector.

Mr. MILLER. Suppose they sell the property for one quarter its value by an assessment of three times the amount of the tax due; what remedy is there then?

Mr. JENCKES. The case cannot arise except by the willfulness of the party assessed. The property cannot be assessed for one quarter its value—not more than one hundredth under the law—and if the party cannot raise that sum, and does not pay it under protest, it is sheer willfulness on his part to allow it to be sold for one quarter its value.

Mr. MILLER. The gentleman does not understand my question. Suppose the tax assessed is treble what is actually due, and then in order to enforce the payment of it the property is sold.

Mr. JENCKES. I do understand the gentleman. If the assessment is wrongful the party has his perfect remedy at law. He can pay the tax without prejudice, under protest, and sue the collector. I believe that this idea of enjoining the collection of a tax by courts of equity is now restricted to the courts of but three States. It has been hunted out of the courts of the United States, although it was attempted to be established there when these tax laws were first passed. That is the plain proposition. There is no reason for giving the court of equity power to enjoin when the court of law has full power to give a complete remedy. Unless the State can collect its revenues it must cease to exist. It must afford, and ought to afford, a complete remedy to its citizens who may be oppressed by its taxation. It does so by this law, it does so by all our tax laws, opening the courts of law to the aggrieved citizen for his remedy. That is all he is entitled to.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MILLER] will see that his proposition would leave the courts of the State with the jurisdiction, whereas it should be in the Federal courts if the power is conferred at all. I move to amend by inserting the words "except in the circuit court of the United States for the proper district."

Mr. MILLER. These suits are all brought in the district court, and not in the circuit court.

Mr. HOLMAN. The district court has no jurisdiction at all. Under no circumstances could it have it. If the Federal court has jurisdiction it is the circuit court.

Mr. MILLER. I beg pardon.

Mr. HOLMAN. We have conferred certain jurisdiction upon the district court so far as penalties are concerned. Admiralty cases are the only ones in which we have conferred chancery jurisdiction upon the district court.

Mr. MILLER. Does the gentleman say that no subject can be entertained by the district court?

Mr. HOLMAN. No, sir; Congress can confer that power, but it would not be in harmony with the Federal system.

Now, one word with reference to the views expressed by the gentleman from Rhode Island. He is in the habit of discussing questions very fairly. He says that the citizen has ample security in the fact that if the assessor or collector levies the tax contrary to law, he can sue them. How?

Mr. JENCKES. Against the collector.

Mr. HOLMAN. Upon his bond?

Mr. JENCKES. Why certainly.

Mr. HOLMAN. Not at all. The bond is not payable to him. He has no right to sue in the name of the United States. All the remedy he has is the simple right of action of assumpsit, or whatever else it may be, or of trespass against the man who committed the trespass. Is it possible that a great Government proposes to so cripple the rights of the citizen as that he shall have but two remedies for manifest wrong, the one in suing an individual who may be perfectly worthless, against whom a judgment would be valueless, and the other by being compelled to go from the extremest part of the United States to the Federal capital, and there follow up that endless circumlocution which has been a drawback to the settlement of claims against all Governments in all ages, and as much in our country as in any other, that endless, hopeless, aimless, pointless circumlocution that has ever attended the administration, especially of an office like the Revenue Bureau or any department connected with the public revenue. These are the only remedies the citizen is to have for injustice, instead of leaving to the Federal courts the power to grant injunctions upon sworn complaint, with ample bonds given. In the one case nothing is lost; the Government cannot lose a cent; there is a bond not only for the tax, but for the penalties. In the other case there is only the remedy against the collector in the State courts or the endless and hopeless remedy for the citizen before the Revenue Commissioner. I talked with one of the most intelligent young gentlemen in my district, who has been here for some time in connection with claims before the revenue department, upon this subject, and he assures me that there is not a single claim that has been filed in that department within the last eighteen months that has been up to this time adjusted, and that if a claim for taxes improperly collected is adjusted within a period of eighteen or twenty months it is done with more than usual promptness.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to say one word with reference to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana. It seems to me that the whole argument is in a nutshell. The gentleman from Indiana must know perfectly well that if it was competent for any person assessed with tax to restrain by process of injunction the collection of that tax the effect would be to prevent the collection of any taxes, and not only so, but the effect would be so to lumber up the business of the circuit courts and district courts that it would be impossible for any business to be done in them.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does not the gentleman know that from the month of June, 1862, to March, 1867, this proceeding by injunction was allowable in the Federal courts? And did any injury result to the country or to the finances?

Mr. ALLISON. I do know perfectly well that for a portion of the time this remedy was allowed and that it was exercised in many instances, and that it was exercised until it became difficult in many districts to collect any taxes.

Now, this is the remedy that exists to-day with reference to the collection of customs. Why is it that the gentleman has not opposed it before when it has been on the statute-book for years with reference to the collection of customs at ports of entry? Why, sir, the only remedy that a man has who has been improperly assessed under the tariff law is by a suit against the collector of the port; he is compelled to pay the tax and penalties if need be under protest, and then commence a suit against the collector for the recovery back of the money. Has any difficulty arisen in your ports of entry from your customs laws? And why should we have any different law in reference to our internal revenue? There is no reason. It is true that for a portion of the time when this revenue law was in force proceedings were allowed by injunctions, but they became so numerous and the courts were so lumbered up that the collection of the taxes was materially interfered with, and therefore the provision which is in this bill and which is now the law of the land was passed. I know of no serious injury which has resulted to any person by reason of the existing law.

And I am surprised that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] should propose to interfere with the collection of the taxes—as he does by his amendment, the effect of which will be to interfere most seriously with the collection of taxes. I now yield to the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. JENCKES.]

Mr. JENCKES. The point of the argument of the gentleman from Indiana is, that a person aggrieved has no remedy except against the collector; that he has none against the sureties. If there is none provided by this bill there should be one, as in the case of the customs revenue. I presume there is, that the bonds of the collector inure not only to the benefit of the United States but to the benefit of the claimants against the United States.

The ground taken by the gentleman from Indiana is governed by the present law. This bill recognizes the existing law, both in regard to the collection of internal revenue and in regard to the collection of customs. One thing I hope is remedied by this bill; and that is, that suits may be brought against collectors in the courts of the United States. And then the officers of the United States and the courts of the United States can see that justice is done to all citizens who complain that they are aggrieved by the provisions of the law and the acts of the officers under it.

I do not understand, as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] seems to do, that the courts were burdened with these suits. Some courts, to my knowledge, refused to take cognizance and jurisdiction of these suits. Some courts did take cognizance of them, hence the difference in the operation of the law. That difference existed in the courts of the States and in the courts of the United States, to a certain extent. A provision like this is a wholesome one.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question was then taken upon the amendment of Mr. HOLMAN to the amendment of Mr. MILLER, and it was not agreed to.

The question was then taken upon the amendment of Mr. MILLER, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend the last sentence of this section by inserting after the words "no suit," the words "except in the circuit court of the United States for the proper district."

Mr. JENCKES. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. JENCKES. My point is that this amendment is the same that has just been voted down.

Mr. HOLMAN. Very well; then I will change the amendment, and move to add to the last sentence of the section the words "except in the circuit courts of the United States for the proper district."

Mr. JENCKES. I rise to a point of order, that this is substantially the same amendment just voted down.

Mr. HOLMAN. I submit to the gentleman from Rhode Island that in my absence, with but few members present, the amendment I had submitted was rejected.

Mr. JENCKES. That is a question between the gentleman and the Chairman.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to be heard upon the point of order. This amendment is in different language from the one I offered before.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will rule that the amendment is in order. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOLMAN. Unless there is an entire misapprehension of the law bearing upon this question, then I hold you cannot maintain suits against collectors in the courts; unless there is an absolute provision of statute law it cannot be done. The reason is manifest: the collector has his precept, he has his execution in his hand, and for any act done by him under that precept that is a sufficient answer.

Mr. JENCKES. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. JENCKES. Cannot any person against whom the collector has a warrant for the collection of taxes object to the propriety of the tax and pay it under protest?

Mr. HOLMAN. Does not the gentleman know that payment under protest receives a different mode of construction in almost every State of the Union?

Mr. JENCKES. Not in the courts of the United States; they have a uniform rule of construction. The collector has the right to remove the case to the circuit court.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hold, in the first place, that an action cannot be maintained against a collector unless the right of action is expressly given by the statute law; it does not exist by virtue of the common law of the land.

Again, Mr. Chairman, a provision requiring every citizen who seeks a remedy like this restraining the collection of unlawful tax, to go for that purpose to a remote point, the capital of his State, will operate very oppressively in most of the States of this Union, though not, perhaps, in that represented by the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. JENCKES;] and when the citizen is thus compelled to go to a remote point to obtain his remedy, it may be assumed that he will not go there except in a case of great oppression or manifest wrong. The experience of the gentleman from Rhode Island, as well as that of every other gentleman on this floor, will sustain me when I say that eighteen months must usually elapse before a claim for taxes improperly paid can be adjusted; and when such a claim is successful only the amount of the taxes is paid, with no interest, no costs, no damages.

We are told that a provision securing to the citizen the right to go into the Federal court at the capital of his State file under bond an application for an injunction, with his statement of the facts under oath, will operate oppressively with reference to the Government. The bill makes every provision in behalf of the Government while the rights of the citizen in this regard are entirely overlooked. From 1862 till 1867 the law of the United States recognized this right of the citizen for which I am now contending; yet I never heard that in consequence of that recognition the courts were overrun with business. I certainly knew but few instances, during all that period, in which suits were brought to restrain the collection of taxes, and they were extreme cases.

If I were arguing in favor of giving jurisdiction of these cases to the State courts, I could understand why objection should be made; but I simply propose that the citizen shall have this remedy in the Federal courts. If this Government, in the enforcement of its revenue system, is to trample out and extinguish every right of the citizen, then our Constitution ceases to be of any value, and its pretended guarantees for the protection of the citizen are a miserable cheat and illusion.

When a citizen believes that tax has been wrongfully assessed against him, he should, upon every principle of justice, be allowed, on giving proper security and filing a sworn statement before a competent tribunal, to restrain the collection of that tax until the case can be judicially decided. This method of proceeding is in every way preferable to compelling the citizen, when he feels himself aggrieved by the assessment of taxes, to travel perhaps thousands of miles to lay his case before an officer at the seat of Government, subjecting himself to a slow process of adjudication consuming eighteen months or more, and finally obtaining the decision of an officer having no familiarity with the legal principles which may be involved.

Mr. SCHENCK. This is simply a question whether we shall collect taxes or gather a lot of lawsuits. [Laughter.] I hope the amendment will be rejected.

The question being taken, the amendment was declared not agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN called for a division.

On a division, there were—ayes 18, noes 41; no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN. Unless the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] withdraws the call for a division, the Chair must order the roll to be called, as no quorum has voted.

Mr. HOLMAN. This question is certainly a very important one; and it is conceded that for years our tax law contained a provision of this kind. I trust it will be agreed that the question shall be passed on in a full House.

Mr. ALLISON. Debate is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is objected to.

Mr. MILLER. I hope the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] will agree that on this question a vote shall be taken in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. No debate is in order.

Mr. WOODWARD. I would like to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.]

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WOODWARD] will be allowed to proceed.

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODWARD. I propose to reason with my friend from Indiana on this question, for he is a most reasonable man. From the argument which he has made, it seems to me he has not reflected upon the character of the law which we are considering. It is a law passed in virtue of that express grant of the Constitution to the legislative department of the taxing power. The Constitution confers on the legislative department of the Government the taxing power, and like all constitutional grants it is entire—it is the whole taxing power. The judiciary has nothing to do with taxes as such at all.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. If an unconstitutional law were passed would the judiciary have nothing to do with the question?

Mr. WOODWARD. Certainly it would. I was about to refer to that as an illustration. That takes in a whole class of cases. Where the law is unconstitutional, that is, where the legislative department has gone beyond the constitutional power to make a tax law, then the courts may interpose to protect the citizen.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. Suppose the collector makes a wrong construction of the law, ought not the judiciary to have jurisdiction of it?

Mr. WOODWARD. This law provides that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall be the ultimate authority for the decision of such questions.

Mr. COBURN. Suppose the act of the officers who collect the taxes are void, and clearly void, is there no power of injunction?

Mr. WOODWARD. That is the same question over again.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. Suppose the acts are beyond the authority of the law?

Mr. WOODWARD. If the acts are beyond the authority of the law, if ultra vires they are restrained under general principles. We start with the assumption that this is the exercise of a clearly granted constitutional power, to wit, the power to levy a tax.

Then this law provides a special remedy for cases of mistaken power. If the case occurs that the gentleman has stated, this law provides a special remedy. It is a general principle that wherever a statute provides a special remedy it displaces all common-law remedies; and in Pennsylvania we have a statute to that effect, that wherever the Legislature provides a special remedy there shall be no resort to the common law except it is necessary to carry out the statute. It is an express statute. This is a principle of law which prevails in many States where they have no statute on the subject.

Here is a case where the Legislature, in the exercise of clearly constitutional power, provides a special remedy for all cases which arise under it; and so providing, all the ordinary remedies are necessarily displaced. If the law is beyond the power of the legislative department to make them, the courts have jurisdiction.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to ask the gentleman whether this is an ample and proper remedy for the citizen? After he has paid his money he must come to the capital of the nation and prosecute his claim for having the money refunded, and how long this will take him the gentleman very well knows; and after he has done all this, all he gets back is what he paid without damages and without interest. Is that a proper remedy?

Mr. WOODWARD. Whether the special remedies of this statute are proper and competent or not is a fair question.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. That is the very subject-matter of debate.

Mr. WOODWARD. That is not the subject-matter. The question here is whether the courts in virtue of the general common-law power shall have power to restrain the collection of this tax. I say that it is the exercise of judicial power unprecedented and inconsistent with the theory and genius of our Government.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman from Ohio let a vote be taken in the House?

Mr. SCHENCK. I cannot consent to that. The committee divided; and there were—ayes 19, noes 61; no quorum voting.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the amendment be reserved to be voted on hereafter.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not object to that.

It was agreed to accordingly.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to strike out "fifteen" in the first part of the section and insert "eighteen."

Mr. ALLISON. The law is now for fifteen months.

Mr. MAYNARD. I hope while the law in existence has not been recommended by the Department to be changed in matters of detail of this kind that the gentleman will not seriously press this amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. The language of the first part of this section is, "that the Commissioner is hereby authorized, on appeal made to him within fifteen months from the date of the assessment thereof, to remit the tax erroneously or illegally assessed," &c. Now, sir, several cases have come to my own knowledge where it has been found that the time is really too brief. That has been the experience of many who have had occasion to seek the application of this law. The addition of the period of three months is not certainly very important as regards the Government. This is not a change of any principle. That it is the statute of 1862 is no reason why it should not be changed now, because it does not affect any principle at all. In 1862 it was well enough. We did not understand the matter then. We have followed up this provision to this time without seeing the propriety of any change. Inasmuch as it is not a question of great moment, and an extension of the time can do no wrong to the Government, I think the committee can afford, in a case like this where some slight benefit is sought to be obtained, some slight security to the victim of unjust taxation, to allow this amendment. I hope they will not insist upon retaining the exact language that they have reported to the House.

Mr. SCHENCK. We have done nothing except to look over the law and come to the conclusion that fifteen months is the best limit of time. It is a matter of judgment. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

The amendment was disagreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 54. And be it further enacted, That when any property which has been seized is liable to perish or become greatly reduced in price or value by keeping, or when it cannot be kept without great expense, and, in the opinion of the collector and assessor, it is necessary that the said property shall be sold to prevent such waste or expense, they shall cause the same to be appraised, and the owner thereupon shall have said property returned to him upon giving bond in such form as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and in an amount equal to the appraised value thereof, with such sureties as the said collector and assessor shall deem good and sufficient, to abide the final order, decree, or judgment of the court having cognizance of the case, and to pay the amount of said appraised value to the collector, marshal, or otherwise, as he may be ordered and directed by the court, which bond shall be filed with the United States district attorney for the district in which said proceedings in rem may be commenced. And in case said bond shall have been executed and the property returned before process of law issued as aforesaid, the marshal shall give notice of the pendency of proceedings in court to the parties executing said bond by personal service or publication, and in manner and form as the court may direct, and the court shall thereupon have jurisdiction of said matter and parties in the same manner as if such property had been seized by virtue of the process aforesaid. But if said owner shall neglect or refuse to give said bond, the assessor shall issue to the collector or marshal an order to sell the said property, and the said collector or the marshal shall thereupon advertise and sell the same at public auction, in the same manner as goods may be sold on final execution in said district, and the proceeds of the sale, after deducting the reasonable cost of the seizure and sale, shall be paid to the court, to abide its final order and judgment.

Mr. SCHENCK. The committee desire to correct the language of this section by striking out the following words at the beginning of the section :

That when any property which has been seized is liable to perish or become greatly reduced in price or value by keeping, or when it cannot be kept without great expense, and, in the opinion of the collector and assessor, it is necessary that the said property be sold to prevent such waste or expense.

And inserting in lieu thereof the following :

That when any perishable property has been seized which is liable to become greatly reduced in value by keeping, and in the opinion of the collector and assessor it is necessary that the said property shall be sold to prevent waste.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. Another verbal amendment. In line ten strike out the word "and," and in line fifteen strike out the word "he."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows :

SEC. 55. And be it further enacted, That all seizures of property made by or under the authority of a collector shall be reported immediately to the assessor of the district, and all seizures of property made by or under the authority of an assessor shall be reported immediately to the collector of the district; and the assessor and collector shall together, within five days from such seizure, inquire into the facts constituting the ground of seizure, and if they shall agree that the seizure was wrongfully made, the property seized shall be discharged; if they agree that the seizure was rightfully made, they shall each note such agreement in their several offices, and the collector shall institute proceedings for forfeiture of the property seized according to law. If said assessor and collector shall disagree, they shall severally report the facts in the case and their disagreement to the supervisor of internal revenue of their district, and such supervisors shall immediately examine such reports and make his decision thereon, and shall either direct the collector to proceed for a forfeiture of the property seized, or that the said property shall be released in accordance with his decision, as the case may be. Any party having an interest in the property seized shall have a right, after such decision made by agreement of the collector and assessor, within five days after such agreement, to appeal to the supervisor of internal revenue in such case, who shall examine into the facts and report to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue his conclusions thereon; and said Commissioner is authorized to make such order in the premises as he may deem just. And if said supervisor has ordered proceedings of forfeiture in any case, any person having an interest in the property may, within five days after such order, apply to him for a review of the case, and upon such review he is authorized to make order in the premises, as in case of disagreement between the collector and the assessor.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move as an amendment from the committee to strike out the words "after such decision made by agreement of the collector and assessor, within five days after such agreement," and to insert in lieu thereof the following: "within five days after any decision made by agreement of the collector and assessor."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows :

SEC. 56. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of collectors in their respective districts to collect all taxes, penalties, forfeitures, and fines, and to that end collectors are respectively authorized to prosecute for the recovery of the same, in the name of the United States, in any proper form of action, or by any appropriate form of proceeding, in any circuit or district court of the United States for the judicial district within which any such tax, penalty, forfeiture, or fine may have been assessed or incurred, or in any judicial district in which the party liable thereto may reside at the commencement of such suit. But no such suit shall be commenced without the authority of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue; and no other counsel except a district attorney of the United States shall appear in or prosecute such suit unless authorized thereto by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, either expressly or by general regulations. Whenever in any civil action for a penalty the informer may be a witness for the prosecution, the party against whom such penalty is claimed may be admitted as a witness on his own behalf; and the proceeds of all judgments for taxes, costs, forfeitures, and penalties, as well as all moneys otherwise collected or received on such account, shall be paid to the collector as internal taxes are required to be paid. All property, real or personal, forfeited under any of the provisions of this act, except when otherwise provided, shall, under the direction of the court in which the proceeding against such property may be pending, or in which the judgment of forfeiture shall have been recovered, be sold at public auction; and the proceeds thereof, after deducting expenses of sale, shall be disposed of according to law.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend by striking out the word "such," in line fifteen, and inserting the word "any;" also by striking out the words "may be," in line eighteen, and inserting "is."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JENCKES. I move to strike out the words "unless authorized thereto by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue either expressly or by general regulations." I respectfully submit that we have arrived at a hard place in this law, and I make this motion preliminarily to others, and unless they are accepted I shall move to strike out the entire section. Under the law as it now stands the collection of all these penalties is left entirely to the discretion of the collector of the district under the authorization veto and general control of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. The consequence is that we have none of these penalties collected. I say none as an extreme proposition. I mean to say that not one tenth or one twentieth of those which ought to be collected are collected; and this section seems to me, like that in the present law, to be based upon an entirely false principle in administration. Everything that relates to the assessment of these taxes should belong to and be under the control of the assessors. It is their business, their present duty, and when it is performed they should do no more. Everything in relation to the collection of these taxes is an executive duty.

The collector receives his warrant. He should go on and execute it and have no discretion with regard to it. But after he has performed that duty his functions cease, and I am adverse to clothing him or clothing the assessor with any judicial powers. It is not wise, as it seems to me, to combine executive duties with judicial duties. The amendment which I propose is one of several which I shall offer to this section. It gives to the law officers and courts of the United States control over the collection of these penalties and fines. It calls into play an entirely different class of administrative and executive officers with an entirely different training, with an entirely different end. Their object should be and their duty should be to see that justice is done between the Government and its citizens irrespective of the acts of any executive or administrative officer of the Government. And hence it seems to me entirely improper to leave the control of the suits to the collector. If the collector fails to collect the amount due to the United States under his warrant, then his function should end; he should turn that warrant over to the law officer of the Government, and that law officer should see what the law could do to collect or to obtain what the collector could not obtain under his special warrant. It calls into play an entirely different kind of training, of learning, of faculties, of judgment. We give to the quartermaster of the Army power when in the field to purchase whatever he may need for the subsistence of the Army.

We never clothe him with power to determine what subsistence is worth three weeks afterward. He would then act as a judge, and he is not supposed to be possessed of the faculty of judging or weighing testimony. So when the assessor's duty is finished and the warrant made out and the collector's duty is finished and he finds that he is obstructed in the execution of his warrant, what is his duty? Simply to turn it over to the law officer and see what virtue there is in the law and in the courts of the United States for the purpose of collecting dues to the United States.

I desire to say something as to the form of this proceeding, but I shall need more time than I now have, and I shall have to offer another amendment. I will only say, further, on this amendment, that the district attorneys should be held responsible for the execution of the law, and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue ought not to have the power to send to Massachusetts or Iowa lawyers from New York or Washington, irresponsible, retained for special cases, under no special obligations to the Government, to be permitted to be assistant district attorneys when perhaps they may be obstructions to those officers in the performance of their duties in the recovery of the dues to the Government.

Mr. MAYNARD. I do not understand from the reading of the section any of the difficulties that the gentleman from Rhode Island seems to attach to it. His amendment proposes that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall not be authorized to employ counsel to assist district attorneys in the prosecution for the recovery of either penalties, forfeitures, or fines. His amendment goes to that extent and no more. His remarks went beyond that to the general merits of the section.

The section provides "that it shall be the duty of collectors in their respective districts to collect all taxes, penalties, forfeitures, and fines." Their mode of collecting the tax is already pointed out.

Mr. JENCKES. That is all right.

Mr. MAYNARD. Not only the tax proper, but what is called penal taxes. For the collection of forfeitures and fines he must have recourse to the courts of the country.

Mr. JENCKES. I do not object until you come to the words, "in any proper form of action, or by any appropriate mode of proceeding."

Mr. MAYNARD. The courts of the country designated are pointed out. He must proceed by indictment as for a misdemeanor, or by civil action, or the recovery of the penalty by an action for debt in the circuit court or district court of the United States where the party may live or where the fraud may occur.

Mr. JENCKES. It does not say "by indictment." It says "proper form of action," which simply refers to an action of debt under the common law, which is but a qui tam action, the worst form of procedure.

Mr. MAYNARD. That is a very technical construction.

Mr. JENCKES. If that construction had not prevailed in the courts of the United States under the existing law, I would not have made the objection here.

Mr. MAYNARD. If it would relieve the difficulty of the gentleman, we might say "by any proper form of action or any appropriate form of proceeding."

Mr. JENCKES. If the gentleman will move to amend by making it read, "by indictment on information in any proper form of action, or appropriate form of proceeding," I will have no objection.

Mr. MAYNARD. I do not think that would add anything to the present force of the section.

Mr. JENCKES. The courts will think to the contrary.

Mr. MAYNARD. I do not think it would do any harm. Whenever a collector finds it necessary to proceed in the courts, then he must move through the district attorney, and not otherwise, unless the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall be satisfied that the duties of the district attorney are so onerous that he would be compelled to neglect this portion of his duty without assistance. In that case the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall have authority to assign additional counsel; I see nothing wrong in it; I see no impropriety in it; I can imagine that the Commissioner might execute the law in a spirit of partiality and favoritism. But pray tell me what law there is that may not be improperly administered?

Mr. SCHENCK. If I understand the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. JENCKES,] he is willing to withdraw the amendment he has offered, provided we will agree to amend the section so that it will read "by indictment, or by information, or any other appropriate form of proceeding."

Mr. JENCKES. I will withdraw my amendment, and move the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] if he will allow me to do so, for the purpose of further explanation.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have no objection to that amendment; I think it adds nothing to the section and takes nothing from it.

Mr. JENCKES. There are other formal matters of amendment which may be necessary.

The amendment of Mr. JENCKES, as modified upon the suggestion of Mr. SCHENCK, was agreed to.

Mr. JENCKES. I now move to strike out the words "but no such suit shall be commenced without the authority of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue."

Mr. SCHENCK. I suggested the amendment I did as a compromise, after what the gentleman had said.

Mr. JENCKES. And I make this motion for the purpose of further suggestion; but I will not insist upon it if the gentleman thinks I ought not to do so.

Mr. ALLISON. There was one amendment agreed upon in the Committee of Ways and Means which has not yet been offered, and which, I think, will obviate the objection of the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. JENCKES.] It is to amend the second sentence of this section by inserting after the words "but no such suit" the words "for taxes," so that it will read: "But no such suit for taxes shall be commenced without the authority of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue," &c.

Mr. JENCKES. That obviates my objection. I withdraw the motion to strike out, and accept the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON.]

The amendment was agreed to.

No further amendment was offered.

The next section was read, as follows:

SEC. 57. And be it further enacted, That in all cases arising under the internal revenue laws where, instead of commencing or proceeding with a suit in court, it may appear to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to be for the interest of the United States to compromise the same, he is empowered and authorized to make such compromise with the advice and consent of the Solicitor of Internal Revenue, whose opinion in the case, with reasons therefor, shall be given in writing and delivered to the Commissioner; but no such compromise shall be made of any case after a suit or proceeding in court has been commenced without the recommendation also of the district attorney for the judicial district in which the suit or proceeding is pending, or of such other counsel as may be employed to conduct or prosecute the same on the part of the United States.

Mr. PAINE. I move to amend by striking out this whole section; but I will not detain the committee by arguing the proposition.

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. PAINE.] I desire to say that I find in this section a provision the necessity for which I have frequently seen. I know that in many cases heretofore where suits have been commenced trouble has arisen as to who should withdraw them or when they should be withdrawn. After the district attorney has commenced a suit the Commissioner of Internal Revenue has had the power to withdraw that suit without consulting him. Now, this section, which I hope will be retained in the bill, provides for exactly such cases. After providing previously that suits shall be commenced by the authority or order of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, we provide in this section that a suit shall not be withdrawn without the consent of the district attorney. I think this a great improvement upon the present law, and by it there will be afforded facilities such as we have not heretofore had for the trial of these cases.

On the amendment of Mr. PAINE there were—ayes twenty-five, noes not counted.

The CHAIRMAN. Less than a majority of a quorum voting in the affirmative, the amendment is not agreed to.

Mr. PRICE. I move to amend by adding at the end of the pending section the following:

Provided, That no compromise shall be made unless the party offending shall pay twice the amount of the tax.

My object is that no offender against the law shall escape without paying twice the amount he would have been obliged to pay if he had not offended.

The amendment was not agreed to, there being—ayes twenty-five, noes not counted.

Mr. JENCKES. I move to amend the pending section by adding to it the following:

Provided, That the district attorney, under the advice of the judge of the court in which any case may be pending, may discontinue any civil suit or enter a nolle prosequi of any criminal proceedings, in his discretion, during the course of the trial of any case.

Mr. Chairman, I will state my reason for offering this amendment. It is often found in many districts that when the district attorney enters upon the trial of a case, notwithstanding his careful preparation of it, notwithstanding the previous examination before a commissioner if it be a criminal case, notwithstanding the ascertaining of the names of the witnesses and what they will testify, yet when the trial has begun it turns out that the witnesses have been spirited away. In such a case, under the present law, and under this bill as reported by the committee, the district attorney has no discretion, except to go on and have a verdict rendered by the jury, that verdict being necessarily an acquittal, which exempts the defendant absolutely from all further prosecution for the same offense; whereas if the district attorney had the power, under the advice of the court, to discontinue the case, he might commence it again at the next term or find a new indictment.

In our part of the country witnesses may disappear very suddenly. It costs but a dollar to go from New York to Boston, and but a few dollars to stay away in Boston, or any other place in New England, until another term of the court. I have known cases in all the eastern courts—in the eastern district of Pennsylvania as well as in the district of Maine—where our district attorneys have commenced the trial of a case believing that they had their witnesses at hand, yet, when the case had been opened to the jury, they did not respond. Under the present law the district attorney has no authority to discontinue a case except with the permission of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Let me ask the gentleman if he enters a nolle prosequi after swearing the jury would not that be a bar to any prosecution? After the jury is sworn they must render a verdict.

Mr. JENCKES. He must find out whether his witnesses are there when the case is called. If they are there and he goes on with his case and then his witnesses are spirited away, the court does not allow him to continue. He must go on. The court has no discretion under this bill or the present law. I have seen it done as I have stated. I have seen the district attorney call his witnesses and have them sworn, and then by reason of their disappearance, the judge not being authorized to continue the case, it being too late to consult the Commissioner, the judgment has been entered for the defendant, when if continued and tried at the next term the party would have been convicted. I hope the district attorney will have the right to call the case or not, so the United States shall not suffer by the running away of witnesses.

Mr. MILLER. We can provide for cases when witnesses absent themselves.

Mr. JENCKES. Under the present law all cases are qui tam actions, and that answers the gentleman from Illinois. As soon as the jury is called the district attorney must go on. The witnesses are summoned and he may think it safe for him to go on. When the case is commenced his witnesses respond when called, but when he gets to a material point he may break down altogether by reason of the disappearance of his witnesses. The defendant is then entitled to a verdict. The court cannot grant a continuance.

Mr. MILLER. It was improper for the district attorney to go on without the witness.

Mr. JENCKES. District attorneys are honorable men and good lawyers.

Mr. PAINE. I am opposed, Mr. Chairman, entirely to the adoption of an amendment which will go to that length. I am opposed to putting it in the power of the district attorney or the court to discontinue and terminate a suit under such circumstances. I would be willing to agree to an amendment which would make liberal provisions for continuing a suit where the district attorney should find himself disabled by the disappearance of witnesses and their not appearing in the case. If the gentleman will frame an amendment adapted to that emergency, I will cheerfully vote for it, but I am unwilling to put it in the hands of the court or the district attorney to discontinue entirely a suit for such a cause as that.

Mr. JENCKES. Insert "discontinue or procure the continuance of." I will state to the gentleman from Wisconsin the difficulty in the exercise of that power which we have all found in the trial of criminal cases. As soon as they are opened to the jury they are out of the power of the prosecuting officer, and the defendant may call for a verdict of acquittal if the prosecutor breaks down, and there is a question whether the court will grant a continuance if the witnesses are spirited away. If he is authorized to discontinue he may commence next day. If the court will allow a continuance it is the most proper thing to be done.

Mr. PAINE. I desire that the gentleman will put his proposition in some careful form, so we can understand it.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to strike out the word "discontinue," and I do it for the purpose of enabling me to say that I hope the gentleman will confine his amendment to some careful provision allowing the district attorney under those circumstances to continue those cases.

Now, the gentleman assumes there is no difficulty about these district attorneys. Unfortunately, sir, a good deal of our trouble arises in that direction. You talk of the "whisky ring." The "whisky ring" has aiders and abettors in the district attorneys and in the officers of the law. I have in my mind a case where the proof has been furnished to us of a judge of one of the Federal courts and the district attorney who divided the black-mail between them, the consideration for letting off some sixty culprits arraigned before the court. I trust that will result in the impeachment of that judge.

So far as this matter is concerned, the gentleman is mistaken if he supposes that we ought to throw everything into the power of the district attorney, so that he shall hold a veto over all these cases. I am perfectly willing that in proper cases he shall have his remedy against any possible defeat of the ends of justice, by continuing his case if witnesses have been, as the gentleman remarks, spirited out of the way. But so far only, I think, should the amendment go if it is to be made to the section at all. I entirely agree upon that point with the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. PAINE,] and hope there will be no amendment by which the district attorney, at his discretion, may discontinue, by a nolle prosequi, any case at his pleasure, thus holding, as it were, the key to the whole matter.

Mr. JENCKES. I agree with the gentleman for Ohio entirely. I do not wish to leave the power to the district attorney. There are some of them who are excellent officers.

Mr. SCHENCK. I know there are.

Mr. JENCKES. And there are some such as the gentleman describes. I hope he will be after them as well as the judges who collude with them, and that we shall have them arraigned before this House, if what the gentleman has discovered, and if what I know another committee has discovered, of the conduct of one of them be true. But this amendment is entirely in the interest of the Government.

Mr. MULLINS. He will have to be more fortunate with them than we have been recently.

Mr. JENCKES. I have seen a district attorney rise with a summons in his hand and the return of the officer—believing he had all the witnesses in the presence of the court—go on with a qui tam action under the law and call the witnesses to the formal matter of the case, but when he came to the substantive matters find all the witnesses at bay with no officer being able to tell where they were. In our country they can be spirited away easily between two days and not be heard of in six months. The district attorney will thus be left entirely to the formal proof, and, under the present law, the defendant has a right to require a verdict of acquittal of the jury, no matter what the penalty may be. Under the proposition I make the district attorney may say to the court, "Here I am caught in this way. It is no fault of mine. I believe there has been connivance on the part of the defendant. I wish to enter a nolle prosequi in order that a case may be made again."

Mr. MULLINS. Is there nothing in the law that allows a stay of proceedings when the party is thus taken by surprise?

Mr. JENCKES. There is not in criminal cases. After the jury are sworn in and the case is opened to them the defendant may demand a verdict of acquittal. The discretion of the Government is exhausted with the swearing in of the jury. That is precisely the difficulty in these revenue cases that this amendment is intended to meet. It is not left to the discretion of the district attorney, but there is discretion under the advice and direction of the court. They may consent in open court or the court may sanction the motion of the district attorney, and the order of the court will be nothing more than an excuse for the district attorney for a non-compliance with the provisions of the act. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. O'NEILL. If the gentleman will withdraw the amendment I will renew it.

Mr. JENCKES. Very well.
Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Chairman, I had hoped that the committee might have gone further in the organization of these courts, where, I believe, the trouble in all these cases has arisen. There is a bad set of men surrounding the courts—not the officers of the courts—and this has led to great depletion of the Treasury. The trouble commences in the criminal proceeding, almost upon the entrance into the court, in the grand jury-room, and I would like to have some provision in the bill giving the district attorney power to take his case before one grand jury, and then, if necessary, before a succeeding grand jury.

Mr. JENCKES. This gives it.

Mr. O'NEILL. I hope it does. I know in our courts the trouble is not in the district attorney; it is not with the judge; but it has been with the officer who subpoenas or calls the grand jury. There have been instances where our district attorney has not allowed cases to go before a certain grand jury, and where there have been the most remarkable collisions between the grand jury and the court and district attorney that are known in criminal proceedings. The trouble is not with the officers of the court, but with those who have power to summon grand juries. It is that body which is surrounded by what is called the whisky ring. I know such to be the state of things in the eastern district of Pennsylvania, and that it is in the marshal's office, and in the surroundings of the grand jury, where the injury begins. That is, perhaps, the reason why the district attorneys and the courts themselves have been criticised. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. MILLER. I would inquire of the gentleman whether if one grand jury should ignore a bill the case could not be sent up to another grand jury?

Mr. O'NEILL. It could; but the trouble is the delay.

Mr. PAINE. I offer the following as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. JENCKES,] hoping that it will be satisfactory to him and to the committee:

That it shall be lawful for the court at any stage of such suit to continue the same for good cause shown on motion of the district attorney.

Mr. JENCKES. Insert after the word "suit" the words "or criminal proceeding."

Mr. PAINE. Very well; I will insert those words.

Mr. JENCKES. I suggest to the gentleman that he add the words "or to allow a discontinuance of such suit."

Mr. PAINE. I am not willing for one to consent to that, and I hope the gentleman will not press it.

Mr. JENCKES. This will cover the majority of cases, I agree.

The question was taken on Mr. PAINE's amendment to the amendment; and it was agreed to.

Mr. JENCKES' amendment, as amended, was then adopted.

Mr. GARFIELD. I offer the following amendment:

On page 70, section fifty-seven, after the word "Commissioner," in line nine, insert these words:

And in every case where a compromise is made there shall be placed on file in the office of the Commissioner, the opinion of the solicitor, together with a statement of the amount of tax assessed, the amount of additional tax or penalty imposed by law in consequence of the neglect or delinquency of the person against whom the tax was assessed, and the amount actually paid in accordance with the terms of the compromise.

I trust that there will be no objection to this amendment. One of the chief objections to the whole compromise system has been that it opened a door for all sorts of suspicion, if not for actual fraud.

Mr. SCHENCK. If my colleague will allow me, I will agree to that amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. All I want is this: that the history of the compromise in each case may be actually on file.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COBURN. I offer the following amendment, to come in at the close of the section:

And any one violating the provisions of this section shall be guilty of a felony and be fined in any sum not less than $100 nor more than $1,000, and imprisoned not less than one nor more than three years.

I will state briefly the object of this amendment. There is a provision in the section forbidding these compromises except under certain circumstances. Now, that is all right. It is not necessary for me to go into an argument to show that district attorneys do combine with parties and procure frauds against the revenue system. It is generally acknowledged that these compromises are the principal source of frauds in the collection of the revenue. But it is useless to forbid compromises unless we impose a penalty on the violation of this law. This amendment, therefore, proposes that there shall be a punishment of fine or imprisonment, and the words "upon conviction" should be inserted in the proper place. This section standing, as it does, without a provision creating a penalty, would be like a provision forbidding the crime of larceny, or the crime of murder, or any other crime in the catalogue, and then providing no penalty for it. What would be the use of forbidding larceny, perjury, or any other crime, and not putting any penalty in the statute to operate upon the offender? The amendment I have offered strikes at the offender. I think no other section provides for the penalty.

Mr. SCHENCK. Section sixty-two covers the point the gentleman makes.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBURN] will withdraw his amendment, as it is fully provided for by section sixty-two.

Mr. COBURN. If that is the case I will withdraw my amendment.

The amendment was accordingly withdrawn.

No further amendment was offered.

The next section was read, as follows:

SEC. 58. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to establish such rules and regulations as may be necessary, and not inconsistent with law, for the observance of revenue officers, district attorneys, and marshals, respecting suits arising under the internal revenue laws to which the United States is a party, with a view to securing the just responsibility of those officers, and the prompt collection of all revenues and debts due the United States under such laws. On the institution of any such suit or proceeding, the district attorney or other counsel authorized to conduct the same shall report to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue the full particulars relating to such suit or proceeding; and immediately at the end of every term of a court in which any such suit or proceeding is or shall be pending, the said district attorney or other counsel shall forward to the Commissioner a full and particular statement of the condition of such case.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend the first sentence of this section by striking out the words "district attorneys" and inserting the words "United States district attorney's clerks" after the words "for the observance of revenue officers."

The amendment was agreed to.

No further amendment was offered.

The next section was read, as follows:

SEC. 59. And be it further enacted, That in any case in which any fine, penalty, or forfeiture has been recovered, the person whom the court shall determine to have first informed of the cause, matter, or thing whereby such fine, penalty, or forfeiture was incurred, shall be entitled to such share of the same as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall by general regulation provide, not exceeding a moiety, nor more than $5,000 in any one case; and when any sum is paid in lieu of penalty or forfeiture without suit or before judgment, and a share of the same is claimed by any person as informer, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall determine whether any claimant is entitled to such share as above limited, and to whom the same shall be paid. And no right shall accrue to any informer in any case until the fine, penalty, or forfeiture is fixed by judgment or compromise, and the amount or proceeds shall have been paid, when the informer shall become entitled to his share of the sum adjudged or agreed upon; but nothing herein contained shall be construed to limit or affect the power conferred by law to remit the whole or any portion of a fine, penalty, or forfeiture. In any case in which a punishment by fine or imprisonment is provided for a violation of the law, no share of any sum paid to the United States in satisfaction of its demands shall be awarded or paid to an informer except after due conviction of the person charged with such offense and judgment on such conviction. Any person who shall receive money or anything of value under a threat to inform, or as a consideration for not informing of any violation of the internal revenue laws, shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not less than $500 nor more than $2,000, and by imprisonment not less than six months nor more than three years.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend the last sentence of the section by striking out the words "thereof, be punished by a fine not less than $500 nor more than $2,000, and by imprisonment," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "be fined not less than $500 nor more than $2,000, and imprisoned."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PRICE. I move to amend this section by adding to it the following:

Provided, however, That when any sum is paid in lieu of penalty or forfeiture, without suit, or before judgment, as provided for in this or any preceding section, no less sum shall be received by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue or other collecting officer than twice the amount of the regular tax.

If I can get the attention of the committee for about a minute and a half, I think I can explain this amendment to the satisfaction of every one. I will explain the object of and the necessity for my amendment. To-day some officer detects an illicit shipment of whisky. He seizes the liquor and has it placed in some place of safety. The parties shipping the whisky, finding themselves caught in their villainy and rascality, come forward and pay their tax and obtain the possession of their whisky again. This is not an imaginary case. In my own town thirty-odd barrels of whisky were seized; and when the parties found they could not do any better, they came forward and paid the tax. Now, while these men attempt to swindle the Government out of the tax, they know very well that, under the present management, if they are caught in their attempt at fraud they are no worse off than they would have been if they had paid the tax before the shipment of the whisky. Now, I propose that these men—I came very near saying "these gentlemen," which would have been a mistake—when they are caught in these frauds shall not be allowed to receive any benefit from it, shall not be allowed to get off with as little expense as though they had been honest and paid their tax before the liquor was shipped. If you put this penalty in the law they will at least not have their present inducement to try to evade the law. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not know whether there is any particular objection to that. I hope the words will be stricken out, "provided, however." One difficulty in the law is the use of such words as "provided" and "provided, however." This does not limit anything. Make it a distinct sentence.

Mr. PRICE. I agree to that.

Mr. ALLISON. It should be attached to section fifty-seven. I do not object to it, but there is where it should be.

Mr. PRICE. Very well; let it be put there.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection it will be attached to section fifty-seven.

Mr. PRICE. Then I modify it so as to read, "this or any other section," instead of "this or any preceding section."

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. LOAN. I move to add to the end of section fifty-nine as follows:

Provided, That no officer of the United States shall directly or indirectly receive any part of any fine, penalty, or any forfeiture as an informer under this act.

Mr. Chairman, the proposition contained in this amendment has reference to those officers of the revenue whose duty it is to attend to its collection, but who have perverted their office into that of the informer. They neglect to discharge their duties under the law because they find it more to their interest to permit violations of the law and then come in the character of informers. I want to take away from such men all motive to disregard the duties of their office.

Mr. BLAINE. Will that make them any the more careful and honest?

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the amendment will not be adopted. I can see no reason, if we allow a moiety, why it should be refused to a man because he happens to be an officer of the United States. It seems to me, if we are to hold out the inducement of a moiety, there is no reason why it should be denied to a faithful officer, why he should not receive it as well as other persons. I hope the amendment will be rejected.

Mr. LOAN. I move to strike out the last word, in order to have the opportunity to reply to the gentleman from Iowa. It has come under my personal knowledge that officers whose duty it was to collect the revenue have allowed violations of law time and again for the express purpose of turning informers, and in this way receiving quadruple the amount of their salaries. Here is an assistant assessor at five dollars a day, and if he turns informer he may make $5,000. It is much better for them to disregard their duties as assessors, permit violations of law, and then come forward as informers and secure the moiety.

Mr. BLAINE. If a man is knave enough to do that, what is the restriction that he would not employ some man outside?

Mr. LOAN. My amendment says directly or indirectly.

Mr. ALLISON. I oppose the amendment. The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The amendment was also rejected.

No further amendment being offered, the Clerk read the next section, as follows:

SEC. 60. And be it further enacted, That the judge of any circuit or district court of the United States, or any commissioner thereof, may issue a search warrant, authorizing any internal revenue officer to search any premises, if such officer shall make affidavit in writing that he has reason to believe, and does believe, that a fraud upon the revenue has been or is being committed upon or by the use of said premises.

Mr. MERCUR. I move after the word "writing" to insert "particularly describing the place to be searched, and the person or things to be seized."

Mr. Chairman, the Constitution has sought to throw safeguards around the rights of all citizens, so as to protect them, among other things, from unreasonable searches; and it has provided that before a search shall be made a warrant shall issue—

Mr. SCHENCK. If the gentleman will allow me to interrupt him, I will say that I hope his amendment will be adopted.

Mr. MERCUR. If there is no opposition to the amendment I do not care to discuss it. The amendment was agreed to.

No further amendment being offered, the next section was read as follows:

SEC. 61. And be it further enacted, That any internal revenue officer who shall be or become interested, directly or indirectly, in the manufacture of tobacco, snuff, or cigars, or in the production, rectification, or redistillation of distilled spirits, or in the production of fermented liquors, shall be dismissed from office; and any such officer who shall become so interested in any such manufacture or production, rectification, or redistillation, shall, on conviction, be fined not less than $500 nor more than $5,000.

Mr. LOAN. I move to amend by striking out the section just read. I make this motion in deference to the vote given by the committee upon the amendment which I offered a few minutes ago. If, as the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] says, these men are all honest, I can see no objection to allowing them to engage in the business of distillation and the manufacture of tobacco, or in any other occupation which the law recognizes as proper and right. If they are entitled to receive, in addition to their salary, their moiety not exceeding $5,000 in the character of informer, I see no reason why they should not engage in the distillation of spirits, the manufacture of tobacco, or anything of that kind. Hence, in view of the sentiment of the committee, as expressed upon my previous amendment, I think it very improper that this section should be retained in the bill.

Mr. BLAINE. I beg to say to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOAN] that I did not say these officers were all honest. I merely said that the gentleman's amendment would fail to make them honest; that it would only give their rascality another and a worse channel in which to run.

The amendment was not agreed to.

No further amendment being offered, the next section was read, as follows:

SEC. 62. And be it further enacted, That if any officer or agent appointed and acting under the authority of any revenue law of the United States shall be guilty of any extortion or willful oppression, under color of law, or shall knowingly demand other or greater sums than shall be authorized by law, or shall receive any fee, compensation, or reward except as by law prescribed for the performance of any duty, or shall willfully neglect to perform any of the duties enjoined on him by law, or shall conspire or collude with any other person to defraud the United States, or shall make opportunity for any person to defraud the United States, or shall do, or omit to do, any act with intent to enable any other person to defraud the United States, or shall make or sign any false certificate or return in any case where he is by law or regulation required to make a certificate or return, or having knowledge or information of the violation of any revenue law by any person, or of fraud committed by any person against the United States under any revenue law of the United States, shall fail to report in writing such knowledge or information to his next superior officer, and to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, or shall demand or accept or attempt to collect, directly or indirectly, as payment or gift or otherwise, any sum of money or other thing of value for the compromise, adjustment, or settlement of any charge or complaint for any violation or alleged violation of law, except as expressly authorized by law so to do, he shall be dismissed from office, and shall be held to be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, on conviction, be fined not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000, and be imprisoned not less than six months nor more than three years.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend the section just read by striking out the words, "or shall make or sign any false certificate or returns in any case where he is by law or regulation required to make any certificate or return," and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

Or shall negligently or designedly permit any violation of the law by any other person, or shall make or sign any false entry in any book or make or sign any false certificate or return in any case where he is by law or regulation to make any entry, certificate or return.

The amendment was agreed to.

No further amendment was offered.

The next section was read, as follows:

SEC. 63. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner, and assistant commissioner, deputy commissioners, and supervisors of internal revenue, collectors, and deputy collectors, and assessors and assistant assessors, are hereby authorized to administer oaths and take testimony touching any part of the administration of this act with which they are respectively charged, or where such oaths and testimony are by law authorized to be taken; and any officer of internal revenue, authorized to administer oaths, who shall falsely sign, date, or certify to the certicate of any jurat, or shall so sign, date, or certify, without administering the oath or affirmation which such certificate represents to have been administered, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and shall, on conviction thereof, be imprisoned at hard labor not less than one year nor more than five years. And if any person in any case, matter, hearing, or proceeding, under and relating to the internal revenue laws of the United States, in which an oath or affirmation shall be required to be taken or administered under or by the internal revenue laws of the United States, shall, upon the taking of such oath or affirmation, knowingly and willingly swear or affirm falsely, every person so offending shall be deemed guilty of perjury, and shall, on conviction thereof, be liable to the punishment prescribed for that offense by the laws of the United States.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend by striking out, near the beginning of the last sentence the words, "under and relating to the internal revenue laws of the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

No further amendment being offered, the next section was read, as follows:

SEC. 64. And be it further enacted, That every internal revenue officer, whose payment, charges, salary, or compensation shall be composed, either wholly or in part, of fees, commissions, allowances, or rewards, from whatever source derived, shall be required to render to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, at such times and in such manner as he shall by general regulations prescribe, a statement under oath specifying the several amounts received from such fees, commissions, emoluments, allowances, or rewards of whatever nature, or from whatever source derived; and if any such officer shall neglect or refuse to render such statement as so required, he shall, on conviction thereof, be fined not less than $100 nor more than $500.

No amendment was offered.

The next section was read, as follows:

SEC. 65. And be it further enacted, That if two or more persons conspire either to commit any offense against the internal revenue laws of the United States or to defraud the United States in any manner whatever of any internal revenue tax, and one or more of said parties to said conspiracy shall do any act to effect the object thereof, the parties to said conspiracy shall each be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be fined not less than $500 and not more than $10,000, and imprisoned not less than six months nor more than five years.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend by adding at the end of the section the following:

And when any offense shall be begun in one judicial district of the United States, and completed in another, every such offense shall be deemed to have been committed in either of the said districts, and may be dealt with, inquired of, tried, determined, and punished in either of the said districts in the same manner as if it had been actually and wholly committed therein.

The amendment was agreed to.

No further amendment was offered.

The next section was read, as follows:

SEC. 66. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall falsely represent himself to be a revenue officer of the United States, and shall in such assumed character demand or receive any money or other article of value from any person for any tax due to the United States, or for any violation or pretended violation of any revenue law of the United States, such person shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and on conviction thereof shall be fined not less than $500 nor more than $3,000, and be imprisoned not less than six months nor more than five years.

No amendment was offered.

The next section was read, as follows:

SEC. 67. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall forcibly obstruct or hinder any assessor or assistant assessor, or any collector or deputy collector, or any other officer in the execution of any provision of the law relating to internal revenue, or of any power or authority vested by law in any such officer, or shall forcibly rescue, or cause to be rescued, any property, articles, or objects, after the same shall have been seized or detained by any such officer, or shall attempt or endeavor so to do, the person so offending shall, on conviction thereof, for every such offense be fined not less than $100 nor more than $5,000, and be imprisoned not less than one month nor more than five years.

No amendment was offered.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 68. And be it further enacted, That any person may bring a suit in any circuit or district court of the United States, in any proper form of action, to recover back any money or the value of any property which may have been paid or given by him or on his account to any revenue officer or agent of the United States for any illegal act done, or to be done, by any officer or agent; or for the withholding of information of fraud by such officer or agent; or as a share of profits to said officer or agent arising out of any business carried on or to be carried on in violation of any revenue law of the United States; or in consideration of said officer or agent failing to do his duty in any matter as required by law; or for money paid such officer or agent on account of his official position or appointment, and without other consideration. And the party bringing such suit, and prose-cutting the same to final judgment, shall be himself released from any liability by indictment or other criminal proceedings for paying or giving to any such officer or agent the money or property of value as aforesaid.

SEC. 69. And be it further enacted, That if any distiller, rectifier, wholesale liquor dealer, compounder of liquors, distiller of oil, brewer, or manufacturer of tobacco or cigars shall omit, neglect, or refuse to do or cause to be done any of the things required by law in the carrying on or conducting of his business, or shall do anything by this act prohibited, if there be no specific penalty or punishment imposed by any other section of this act for the neglecting, omitting, or refusing to do, or for the doing or causing to be done the thing required or prohibited, he shall pay a penalty of $1,000; and, if the person so offending be a distiller, rectifier, wholesale liquor dealer, or compounder of liquors, all distilled spirits or liquors owned by him or in which he has any interest as owner, if he be a distiller of oil, all oil found in his distillery, and, if he be a manufacturer of tobacco or cigars, all tobacco or cigars found in his manufactory shall be forfeited to the United States.

Mr. SCHENCK. I offer the following as an additional section:

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may, in his discretion and under the advice of the solicitor, remit wholly or in part all penalties and punishments incurred for any violation of the law relating to the internal revenue by any person who shall first, and before any information shall be alleged against himself, discover and inform against other parties concerned with him in such violation; and on any trial touching such offense the evidence of any of the offending parties shall be admissible to be established by commission; but in no case arising under the laws relating to the internal revenue shall any testimony be admissible taken under section three of the act of September 24, 1879, entitled "An act to establish the judicial courts of the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KOONTZ. I move to strike out section sixty-eight. This section provides in substance, first, that any person who succeeds in bribing the revenue officer may sue and recover back in money the value of any property he may have given to that officer in order to corrupt him. In the next place he is relieved "from any liability by indictment or other criminal proceeding for paying or giving such officer or agent the money or property of value as aforesaid." Now, the objection I make to this provision is this: it is a well-settled principle of law that it will not assist any man to recover back the price of his own iniquity. This section substantially provides that any person who has been guilty of an illegal act may himself sue and recover back the price of his own shame. Therefore, I think it ought to be stricken out. I agree that there ought to be stringent measures in order to prevent the violation of the law, but I cannot but recognize this as a violation of a well-settled principle of law.

Mr. MAYNARD. In pari delicto, melior est conditio possidentis is a familiar rule of law. Best those justices are not in pari delicto. The officer is the greater offender, and should be visited with the greater severity.

The amendment of Mr. KOONTZ was disagreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 69. And be it further enacted, That if any distiller, rectifier, wholesale liquor dealer, compounder of liquors, distiller of oil, brewer, or manufacturer of tobacco or cigars shall omit, neglect, or refuse to do or cause to be done any of the things required by law in the carrying on or conducting of his business, or shall do anything by this act prohibited, if there be no specific penalty or punishment imposed by any other section of this act for the neglecting, omitting, or refusing to do, or for the doing or causing to be done the thing required or prohibited, he shall pay a penalty of $1,000; and, if the person so offending be a distiller, rectifier, wholesale liquor dealer, or compounder of liquors, all distilled spirits or liquors owned by him or in which he has any interest as owner; if he be a distiller of oil, all oil found in his distillery, and if he be a manufacturer of tobacco or cigars all tobacco or cigars found in his manufactory, shall be forfeited to the United States.

Mr. HOLMAN. It seems to me that the word "willfully" ought to have been inserted before the words "neglect or refuse."

Mr. SCHENCK. I have an amendment to propose which will meet the gentleman's wish. I move to insert in the sixth line, after the word "shall," the words "knowingly and willfully," so that it will read "shall knowingly and willfully neglect or refuse," &c.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is satisfactory.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. The penalty imposed in this section is fixed at $1,000. I submit that it ordinarily promotes the end of justice to allow some discretion in the courts. I therefore move to amend by inserting before "$1,000," the words "not less than $100 nor more than."

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope that will not be adopted.

Mr. HOLMAN. There ought to be a discretion within some reasonable range. Where you make the penalty specific, and do not vary it according to the circumstances and nature of the offense, you must certainly defeat the ends of justice, because the penalty is sometimes too severe to be inflicted.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. HIGBY. I move to insert after the word "dollars," in the eleventh line, the words, "or imprisonment in the State prison for one year." It seems to me that if only this penalty is imposed the Government in most instances will recover nothing. It is very easy for one who has violated the law to be found without any property to pay a penalty of $1,000, and I think the Government can be saved only by leaving the alternative of the penalty of $1,000 or imprisonment at the discretion of the court. If the man can pay $1,000, very well; let him avoid imprisonment.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. Chairman, this is a penalty, not a fine. It is recoverable in a civil action, and no criminal proceeding is contemplated by this section at all. We have provided in other sections for almost every imaginable offense that can be committed by the class of persons named in this section.

Mr. HIGBY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. HIGBY. Does he not consider that what is charged in this section is an offense, and why is it passed over without having some punishment attached to it?

Mr. ALLISON. This is a section which provides for the omission to do certain things, or the refusal to do certain things, and the penalty is provided for the omission.

The question was taken on Mr. HIGBY's amendment, and it was disagreed to.

No further amendment being offered to the sixty-ninth section, the next section was read, as follows:

SEC. 70. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall, armed with any offensive weapon, or in a violent manner, with clubs or stones, or shall in any manner with force and violence, or with threats of force or violence, rescue any offender arrested, or shall prevent such arrest, or shall assault, beat, or wound any officer or other person acting in his aid, or any person who shall have given or be about to give information against, or shall have discovered or given evidence against, or be about to discover or give evidence against, or shall seize or bring to justice any person offending against this act, or who shall seize or be about to seize or examine any place, goods, or chattels, as provided under this act, or shall forcibly oppose the execution of any of the powers given by this act, or being so armed, or with such violence, as aforesaid, shall offer or threaten so to do, every person so offending, and his aiders and abettors, shall, on conviction, be adjudged to be guilty of felony, and shall be imprisoned for not less than one year nor more than five years.

No amendment was offered, and the Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 71. And be it further enacted, That any revenue officer is hereby authorized, and it shall be his duty, to arrest and take before the United States commissioner residing nearest the place where such arrest shall be made, any person detected in the actual commission of any offense against any of the provisions of this act relative to distilled spirits, tobacco, or cigars, and shall thereon make affidavit and apply for a warrant against the person arrested.

Mr. SCHENCK. I offer the following amendment from the Committee of Ways and Means:

In line three strike out the word "residing."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS, of New Hampshire. I move to strike out the seventy-first section. I make this motion upon the ground that the section is a most extraordinary one in its provisions. I am not aware that it has any analogy in any law or legal proceeding, unless it may be in some cases of police, where a magistrate or police officer is authorized to arrest upon view for a breach of the peace. This section provides that a person may be arrested without any warrant or any complaint under oath, or any formal complaint of any character whatever. It not only provides that, but it provides that he may be arrested upon detection. Detection by whom? By the officer who arrests? It is not confined to that; but he may be arrested by an officer upon detection, or what may be termed detection, by another officer or by a private individual, by a citizen holding no office, being under no responsibility whatever to the law except as a citizen. For these reasons, and because there are no restrictions in the section, I move that it be stricken out. I will say, however, that perhaps the section may be so modified as to relieve it of these objectionable features by providing that the officer may arrest upon view of the violation of the law, assimilating the law in that particular to cases of infractions of police regulations and the laws as they now exist in regard to some of the minor offenses.

Mr. SCHENCK. To meet every objection made by the gentleman which I think has any substance in it, I will move an amendment in the fifth line of the section to insert the words "by such officer" after the word "detected;" so that it will read "any person detected by such officer in the actual commission," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PETERS. I desire to suggest to the gentleman that the word "internal" should be inserted before "revenue" in the first line of this section.

Mr. SCHENCK. Yes, sir; that is an omission. I move to insert the word "internal" before "revenue" in the first line.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS, of New Hampshire. I withdraw the motion to strike out the section.

No further amendment being offered to the seventy-first section, the next section was read, as follows:

SEC. 72. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is hereby authorized to pay such sums, not exceeding in the aggregate any amount appropriated therefor, as may in his judgment be deemed necessary for detecting and bringing to trial and punishment persons guilty of violating the internal revenue laws or conniving at the same, in cases where such expenses are not otherwise provided for by law.

No amendment was offered.

The next section was read, as follows:

SEC. 73. And be it further enacted, That in any case, civil or criminal, where suit or prosecution shall be commenced in any court of any State against any officer of the United States, appointed under or acting by authority of this or any other act to provide internal revenue, or against any person acting under or by authority of any such officer, on account of any act done under color of office or authority, or against any person holding property or estate by title derived from any such officer, concerning such property or estate, and affecting the validity of this act or any other act to provide internal revenue, it shall be lawful for the defendant in such suit or prosecution, at any time before trial, to remove such suit or prosecution by petition to the circuit court of the United States in and for the district in which he shall have been served with process, setting forth the nature of said suit or prosecution, and verifying the same by affidavit, together with a certificate, signed by an attorney or counselor at law of some court of record of the State in which such suit shall have been commenced, or of the United States, setting forth that, as counsel for the petitioner, he has examined the proceedings against him and carefully inquired into all matters set forth in the petition, and that he believes the same to be true; which petition, affidavit, and certificate shall be presented to the said circuit court, if in session, and if not to the clerk thereof at his office, and shall be filed in said office, and the cause shall thereupon be entered on the docket of said court, and shall be thereafter proceeded in as a cause originally commenced in that court; and it shall be the duty of the clerk of said court, if the suit was commenced in the court below by summons, to issue a writ of certiorari to the State court, requiring said court to send to the said circuit court the record and proceedings in said cause; or, if it was commenced by capias, he shall issue a writ of habeas corpus cum causa, a duplicate of which shall be delivered to the clerk of the State court, or left at his office by the marshal of the district or his deputy, or some person duly authorized thereto; and thereupon it shall be the duty of the said State court to stay all further proceedings in such cause; and the said suit or prosecution, upon delivery of such process, or leaving the same as aforesaid, shall be deemed and taken to be moved to the said circuit court, and any further proceedings, trial, or judgment therein in the State court shall be wholly null and void. And if the defendant in any such suit be in actual custody on mesne process therein, it shall be the duty of the marshal, by virtue of the writ of habeas corpus cum causa, to take the body of the defendant into his custody, to be dealt with in the said cause according to the rules of law and the order of the circuit court, or of any judge thereof in vacation. All attachments made and all bail and other security given upon such suit or prosecution shall be and continue in like force and effect as if the same suit or prosecution had proceeded to final judgment and execution in the State court; and if, upon the removal of any such suit or prosecution, it shall be made to appear to the said circuit court that no copy of the record and proceedings therein in the State court can be obtained, it shall be lawful for said circuit court to allow and require the plaintiff to proceed de novo, and to file a declaration of his cause of action, and the parties may thereupon proceed as in action originally brought in said circuit court; and, on failure of so proceeding, judgment of nolle prosequi may be rendered against the plaintiff, with costs for the defendant. And if any officer appointed under and by virtue of any act to provide internal revenue, or any person acting under or by authority of any such officer shall receive any injury to his person or property, for or on account of any act by him done, under any law of the United States for the collection of taxes, he shall be entitled to maintain suit for damages therefor in the circuit court of the United States, in the district wherein the party doing the injury may reside or shall be found. And all property taken or detained by any officer or other person under authority of any revenue law of the United States shall be irrepleviable, and shall be deemed to be in the custody of the law, and subject only to the orders and decrees of the courts of the United States having jurisdiction thereof: Provided, That an act entitled "An act further to provide for the collection of duties on imports," passed March 2, 1863, shall not be construed to apply to cases arising under this act or any other act to provide internal revenue.

Mr. JENCKES. I move to amend this section by adding the words "and the circuit court of the United States shall have original jurisdiction in all such cases" to the sentence ending "and, on failure of so proceeding, judgment of nolle prosequi may be entered against the plaintiff, with costs for the defendant." It is sometimes a great convenience to have a suit brought in the circuit court of the United States, and not in the State court.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have no objection to the amendment of the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. JENCKES] except this: we make ample provision in another section for giving to the circuit court of the United States jurisdiction in all such cases. This section is for the specific purpose of removing suits from the State courts.

Mr. JENCKES. Will the gentleman refer me to the section giving that jurisdiction? This formality of removal is to be gone through with at the cost of the plaintiff and loss of time to the Government. It would be a saving of expense to the plaintiff and of time to the Government if the suit could be commenced in the circuit court in the first place, as it must eventually go there.

Mr. WELKER. Will the gentleman withdraw his amendment for a few moments, until I can offer one to the first sentence of this section?

Mr. JENCKES. I will do so.

Mr. WELKER. I desire to move to amend the clause of the first sentence, which now reads "to remove such suit or prosecution by petition to the circuit court of the United States in and for the district in which he shall have been served with process," &c., by inserting the words "district or" before the words "circuit court of the United States." It is sometimes more convenient to remove these suits to the district than to the circuit court. I would provide that either of these courts might be applied to for this review.

Mr. JENCKES. I am opposed to that amendment. There is no provision in any law of the United States for the removal of a cause from a State court to the district court; they all go to the circuit court. And that is done for this excellent reason: an appeal lies from the circuit court to the Supreme Court of the United States; and a transfer of a cause from a State court to a United States court should be to the circuit court in order to secure a final judgment more speedily.

Mr. WELKER. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. PETERS. One of the sentences of this section ends in these words, "and on failure of so proceeding judgment of nolle prosequi may be rendered against the plaintiff, with costs for the defendant." Ought not the words "or non-suit" to be inserted after the words "nolle prosequi?"

Mr. JENCKES. That would not be proper, for a judgment of non-suit cannot be entered in a court of the United States in any cause.

Mr. PETERS. Very well, I will not move that amendment. But I wish to move an amendment somewhere in this section, so as to provide that no suit shall be made returnable against any internal revenue officer out of the district in which said officer shall be authorized to act, and I will explain in a few words my reasons for desiring such an amendment.

Mr. MAYNARD. The gentleman had better not offer his amendment to this section. This provides simply for transferring from the State courts to the Federal courts suits brought against revenue officers.

Mr. PETERS. Section seventy-three provides for removing an action to the circuit court in the district in which the party shall have been served with process. Now, if an officer whose district is in the State of Maine happens to be in Boston, he can be much annoyed by having process served upon him there and being compelled to answer there in a suit which ought to be brought against him in Maine.

Mr. MAYNARD. This section simply provides, as the gentleman will observe, that where a suit is brought in a State court against a revenue officer of the United States, that suit shall be transferred to the circuit court of the district in which the suit may be pending.

Mr. PETERS. But my idea is that the suit should be brought in the circuit court of the district within which the official is authorized to act. Under the present law if, for instance, the collector at Bangor, being authorized to act within the district of Maine, happens to be in Boston, jurisdiction may be obtained in a suit against him by serving a process on him there, and he is obliged to make his defense in the circuit court of Massachusetts instead of that of Maine. I know an instance of that kind in which the party has been subjected to great expense by a suit thus brought in a district other than that in which he is authorized to act.

I will modify my amendment and move to amend by striking out in line fourteen the words "in which he shall have been served with process," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "within which he shall have been officially authorized to act;" so that it will read:

It shall be lawful for the defendant in such suit or prosecution, at any time before trial, to remove such suit or prosecution by petition to the circuit court of the United States in and for the district within which he shall have been officially authorized to act, &c.

Mr. PAINE. Mr. Chairman, there might be a very serious objection to an amendment of this kind, though it might work admirably in some cases. Suppose the offense or act for which the prosecution is instituted has been committed or performed in some other district than that in which the officer resides, if there were no constitutional difficulty to prevent his prosecution and trial in another locality than that in which he committed the offense or performed the act still there might be a serious impropriety in such a proceeding. While I for one should be entirely willing that the officer should be tried where he resided, if that happened to be the place where the alleged offense was committed, it seems to me it would be a very improper innovation to require that a man should be tried in some locality where the offense was not charged to have been committed, because he happened to reside there.

Mr. PETERS. I think that objection is not sound.

Mr. PAINE. I yield to the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. JENCKES.]

Mr. JENCKES. Mr. Chairman, under the judiciary act of 1789, which has governed all proceedings of this kind from that day to this, all proceedings removed from a State court must be transferred to the circuit court of the district in which the process is served. That jurisdiction is declared under the provisions of article three, section two, of the Constitution. And as to all criminal proceedings there is an absolute necessity that they should be transferred to the court of the district in which process is found, by virtue of article six of the Amendments to the Constitution, which provides that—

"In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law."

Without altering the provision of the judiciary act of 1789 in regard to civil process, and without violating the Constitution, we cannot adopt such a proposition as that now presented.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was not agreed to.

No further amendment being offered, the Clerk read the next section, as follows:

SEC. 74. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall have power to repay, by requisition on the Treasury, to collectors or deputy collectors the full amount of such sums of money as have been or may be recovered against them or any of them in any court for any taxes collected by them, with the costs and expenses of suit, and all damages and costs recovered against assessors, collectors, deputy collectors, or other internal revenue officers, in any suit brought against them, or any of them, by reason of anything that shall or may be done in the due performance of their official duties.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out that section. The features of this section are remarkable, and intended to operate in behalf of a spirit of favoritism which will rapidly spring up in the execution of this law. The section authorizes the refunding of money which has been improperly taken from the citizen, refunding all the costs which have been incurred, and all the expenses which have been paid, provided, as would seem from the last clause, it resulted in the due performance of his duty as an officer. Where the citizen has recovered his judgment against the public officer the Government is called upon to pay the amount, and still the officer has been in the due performance of his duty. That is a point that does not admit of easy explanation.

Mr. MAYNARD. This goes back to the objection the gentleman was making at the commencement of the session this evening. Whenever a tax-payer is unduly assessed and pays his money he has no remedy except against the collector. This provides that in such cases the Commissioner shall have power to refund to the collector in order to benefit the tax payer who has been improperly assessed and had taxes improperly collected from him. It is the correlative of the feature which the gentleman was commenting upon at the commencement of the session this evening.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not think this remedy against a public officer would be of value. It would be an uncertain remedy. It would be uncertain as to the ability of the party to respond to the judgment rendered. How can it occur that the officer in the due performance of the duties of his office shall become subject to a judgment which requires him to pay back to the citizen the very money he has wrongfully taken out of his possession?

Mr. MAYNARD. How does it occur that the collector of duties on imports has duty paid to him under protest, and is sued and compelled to repay the amount collected? We know very well that an assessor is liable to mistake, and against such mistake we allow relief by permitting him to be sued and the money paid to be recovered.

Mr. JENCKES. I can suggest an amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. Not now. Mr. Chairman, the consideration of this section is the strongest argument in favor of allowing the citizen to apply for and obtain an injunction in the first instance instead of being left to sue the assessor for the money that he has been compelled to pay, and the collector, too, if that officer can be sued at all, for executing a precept which has gone into his hands. The officer is made to refund, not simply the money, but the costs attendant upon this complicated proceeding. I say, as revenue measures, without reference to the rights of the citizen, it is better to confer upon the citizen the right of injunction in the first instance than to incorporate this provision.

Mr. MAYNARD. It is precisely the policy in reference to duties on imports.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does not the gentleman know that from 1862 to 1867 proceedings by injunction were allowable in the courts?

Mr. MAYNARD. I am speaking of the collection of duties on imports.

Mr. JENCKES. I move to insert in the fifth line the words, "after judgment without collusion between the parties to said suit."

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. MILLER. I move that the committee rise.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 18, noes 28; no quorum voting.

Mr. MILLER. I now move that the committee rise.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, let us go on a few minutes longer.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is no quorum, and we ought not to transact business of such importance with so few.

Mr. SCHENCK. If there is a determined purpose to break up the committee, when we might go on fifteen or twenty minutes longer, doing business, and that is avowed, I cannot help it.

Mr. HIGBY. We have been in session long enough to-day. It was five o'clock when we took a recess this afternoon, and now it is after ten. If we run this thing at this rate we shall break down.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have sat here longer than the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will order tellers.

Mr. SCHENCK. It is not necessary. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. POMEROY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 1060) to reduce into one act and to amend the laws relating to internal taxes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. ELIOT. I renew the motion I made this morning, that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the river and harbor bill.

The SPEAKER. That requires unanimous consent or a suspension of the rules.

Mr. MAYNARD. I object; there is no quorum present.

Mr. ELIOT. I move to suspend the rules.

Mr. SCHENCK. I object.

Mr. HOPKINS. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. ELIOT. What effect will an adjournment have on my motion?

The SPEAKER. It will be the first business in order after the close of the morning hour on Monday next.

The motion to adjourn was agreed to; and thereupon (at ten o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, June 9, 1868.

Prayer by Rev. JAMES J. KANE, chaplain United States Navy.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have received and been requested to present to the Senate a memorial, or a statement in the nature of a memorial, addressed to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, signed by Mrs. Eliza Potter, of South Carolina. The petition sets forth the fact that Mr. and Mrs. Potter were persons of large wealth in the city of Charleston, South Carolina, at the commencement of the rebellion; that they were devoted friends of the Union; that during the prosecution of the war they expended very large sums for the support, maintenance, and comfort of the Union prisoners there, especially those who were sick and wounded. Their expenditures for that purpose amounted to nearly forty thousand dollars, expended in the city of Charleston, in the State of South Carolina, and also in the State of North Carolina. This expenditure was made by them without any expectation whatever of ever receiving any reward, because they were at that time very wealthy; but in consequence of the raid which was made by General Potter, and the raids also made by rebel generals, their property was absolutely destroyed. A large mass of cotton which was in their hands was burned, some by the army on one side and some by the army on the other, in consequence of which they have become reduced in circumstances to poverty. This memorial setting forth these facts does not claim that Congress should pay anything for the property which was destroyed, but it is presented to Congress with a view of knowing whether Congress would not be willing to pay them the amount which they may be able to show they actually expended for the benefit of Union prisoners and to aid them in the States of South Carolina and North Carolina.

In connection with this memorial I have other papers, and among the rest a letter addressed to me by the honorable Judge Wording, whom I personally know very well, and for whose integrity I can vouch, stating substantially the same facts. This lady was most distinguished as the friend of the Union prisoners, devoted in attention to them under all circumstances, at the risk even of life and the destruction of her property.

I have also a letter addressed to Chief Justice Chase on the same subject.

I desire, Mr. President, in presenting this memorial, to ask that it may be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, with instructions that that committee inquire how much money was actually paid out and expended by the petitioner for the support and comfort of the Union prisoners during the rebellion, and report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. CONNESS. That is never done. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on referring the memorial to the Committee on Military Affairs with instructions.

Mr. WILSON. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CONNESS. A memorial is never accompanied by a resolution of instructions. A memorial is a request to do certain things upon a presentation of facts, but the facts must be ascertained first by an investigation. I hope these instructions will not be adopted. Let this memorial take the ordinary course and go to our committee, and let them use their judgment in regard to it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. All the instructions are that the committee shall simply inquire into the facts.

Mr. CONNESS. It directs them.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It simply directs them to inquire into the facts as to how much money was actually expended for the benefit of Union prisoners, with no instructions to report in favor of paying that sum, but simply to inquire into that fact.

Mr. CONNESS. I ask for the reading of the instructions.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the memorial of Mrs. Eliza Potter, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, with instructions to inquire how much was actually paid and expended by her for the support of Union prisoners during the rebellion, and to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope that will not be done, but that the memorial will be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. POMEROY. I think this petition should go to the Committee on Claims. I presented a similar petition some time ago and had it referred to that committee. I did not suppose they needed any special instruction. That committee always attend to their business.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have no objection myself to its going to the Committee on Claims; but I supposed, as it was in relation to expenditures for the Union prisoners, it would more naturally go to the Committee on Military Affairs. That is the only reason why I named that committee.

Mr. CONNESS. Why, Mr. President, there is a memorial and evidence now with the Committee on Claims of this body in one case that I am somewhat acquainted with, where a Union man has been ruined in one of the States of the South, and the case has to go through gradually the investigations that are commonly made here. I hope that this will take the ordinary routine. I move its reference to the Committee on Claims.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Let the instructions be read.

The Chief Clerk again read the resolution.

Mr. HOWARD. The shortest way would be, I suppose, to vote directly on that resolution, and if it is defeated to move the reference of the memorial to a committee.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If Senators think there is anything very unusual about this, if there is anything further than simply to inquire into the facts, I do not wish to press this matter to go to the Committee on Military Affairs. I have no preference as to the committee. I have no objection to its taking the ordinary usual course of reference, but I suppose there would be nothing improper in the instructions which are mentioned in this resolution. Honorable gentlemen are not at all acquainted with this particular case, I presume, or I think they would have no objection to its taking the course I have suggested. But I see some opposition manifested, and some desire that it should go to the Committee on Claims. I am perfectly willing to modify the motion and refer it to the Committee on Claims without any instructions whatever; but I desire to submit to that committee certain letters which I have in my hand, in connection with the memorial, and to call their attention specially to the facts. I do not believe in the history of the world there is anything to surpass the devotion of this lady and the sacrifices she made and the expenditures she made for the benefit of the Union prisoners.

Mr. POMEROY. I did not intend to have the Senator from Wisconsin understand that I objected to this particular claim; only that other claims of the same character had gone to the Committee on Claims, and as they were making investigations in other cases I thought they should investigate this.

Mr. HOWE. I do not think there is any sort of necessity that this or any other particular claim should go to the Committee on Claims. In point of fact, the Committee on Claims is incumbered with work which it cannot do, certainly cannot do at this session, and I do not think there is any hope of doing it. My colleague seems to have paid some attention to the facts in this case, and would be of great assistance to the Military Committee, of which he is a member, in the examination of this case, and there is positive economy, it seems to me, in allowing the Military Committee to examine it, because they can have assistance which the Committee on Claims cannot have, so far as I know, from the fact that there is no member of that committee who knows anything about the merits of the case. I think it should go without instructions to the Military Committee, or to any other committee to whom it does go. I hope it will be allowed to go to the Military Committee; there is nothing in the constitution of that committee which forbids it taking jurisdiction of this case, and nothing in the constitution of the Committee on Claims which requires it to take jurisdiction.

Mr. HOWARD. This is simply a claim for compensation or indemnity; it does not differ from any other claim in any essential respect. Why not, then, refer it to the appropriate committee established by the Senate for the investigation of claims against the Government? I think it had better go there.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have no objection.

Mr. HOWARD. Very well. Then I hope that the vote will be taken on the resolution and that it will be defeated, and that then the memorial will be referred to the Committee on Claims, unless the Senator withdraws the resolution.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have modified the motion so as to make it a motion to refer to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HOWARD. Has the Senator modified it so as to strike out the instructions?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Yes, sir; to make it simply a motion of reference to the Committee on Claims, and I hope my honorable friend from Michigan will look into this.

Mr. HOWARD. I will look into it probably as carefully as the Senator from Wisconsin.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The present motion is to refer the memorial to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY. I present the memorial of John Hart and other citizens of Minnesota, cigar-makers, dealers in cigars, and growers of and dealers in seed-leaf tobacco, who respectfully represent that the present rate of internal revenue tax on cigars has proved to be the most equitable and satisfactory rate of taxation ever assessed upon their branch of industry; and they deem the proposed change of rate from five to ten dollars one calculated to work injuriously both to the trade and the revenue. I move the reference of this memorial to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON presented two petitions of journeymen cigar-makers of Pennsylvania, praying that the tax of five dollars per thousand on domestic cigars and the tariff on imported cigars may remain unchanged; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of cigar manufacturers, journeymen cigar-makers, dealers in cigars, and growers of and dealers in seed-leaf tobacco, of Lancaster, Pennsylvania, praying the adoption of the system of collecting the revenue on cigars by making the stamp a revenue stamp instead of an inspector's stamp, sold only to licensed manufacturers; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Pittsburg and Alleghany, Pennsylvania, praying an appropriation for the enlargement of the St. Mary's ship-canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of underwriters of Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, praying the passage of a law making premiums for insurance a lien in admiralty; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, presented the petition of Brown Brothers and others, business men of Chicago, respectfully requesting that Congress commission Mr. S. N. Goodale to introduce among Indians hand looms and such material as will attract their attention and lead the Indians to fabricate their own garments; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented the petition of Henry C. Whitney, praying that the title to the Osage diminished reserve and trust lands be extinguished and the same offered for sale to actual settlers; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. HOWE presented the petition of the heirs-at-law of the late Thomas Lawson, Surgeon General United States Army, praying compensation for the use, by the Government, of certain property in the city of Washington; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. COLE presented resolutions of the Legislature of California in favor of the passage of a law authorizing that State to select lands granted to the State for the benefit of an agricultural college from the even-numbered sections within any railroad reservations; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MORGAN presented a resolution of the Louisville Board of Trade, concurred in by the New York Chamber of Commerce, praying a reduction of the tax on distilled spirits; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. YATES presented a petition of citizens of Illinois and Iowa, praying the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi river between Rock Island, Illinois, and Davenport, Iowa; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SUMNER, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported a bill (S. No. 528) to carry into effect the decree of the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York in the case of the British steamer Labnan; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

He also presented papers relative to the subject-matter of the bill; which were ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. No. 93) granting permission to officers and soldiers to wear the badge of the corps in which they served during the rebellion, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 262) authorizing certain distilled spirits to be turned over to the Surgeon General for the use of the Army hospitals, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 266) to authorize the enlargement of the Hygeia Hotel at Fortress Monroe, Virginia, reported it without amendment.

J. W. TAYLOR'S MINING REPORT.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution for printing the report of James W. Taylor upon gold and silver mines and mining east of the Rocky mountains, to report it back without amendment and recommend its passage. I ask for its present consideration.

No objection being made, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, That the same number of copies of the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury inclosing the report of James W. Taylor upon gold and silver mines and mining east of the Rocky mountains be printed for the use of the Senate as are ordered of the report of J. Ross Browne on the mineral resources of the Pacific States and Territories; and that said reports be bound together.

Mr. COLE. It seems to me that if these reports are printed together they will make a large and cumbersome volume. The report of J. Ross Browne, which has already been ordered to be published, is considerably larger than the volume issued last year which contained both Browne's and Taylor's reports. I think, with all deference to the committee, that they ought to be published separately, being two distinct volumes. I have a great many applications for the report of J. Ross Browne and none for the report as to the mines east of the Rocky mountains. I should perhaps be able, if they were published separately, to exchange some of the reports of Taylor for those of Browne, and so accommodate the public much better. I submit to the chairman of the committee, therefore, that the resolution be so changed that the reports may be bound in separate volumes.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am quite indifferent as to that. The resolution was offered by the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. RAMSEY,] and I mentioned to him at first the objection which the Senator from California states; but upon consulting with the Congressional Printer he informed me that the report of Mr. Taylor was short and that the two together would not make a larger volume than we are accustomed to print; and in accordance with that information I reported this resolution; but I have forgotten the exact number of pages, and if it is more convenient to Senators who are specially interested in these matters, to have the report separate, I shall make no objection.

Mr. COLE. I should like to know something as to the size of the report of Mr. Taylor as compared with that of J. Ross Browne.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is only one hundred pages.

Mr. RAMSEY. There are but five hundred pages in the whole volume containing both reports, and that is not unwieldy.

Mr. COLE. I understood when the matter was under discussion the other day that the report of Taylor was large, equal in size to that of Mr. Browne; but if it contains only one hundred pages I have no objection to their going together in the same volume.

Mr. CONNESS. It is very small.

The resolution was agreed to.

INTERNATIONAL COINAGE.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 217) in relation to the coinage of gold and silver, to report it back with amendments, accompanied by a report which I ask to be printed. The Senator from New York [Mr. MORGAN] desires to submit a written minority report adverse to it. The committee direct me to ask that these reports be printed and that the subject be postponed until the next session of Congress without further action.

Mr. MORGAN. As a member of the Committee on Finance I am not in favor of Senate bill No. 217, nor in favor of any other bill on the subject of coinage at the present time. I have submitted to the Finance Committee a report in writing, which by their direction I now present to the Senate, and I move that it be printed.

The motion to print the majority and minority reports was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Finance, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Ordered, That five thousand copies of the amended bill reported from the Committee on Finance relating to international coinage, together with the reports thereon, and the report of Samuel B. Ruggles, commissioner of the United States to the Paris monetary conference, be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom were referred the message from the President of the United States concerning the International Monetary Conference at Paris in June, 1867, the resolutions of the Toledo Board of Trade, protesting against any change in the system of coinage, and a memorial of the American Statistical Association, in relation to the metrical system of weights, measures, and coins, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 412) to promote uniformity of coinage between the moneys of the United States and other countries, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

THOMAS McLEAN.

Mr. POMEROY. The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1033) for the relief of Thomas McLean, have directed me to report it back, and recommend its passage. It is a private bill of only three or four lines, and I should like to have its present consideration to gratify the Senator from Wisconsin.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires unanimous consent to consider the bill at this time. Is there any objection?

No objection being made, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1033) for the relief of Thomas McLean.

The bill is an authority to Thomas McLean to enter and purchase so much of lot No. 124 as has not been disposed of in the Stockbridge reservation, in the county of Calumet, State of Wisconsin, used and occupied by him, at the price stipulated in the third section of the act of March 3, 1865, providing for the disposal of that reservation, and receive a patent therefor, McLean having cultivated and occupied the land for a long series of years.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 529) establishing rules and articles for the government of the armies of the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FERRY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 530) relating to patents; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. NYE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 142) to refer the claim of George Chorpennen, under a former act of Congress for his relief, to the Court of Claims; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

GEORGE W. DOTY.

Mr. NYE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 143) for the relief of George W. Doty, a commander in the United States Navy on the retired list; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. NYE. I desire to make a statement in relation to this matter, and to ask the Senate to put the resolution on its passage now. A resolution was passed on the 19th day of May, as recommended and reported by the Naval Committee, simply to place in his position on the Register, according to his rank, Commander Doty, of the Navy, from July 16, 1862, to July, 1865. The Naval Committees of both Houses were unanimous in their report on that subject, but we neglected two words in the resolution; and I am requested and authorized by the Committee on Naval Affairs to ask to have them inserted by passing this resolution. It is simply to give him the pay of his rank. The necessary words were omitted. The amount is about nineteen hundred dollars. I hope the Senate will act on the question now.

By unanimous consent, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the name of George W. Doty, commander in the Navy, to be placed upon the Navy Register as a commander from July 16, 1862, with the pay and rank of his commission.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I desire to ask the Senator from Nevada how much pay this resolution covers?

Mr. NYE. Nineteen hundred dollars.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. A year?

Mr. NYE. Oh, no; that is all. He has been on the duty.

The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

CONTRACTORS FOR IRON-CLAD VESSELS.

Mr. CONNESS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 159) relating to the Western Pacific railroad.

Mr. HENDRICKS. There was a bill before the Senate yesterday, in the morning hour, about ready to pass when that hour expired, and I think it ought to be concluded this morning. I hope the Senator from California will allow that bill to be taken up and finished.

Mr. CONNESS. The bill to which I call the attention of the Senate, and which I desire to get a vote upon, was under consideration twice in the Senate before the impeachment trial. I have been waiting for an opportunity to get the attention of the Senate to it, but I should be very willing to let it go over until to-morrow if I thought I could get the attention of the Senate then. I want a vote upon it at an early day.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Inasmuch as the bill to which I have referred is fresh in the mind of the Senate, and will now excite no debate, I think we had better conclude it.

Mr. CONNESS. Very well; I will give way to the honorable Senator.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will assist the Senator to-morrow to take up his bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from California is withdrawn.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Now I move to take up Senate bill No. 307.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 307) for the relief of certain Government contractors.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I propose to offer an amendment which I suppose will remove all objection to the relief suggested. It is to insert at the end of the bill the following:

Which shall be in full discharge of all claims upon the vessels upon which the board made the allowance, as per their report made under the act of March 2, 1867.

Mr. HOWE. I do not know that I have any objection to the amendment, but yet I am not sure that it would relieve the bill of any objections that I have against it. If I can get the attention of the Senator from Indiana, I should like to state what difficulties appear on the face of this bill to my mind.

As I understand this case, there were quite a number of contracts made by the Navy Department for the construction of vessels, and I understand each of those contractors claims to have lost largely on his contract from two causes; one being changes made in the nature of the work contracted for, and the other cause being the appreciation of prices. I understand that the Secretary himself having paid each of the contractors the contract price, then undertook to audit these claims for enhanced cost, and that he has made large payments to each one of the contractors, in many cases amounting to thirty-three per cent. That is the way I understand the statement laid on my table. If I am wrong about it, I hope to be corrected. But to each one of those contractors large payments have been made by the Secretary over and above the contract price at which they were to do the work. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] tells me that the whole increased payment amounts in the aggregate to over five million dollars.

Having been paid the contract price, and having been paid more than five million dollars in addition to the contract price, it seems the contractors were still dissatisfied, and under the act of March 2, 1867, the Secretary of the Navy was authorized to investigate once more these claims, all of which he had investigated without any authority. Instead of doing that himself, he appointed a board of officers to do it, which I suppose he might properly do. He has accepted their report. That board has reported, if I understand it, that this increased cost was occasioned by changes in the nature of the work ordered by the Navy Department only in the cases of the contracts mentioned in the bill. All the other contractors whose cases are not provided for in the bill and who claimed damages, or who claimed to have lost upon their contracts, I understand this board to say, lost simply because of the appreciation in prices, and not because of any delay occasioned by the Department, or any change in the nature of the work to be done.

Now, the bill before the Senate provides for paying the sums which this board report were due to the contractors mentioned in the bill because of changes and delays occasioned by the Department itself. As I understand this case, those sums which they report as the whole sums to which these contractors would be entitled by reason of delays and changes, amount to very much less; amount, in fact, to but a small portion of the sum which the Secretary himself has already paid over and above the contract price.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the Senator will allow me, I will explain that, I think, in about ten words.

Mr. HOWE. Well, that is a less time than I could explain it in.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Department made contracts for vessels of particular descriptions and sizes. After that they increased both the size of the vessels and of the engines in many instances. Where there was an increase of size, for that additional work the Department paid what that additional work cost, but made no allowance to the parties because of the delay thereby caused in the construction of the vessels and the enhanced price of labor and material occasioned thereby. They paid just in proportion to the contract price for the additional work. If there were one hundred tons more of iron required in the vessel, then that was paid for in the proportion of that work to the agreed price; but this additional work caused delays of months, and in the mean time materials and labor went up in some instances one hundred per cent. That has never been paid for, and this bill proposes to give a compensation according to the finding of the board for losses occasioned by the act of the Government and not already paid for.

Mr. HOWE. Now, Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana may be and probably is entirely right in his statement; but his statement does not seem to me to be borne out by the report. Take, for instance, the first claim mentioned in this schedule, which is the claim of Secor & Company. The contract price of the work done by them is stated in this report at $1,800,000. In the next column they report "the amount of such increased cost caused by the delay and action of the Government, as determined by the board to be due." The amount of increased cost, caused by the delay and action of the Government, they report at $115,000. In the next column they report the amount which has already been paid to Secor & Co., by the Secretary, over and above the contract price, and that sum is $521,000. If this board mean what they say, they say that all the increased cost occasioned to Secor & Co. on their contracts by the action of the Government, was $115,000; but that they have got $521,000. That is the way the report stands, and yet here is a bill which provides for the paying of $115,000 again.

That is not all there is of it; but this bill is accompanied by another which is not now before the Senate, but which is on our desks, a sort of tender to this, which provides for referring all these claims, Secor & Co.'s and all the rest, to the Court of Claims, to determine how much more upon all accounts shall be paid to each one of them. So that if this bill passes and the accompanying bill passes, then these contractors will have received, first the contract price, second the additional payments made by the Secretary of the Navy, amounting to about thirty-three and one third per cent., or amounting in the aggregate to over five million dollars as the Senator from New Jersey figures it. Third, the sums reported by this board as due to a portion of the contractors; and fourth, whatever they can wrench from the judgment of the Court of Claims. If they get judgments in the Court of Claims, of course they will be judgments in spite of all these precedent payments, after they have had three settlements.

Mr. ANTHONY. The amendment cuts them off.

Mr. HOWE. I do not understand that it does cut them off. After they have had three settlements, and three payments some of them, and all of them two at least by the Navy Department. They are to be allowed, if the second bill passes, to go into the Court of Claims to struggle for another judgment against the Government.

Mr. President, I have no facts before me which will authorize me to say that these specific sums are not due; therefore, I am not very well prepared to controvert the propriety of passing this bill; but I am embarrassed in voting for it by the consideration that we are threatened by this other bill, and in that point of view it seems to me much the safer thing for this bill to be laid on the table until the Senate determine what it is proper to do with the other bill; because if they pass that bill and send these contractors to the Court of Claims at all, I think they should be sent there for their whole claim, including the award with the additional claim they make. And while I am threatened with that other bill, which I understand is under the conduct of the Senator from Missouri, I cannot see how I can safely vote for the passage of this bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, having had some knowledge of these claims at a prior session, and having supported the bill which received almost the unanimous vote of the Senate, giving to these various parties more than a million dollars, I am somewhat surprised to find that there is any opposition to what is now proposed to be given them, some $225,000. I became satisfied on an examination of the case before that the parties had suffered very greatly by these contracts; that they were brought in consequence of the faithful manner in which the work was done and the alterations which from time to time were suggested by the Government, particularly in the increased size and power of the vessels, almost to a state of bankruptcy; and I was not so much disposed to criticize the mere legal obligation which the contractors supposed the United States were under to them, as I was to save these patriotic men from ruin in consequence of their having been the honest, faithful contractors of the Government at a time when the Government stood greatly in need, and when their work tended very considerably to bring our late civil war to a successful result. I was willing to vote to give them that $1,000,000. Now, it is proposed to give them only $225,000. If I understand the honorable member from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOWE,] he prefers the sending of these claimants, as well as other claimants who do not stand exactly upon the same ground, to the Court of Claims. That would be ruin to the contractors. The calendar of the Court of Claims now embraces, I believe, some thousand cases, and in all probability before these people could obtain justice at the hands of the Court of Claims they would be in a state of actual bankruptcy.

I submit to the Senate that under these circumstances, even if there was no legal demand, generosity, magnanimity—I was about to say a patriotic generosity and magnanimity, invokes us, as I think, to pay them this amount—which will save them from actual ruin. The amendment suggested by the honorable member from Oregon [Mr. CORBETT] seems to me to be defective in one particular, and having called the attention of my friend to that I shall close. He proposes to amend the bill by providing that upon the payment of the sum which the bill provides the claim of the contractors upon the vessels shall no longer exist. I suggest to the honorable member to modify it so as to make it a condition of the payment that they shall relinquish all claim against the United States. They have no claim upon the vessels. The vessels are in the hands of the United States, and now I believe constitute a part of their marine, though perhaps some may have been sold. The claim that they have for the building of the vessels is a claim against the Government, and that would be the only claim that could be prosecuted before the Court of Claims if they should be sent there. The honorable member I am sure will see the propriety of changing his amendment so as to relinquish the claim against the United States on account of the vessels.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Wisconsin is in error in the view that he takes of the pending bill. I think his views in reference to the contemplated bill to be presented by the Senator from Missouri are very correct. This subject was, by an act of the 2d of March, 1867, referred to the Secretary of the Navy, he being authorized to have a commission. Without reading the whole act, that commission were to ascertain the additional cost from changes in the plans and from delays occasioned by the Government in the work, the advance in the prices of labor and materials which occurred during the prolonged time, and which prudence could not have avoided, and they were also directed to ascertain that amount:

"And from such additional cost, to be ascertained as aforesaid, there shall be deducted such sum as may have been paid each contractor for any reason heretofore over and above the contract price, and shall report to Congress a tabular statement of each case, which shall contain the name of the contractor, a description of the work, the contract price, the whole increased cost of the work over the contract price, and the amount of such increased cost caused by the delay and action of the Government as aforesaid, and the amount already paid the contractor over and above the contract price."

This tabular statement contains first the contract price; second, the whole increase claimed by the contractors; then the amount heretofore paid by the Government over the contract price, because that payment had been made on the 2d of March, 1867, and this tabular statement was not made until after that, of course; and then it contains the amount of such increased cost "caused by the delay and action of the Government, as determined by the board to be due," over and above what had been paid by the Government, still due. That is the way I understand it, and in that view this bill ought to pass. But it seems to me the proposition to open this whole subject and refer it to the Court of Claims is one which ought not to be entertained at all. This subject has been investigated. The Government have already paid $5,000,000 more than the contract price. This bill provides for the payment of all that these commissioners report; and now it is proposed to refer it to the Court of Claims, when all these builders, with their clerks and agents as witnesses, go before that court, and where does the Government stand? Where are the Government's witnesses? How could the Government be prepared to meet that array? The commission were not tied down by rules of evidence and the marshaling of witnesses in a court, but the commission went and looked at the work, judged for themselves, heard statements of parties, and came to what was considered a fair and equitable conclusion in reference to the subject.

Mr. DRAKE. I will state for the information of the Senator from New Jersey, that I think he is mistaken in saying that they looked at the work.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it is the duty of the Chair to call the attention of the Senate to the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. DRAKE. I hope that this subject, now that we have it in hand, may be allowed to be finished.

Mr. CONNESS. It will only take a little while.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think ten minutes will dispose of it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Oh, no.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is it the pleasure of the Senate to pass by informally the unfinished business of yesterday?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope not. We have been on the other subject; it is a very important one, and we had better finish it first. This is evidently a controverted matter.

Mr. ANTHONY. I believe the Senator from Vermont has an amendment which will cover the whole case, as he thinks the amendment of the Senator from Indiana does not, and I am sure both Senators desire the same result. I think we can soon dispose of this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The special order can only be passed over by motion, objection having been made to doing so informally.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I make that motion; we may as well finish this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the unfinished business and all prior orders be postponed for the purpose of continuing the consideration of Senate bill No. 807.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am informed by Senators around me that this will take a long time. Now, I appeal to the Senate if, after having had a bill for the recognition of the State governments of five or six States on hand here for several days, we are to lay aside a great public matter of that kind for the purpose of investigating these claims. We can take this bill up to-morrow, or if we get through with the other bill in time, to-day after it is disposed of. I have no opposition to this measure, but it seems to me it ought not to push aside the regular order of the day.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator has asked me to stand by him here for late sessions to pass the bill which he asks the Senate now to take up, and I have agreed to do it. I have stood by him, and I am willing to stay here till night-time, although I am not in favor of his bill and do not expect to vote for it. At his request I said I would stay here. Now, once or twice, because the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, who reported this bill, is sick and not here, I have felt it my duty to call it up, and it is fatiguing to have to call the same thing up and go over precisely the same argument every day. I have done my duty.

Mr. CONNESS. I think fifteen minutes of time will suffice to finish this bill.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If it is not the pleasure of the Senate to give these people some little relief, the trifling relief this bill gives, I feel that I have done my duty, and it can go. I hope, however, the motion will prevail, and that we shall finish this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on postponing the order of the day.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think there had better be no vote taken on postponement. I have no doubt the Senator from Illinois will give us a few minutes, and then if the bill cannot be passed we shall not desire to take up further time.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will withdraw any objection to allowing fifteen minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By unanimous consent, the present bill may be continued before the Senate.

Mr. CAMERON. I object. I am against allowing these large claims to go through in this way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to postpone the order of the day.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will say for twenty minutes.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator will say for fifteen minutes, I will make no objection.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Say twenty minutes.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will agree to twenty minutes.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore put the question on postponing the order of the day; and a division being called for, twenty-two Senators voted in favor of the motion.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the Senator from Indiana varied his motion, and it ought to be understood by the Senate. It is a postponement for twenty minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair knows nothing about minutes. There is no such rule in the books. The motion to postpone is agreed to. Senate bill No. 307 is before the body, and the Senator from New Jersey is entitled to the floor.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I will not occupy the time of the Senate. There is this consideration which induced me to vote that this bill might go over: if there is any correctness, or if there is any doubt but that the Senator from Wisconsin may be correct, this matter ought to have further consideration. I understand that the $200,000 included in this bill is over and above the $500,000 which the Government has already paid more than the contract. The understanding of the Senator from Wisconsin is that while the Government has paid $500,000 more than the contract, it really ought to have paid but $200,000 more than the contract. If there is any question on that subject, I think this matter had better go over until to-morrow, until information can be got at the Department.

Mr. DRAKE. Mr. President, I do not think the facts which belong to these cases have been fully stated here at all. If they had been, I verily believe the Senate would be the next thing to unanimous in this matter. The wonder to me is that the parties interested in this bill would take from the Government the sum provided here in full of their just claims.

I opposed the consideration of this bill yesterday in order that I might reexamine the matter on the basis of the documents I had in my possession. I spent the whole of last evening making that reexamination, and I say, without a moment's hesitation, that if ever there came before Congress a just claim for relief, it is in favor of these contractors for the construction of these national vessels. If the Senate will give me its attention for a very few moments, I can state the case to them, I think, in such a way as will show them that the manner in which I characterize this claim is correct.

I will take the single instance, among nine vessels of the same class precisely that were ordered to be constructed, of the Tippecanoe, the contract for which was taken by Miles Greenwood, of Cincinnati, known to many Senators on this floor personally and by reputation as a first-rate man in every respect. That contract was given to him on the 1st of September, 1862, and his obligation was to complete the vessel in six months. Mark that fact: the obligation was to complete the vessel in six months. The contract called for the delivery to him at the time of the signing of it, of the drawings and specifications for the construction of that vessel, but when were they furnished? The very first one that was furnished was on the 28th of that month, and they were strung along from that time for two years and a half before Miles Greenwood got the drawings and specifications of that ship entire; so that two years after the time that he contracted to have built the vessel, and would have had it built if they had given him their drawings and specifications, he got the last of the drawings and specifications. Two years after the time that he had agreed to finish it, he was delayed by the action of the Navy Department before he could put the last strokes upon that vessel, and she was consequently not finished until December, 1865.

At the time that contract was entered into gold was 118, and it went on increasing. Let me give you some of the quotations. In September, 1862, gold was 118; in January, 1863, 136; in April, 1863, 146; in July, 182; in December, 148; in January, 1864, 152; April, 1864, 175; July, 282; December, 204; January, 1865, 226; April, 1865, 144; July, 140; and December, 145.

During all that period Miles Greenwood was kept by the Navy Department from fulfilling his contract by their delay in giving him specifications of his work, by their changes, by their alterations of that work. And now, sir, what is the consequence? I ask the Senate's attention to the figures for one moment as shown in the case of that very vessel. The whole increased cost of the vessel was $349,455 23 occasioned by these delays. And what did the Navy Department pay of that amount? $173,327 84, leaving unprovided for of that increased cost $176,127 39.

There is the history of one of our nine vessels of exactly the same class, built under like contracts, upon the same specifications, delayed for the same length of time; and these parties are a portion of those that suffered by the action of the Navy Department, nine of them, and this board organized by the Navy Department reports a pittance of $38,513 each to five of them, and not a cent to the other four. Now, they come to Congress and ask for relief; and I say, sir, that it is a shame and an outrage upon all honor and all correctness of official action, in my opinion, for Congress to turn them away from its doors when not a moment's delay did they ever make, but were ready to press on with their work, and did press on with it honestly and faithfully, and every day for two years and a half from the time the contract was made were they delayed by the failure to furnish them the specifications.

The balance due to these men in this bill, according to the increased expense of their work, is $714,905 64, after allowing them for the half million that the Navy Department paid them; and you propose now to cut them off with a little over one hundred and fifteen thousand dollars, and even to begrudge them that, and so, too, with the remaining two of the vessels for which allowances are made by this bill; and then you propose to cut off all the rest and not even allow them the poor privilege of going into the Court of Claims to have their claims for additional compensation sifted, investigated, and determined by an impartial tribunal. Sir, this commission that the Navy Department organized went into an ex parte examination of this matter. We want to transfer it to a court where both parties can be heard.

Again, sir, I repeat my conviction that there never was a more righteous claim before Congress than this very claim; and I hope the Senate will pass it in some shape or other.

Mr. CORBETT. It is admitted, I believe, on all sides that this amount is due to these parties according to the report, and I think the amendment as proposed and as drawn by the Senator from Indiana covers the case. I hope we shall take a vote on that without any further debate. It seems to me that by that course we shall give these men the money that is due them without any doubt, and they may be relieved to some extent at least.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. CORBETT. I call for the reading of the amendment as it has been modified by the Senator.

The amendment, as modified, was read, as follows:

Insert at the end of the bill these words: Which shall be in full discharge of all claims against the United States on account of vessels upon which the board made the allowance, as per their report made under the act of March 2, 1867.

Mr. HOWE. I move to amend that amendment by substituting for it the following:

Which payments respectively shall be in full discharge of all claims of the persons to whom such payments shall be made, which have been presented under said act, and of all claims arising out of the matters in connection with which the services and damages so claimed for arose.

Mr. ANTHONY. Does that cut them off from applying in the same way as all the other contractors are allowed to apply, to the Court of Claims, for other vessels than those adjudicated upon?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; only those adjudicated upon.

Mr. ANTHONY. But the other contractors are allowed to apply to the Court of Claims in regard to those vessels where the board reported adversely.

Mr. HOWE. I call for the yeas and nays on the amendment to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The amendment to the amendment proposes to establish the proposition that the award of this board that is now claimed shall stand as a whole altogether, and that where the board has decided against a claimant the claimant shall be satisfied with that, as well as taking the money that they have decided in his favor. Here, for instance, is Mr. A, who puts in a claim before this board, under the act of Congress, for damages, and resumed in respect to two vessels. The board investigates the claim as to both these vessels. The board is of opinion, and so reports to the Secretary of the Navy, that as to one of the vessels the claim is not meritorious, is not well-founded; and as to the other, it reports that the claim is well-founded and proposes the proper compensation. Now, the amendment of the Senator from Indiana only declares that the judgment of this board shall be a bar to any future claim as it respects the particular vessel upon which an allowance is made, whereas the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin asserts the proposition that if the claimant wishes to take the benefit of this judgment as it respects a vessel as to which he got an allowance, he ought also, in justice, to take it as it respects the vessel upon which they decided against him. If there is any value in these investigations at all; if we are to act upon them at all; if claims are made under them, then most certainly, like the judgments of any other tribunal, they ought to stand as an entirety, and a party that is beaten before the board as to one vessel should not be permitted to come in and take his money for another that he is allowed for, and then be permitted to go to some other court and try the question over again in respect to which he was beaten. It seems to me it upsets all our notions of the method of administering justice to permit claimants to take the benefit of the judgment of a court so far as it is in their favor, and to permit them to go on and try the question over again by a new trial so far as the judgment happens to be against them. Therefore I am in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. HENDRICKS. This board has allowed to five contractors upon certain vessels small sums amounting to about two hundred thousand dollars. Other contractors have not been allowed by the board anything. Now, I am not willing for the benefit of the contractors who have been allowed some money, to say that Congress shall never provide for an inquiry into the claims of these other parties, or into the claims of the same parties in respect to vessels not allowed upon in this award. There is no occasion for it; there is no necessity for Congress saying in advance, "We will not hear these parties who are dissatisfied with the award." If Congress chooses to examine that award and comes to the conclusion that some men's claims have been disallowed which ought to be allowed, why not say that they shall have relief? I know that that will be the judgment of Congress when it comes to be considered. I know that cases will be presented to Congress that will be heard. I am satisfied, after the investigation of the Committee on Naval Affairs, that this allowance is not what it ought to have been. I believe the Department has been against these people, and that they have had no relief such as they ought to have had. I am in favor of giving them some relief, and yet in respect to the vessels where an allowance has been made I am willing to say that no further allowance shall ever be made; that the receipt of the money upon those vessels shall be conclusive upon the parties.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How do you distinguish in principle between the one case and the other?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I distinguish because upon some vessels an allowance has been made and upon some vessels no allowance has been made, and if Congress concludes to relieve in regard to those other vessels, there is no occasion for saying we will not give relief.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why would not the same principle apply to the vessels in respect to which the claimants think the board have not allowed enough? Suppose the claimant claims $200,000 and the board have only allowed him $100,000, upon the principle of my friend from Indiana, why is it just to adopt his amendment saying that although the man has got only one half what he is entitled to he shall never be permitted to apply for any more?

Mr. HENDRICKS. If this bill passes, the parties who have not been allowed anything cannot get anything unless Congress chooses to give it. It will depend upon future affirmative legislation for their relief. When the Committee on Naval Affairs, having investigated, say to Congress that there ought to be further relief, why should Congress, in the face of such a report, say in advance, "We will tie our hands up and give no further relief?" Is no respect to be paid to the report of a committee? Is it to be presumed that the committee have made a defective investigation altogether, and that when the committee say we ought not to be tied up in the future in regard to the other vessels, we should, notwithstanding ing that, tie our hands? They can get nothing unless we affirmatively legislate in the future for their relief, and if the Senator is right in his position, that the award is conclusive against them, that will be an argument when some further legislation is asked.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The answer that I have to make to the Senator from Indiana on the subject of the Committee on Naval Affairs is simply this: the law passed by both Houses and approved, I presume, by the President, though he does not approve many laws—I believe he approved that—provided a tribunal, provided, as I understood when the law passed, such a tribunal as these claimants desired to have, to investigate all the claims that came within the scope of the enactment that created the tribunal, and to report upon those claims, to hear, try, and determine them. I understand that that tribunal was erected, that it heard the claimants, their allegations, and their proof, as other tribunals hear contested claims; it heard evidence in opposition, heard arguments of counsel, I suppose. Then it came to its judgment and pronounced in favor of the claimants as to some items, pronounced against the claimants as to other items, and diminished still other items to a smaller sum than that which the claimants demanded. Now it is asked by affirmative legislation to approve that judgment of this board so far as it is in favor of the claimants, and to leave it practically disapproved so far as it happens to be against them. I undertake to say to my friend from Indiana, who is a great deal better lawyer than I am, that that is altogether a new principle in the administration of justice. It does not occur between man and man, and much less ought it to occur between a Government and claimants, either upon its justice or its bounty, because we all know by experience that governments have the worst luck of anybody in defending against claims.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Will the Senator from Vermont allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If this board has allowed to Secor & Co. the losses which they sustained and disallowed to Miles Greenwood, and the committee believe that Miles Greenwood ought to have had an allowance under that law and that the award of the board is not just to Miles Greenwood—and that is the judgment of the committee, as I believe—then why, if Secor & Co. accept of the award in their favor, shall we by law say that Miles Greenwood shall never be heard? It is not just.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The amendment does not propose any such proposition as that at all.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes, it does.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The amendment proposes that as to the persons in whose favor claims have been allowed, who have gone before the board and have presented different claims and have had some of their items allowed and others disallowed, as to the persons who are the beneficiaries in this bill, they shall adopt it as a totality; that they shall not set up in their favor one half of the judgment of this board and still leave open to further contest all that part of it which happened to be against them. It does not touch the case of Miles Greenwood, if there is such a man—I, of course, know nothing about him—as my friend from Indiana seems to suppose. It is only the persons to whom we are by this bill making these appropriations that the amendment applies, because it says the persons who have claims allowed to them and have presented other claims which in the same course of adjudication have been disallowed, shall stand by the judgment. I do not by any means undertake to argue that it would not be just that every person who has gone before that board should be bound by it, but inasmuch as it happens that persons to whom nothing was allowed are not in this bill, there is no convenient way of providing that they shall be bound.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Will the Senator allow me to ask him one further question?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I understood him to take the ground that the award ought to stand entire if any allowance be made upon it. I understand that now he modifies his argument.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, I do not modify it at all.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Suppose the Secors are allowed upon one vessel and not allowed upon another, and they ought to have something upon that other, why, in confirming the award of the board upon certain vessels, shall we say that in the future we will never legislate for their relief in regard to the others?

Mr. EDMUNDS. We should say it upon exactly this principle, that there must be an end to litigation. You must reach a tribunal at last, somewhere, where you are to say there has been investigation enough. These claims have been before Congress year after year in one form or another, and finally Congress acted and its action took the form of taking the subject away from the committees of Congress, who were supposed either to be too harsh or too kind, and putting it into the hands of an impartial, intelligent, and skillful tribunal, against the purity of whose conduct in these respects no man has yet raised his voice. Now, I say as a principle that ought to govern our action as it governs the action of all men in society where justice is administered, (and this is nothing but administering justice according to a rule.) I say as a principle that is fundamental and one without which society cannot go on, that when a man has had his case fairly tried and is beaten, he ought to stay beaten. It may be, to be sure, that he might get a second jury who would find in his favor for some cause or other; but then the other party would say, "Open it for me; let us have a third jury, who may reverse the verdict of the second and find as the first did." Would my friend from Indiana get up and say, if his committee should report in favor of additional compensation to these parties, that there might justly be a bill introduced into the next Congress to reverse all that and try it over again? No; he would say, as he does in Indiana, where he practices law, that there must be an end to these contests, and that when you have once established a tribunal and submitted your case to its fair determination, you must abide by the result, upon the principle that it is as likely that that tribunal decided rightly as it is that any future one would decide rightly.

The principle of the amendment that my friend from Indiana offers is the very principle of the amendment that the Senator from Wisconsin offers. His principle is, that if as to one vessel this board has only allowed one half of what the claimants demanded, and one half of what they might satisfy him they had a right to demand, they shall, nevertheless, be bound. Why is that? Is it not just as great a loss to them as if it had happened to be a disallowance on some other vessel? Of course it is. It is upon a principle that my friend perfectly well understands, and is willing to act upon, that you must take the judgment of this impartial board over the whole of the subjects on which they were called to pass. Now, he wishes to split that principle right in two, up the middle, and make a kind of compromise with it, by declaring that as to the specific vessel in respect to which an allowance is made the party shall be bound; but as to another vessel that stood right by the side of that, the very next item in the claim, as to which the board decided that there was nothing due, that shall all be open again. My friend cannot distinguish in principle between the two amendments. The one that the Senator from Wisconsin offers only carries out the principle of the amendment of the Senator from Indiana to its full and fair extent.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I have heard something before this of the claim of Miles Greenwood. I know him—

Mr. TRUMBULL. I rise to a question of order. The twenty minutes, which it was the understanding of the Senate were to be devoted to this bill, have expired, and it is manifest it will take all day. I submit that we should go on with the order of the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator state his question of order?

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is that the time has expired for which the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] asked to have the regular order laid aside to consider this bill. The understanding of the Senate was that unless we got through with this bill in twenty minutes we would go on with the other measure.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair cannot take cognizance of any particular time. The Chair did not understand whether there was any time fixed or not. The Senate preferred to take up this bill over the other; and when they get ready they can take up the other in preference to this.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I thought that was the motion of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly it was, that the regular order should be postponed for twenty minutes.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I voted for it with that understanding.

Mr. FESSENDEN, (to Mr. TRUMBULL.) Move to postpone this bill and take up the other.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have not the floor unless the Senator from Indiana [Mr. Morton] gives it to me. If he does I will make that motion.

Mr. MORTON. I will in one minute. I want to say something in regard to the Miles Greenwood claim, of which I have heard before this. He is one of the most enterprising, high-minded, and honorable men in the West; a man who I believe would not prefer an unjust claim. I have understood for several years that he had been greatly wronged in this business. Now, sir, this tribunal to which these claims were submitted, as I understand, was created by Congress; was it not?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Organized by the Navy Department.

Mr. MORTON. Organized by the Navy Department. It strikes me as rather monstrous to say that from that tribunal there is no appeal to the Congress that created it; that it is to be the one tribunal, and that there shall be no resort to any other. That is contrary to the practice of the law with which my friend from Vermont is so familiar. But, Mr. President, I have reason to believe that in regard to matters of this kind, matters of contract, especially in the building of vessels and of other things in time of war, requiring great expense, built in an emergency where there were changes made, the Government has acted hardly with its contractors. The Government is often swindled, but the Government has not a right in turn to swindle other people. It is just as much bound to pay an honest debt as anybody else; and if contractors have gone on in good faith, changing the work from time to time to suit the views of the Government, suffering great delay, as was shown in the Miles Greenwood case by the failure to furnish the specifications for two years, the Government is bound in the practice of common honesty to see that these men are made whole. I know it is a common practice when claims are brought by individuals against the Government to compromise them; give them half. The Government seem to think it is doing well if it gives them half they are entitled to. Men take a small pittance and go away ruined. Now, sir, in the case of the building of these vessels let the Government do justice to these men. In the case of Miles Greenwood, I believe he has suffered great injustice, and that he is entitled to large compensation, and he ought to have it to the last dollar. As the Government would have justice done to it by its employés, by its contractors, and by its officers, so let it do justice to others upon the same principle. I have reason to believe that justice has not been done.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move to lay aside this bill and proceed to the order of the day.

Mr. CONNESS. Upon that motion, which I hope will carry, I wish to say that if Mr.

Miles Greenwood shall not have justice done him in this world, when he shall depart hence there may be written truthfully upon his slab, "This man died without justice having been done him by reason of the existence of lawyers, or law as a profession." [Laughter.]

Mr. MORTON. I know of no reason for making a fling at Miles Greenwood on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. CONNESS. The Senator does not understand me as doing it.

Mr. MORTON. He is a high-minded, honorable man.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It was at me.

Mr. MORTON. I understood the Senator from California as making a fling at Miles Greenwood.

Mr. CONNESS. Not at all.

Mr. MORTON. If the Senator disclaims that, I have nothing to say.

Mr. CONNESS. It was furthest from my mind; but propositions are stated and restated which we understand and could vote upon if allowed to do so. That was the object of my remarks.

Mr. MORTON. It is all right, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on postponing the bill under consideration until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 251) authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish supplies to an exploring expedition.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 1194) to provide for the inauguration of State officers in Arkansas, North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, and Alabama, and for the meeting of the Legislatures of said States;

A bill (H. R. No. 631) amendatory of an act approved July 26, 1866, entitled "An act to authorize the construction of certain bridges and establish them as post roads;" and

A bill (H. R. No. 1205) to further amend the postal laws.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 1033) for the relief of Thomas McLean; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 251) authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish supplies to an exploring expedition.

REPRESENTATION OF SOUTHERN STATES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business of yesterday, being the bill (H. R. No. 1058) to admit the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, and Alabama to representation in Congress, is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, the pending question being on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Wilson] to the amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary, to insert the word "Alabama" after "Georgia" in the fourth line of the first section of the committee's amendment; and upon that question the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. WILEY] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WILEY addressed the Senate. [His speech will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, while it is not my intention to enter into a general discussion of the merits of this bill, some remarks have fallen from the honorable Senator from West Virginia that seem to require notice. I shall not attempt to discuss the principles of the bill, because heretofore in discussing the reconstruction measures of Congress, so called, I have had occasion to present my views in reference to the whole subject. My great objection to the measure and all kindred measures is the total want of authority in the Congress of the United States to intervene in the premises; that there is no power conferred on Congress by the Constitution to reconstruct any State, to intervene in any manner in reference to the governments of these States; but that the whole matter in reference to the governments of these States is exclusively with the people of the respective States themselves. But, sir, the matter to which I wish to allude is the view presented of the question of suffrage by the Senator from West Virginia. He claims that the measure before the Senate is just, right, proper, among other reasons, because it confers the right of suffrage upon the negroes of the South. He plants himself broadly and squarely before the Senate and before the country upon the ground of universal enfranchisement of the black race in these States of the South.

Mr. President, consistency is a jewel. The honorable Senator is but following his standard bearers, Ulysses and Colfax. He is but echoing the sentiments enunciated at Chicago. He takes up the watchword of that convention, and he gives it the weight of his name and influence before the country—"negro suffrage in the South!" Without attempting to censure the course of my honorable friend, allow me to inquire if it would not be a little better for him to go home to West Virginia, and there before the people of his own State advocate negro suffrage in that State, than to stand up before the American Senate and advocate negro suffrage elsewhere? Why does not the honorable Senator, and why do not those who act with him politically in this Chamber, go before their own people and advocate universal, unqualified negro suffrage in their own States before they come here and attempt to impose it upon the people of other States?

My honorable friend, no doubt, is perfectly honest in his desire to see the ballot in the hands of every negro; but there comes thunder tones from Michigan, from Ohio, and from other great States of this country telling him that a political party which risks its fortunes upon such an issue before the American people will have to go down to the dust; and hence his gratitude and his philanthropy, and the gratitude and philanthropy of his party, are circumscribed to the area of the ten seceded States. Negro suffrage is good enough for the South; negro suffrage is all right there where the races are nearly equal and in some States in which the negro race predominates; but when you come to West Virginia, which was erected into a State by the active coöperation and approval and by the earnest efforts of my friend and others associated with him, his voice is not heard in the constitutional convention of West Virginia, or in the conventions of his party, asking that justice shall be done to this oppressed race in West Virginia. No, sir, justice has taken her flight from the mountain tops of West Virginia, and now she is hovering over the sunny plains of the South, and there she is to erect her altar and there she is to minister.

But, Mr. President, my friend is only acting in perfect unison with his party which recently assembled at Chicago. What did that convention say? What the honorable Senator says by his action and by his speeches in this body. On the floor of this Chamber, in the other House, through the leading public presses of the Republican party throughout the country, before the disastrous defeats of that party in Michigan, Ohio, and other States, we heard the cry of universal negro suffrage. That convention met subsequently to those disastrous defeats, and they changed their tone of voice. Their sense of justice is not so great, their regard for the poor, oppressed African is not quite so great, their love for him not quite so warm as it was before those elections; and hence when they met, wise men, great men, from every section of the country, to lay down a platform for their political party, which they propose shall march on to victory in November, they adopt this resolution on the subject of suffrage:

"The guarantee of Congress of equal suffrage to all loyal men at the South was demanded by every consideration of public safety, of gratitude, and of justice, and must be maintained, while the question of suffrage in all the loyal States properly belongs to the people of those States."

In all the loyal States the question of suffrage properly belongs to the people of those States, but in the southern States justice and gratitude demand that it shall be conferred on the negro. Now, I wish to ask the honorable Senator, and those with whom he politically associates, how do you circumscribe justice by geographical lines, how do you circumscribe gratitude by geographical lines? Is it just that negroes should vote in the South? If so, what is the basis of that justice? It must be upon the ground that they have the abstract, the inherent, or the political right of some sort to vote, and that the withholding of that right of voting is an act of injustice. It has not hitherto been conferred upon them by law, and therefore it cannot be an act of legal injustice. It must, then, be abstractly unjust, and that innate principle of justice which is implanted in the human soul and that should prompt human action demands that the negro alike with the white man should have this privilege of suffrage; and hence it is that the honorable Senator takes a negro on his left and a white man on his right and compares them, and he asks why it is that the negro should be deprived of the right of voting while the white man has it. It is because this right of suffrage is a political right. It inherently belongs to no man; it is not a natural right; it is a right conferred by society, and society has a perfect right to confer it or withhold it, as, according to the judgment of society, the judgment of those who govern in civil society, may be deemed expedient and proper for the public good.

But gratitude demands, says this platform, that the right of suffrage shall be conferred upon the negro; and we have listened to the very eloquent language of the honorable Senator as to the sources of this gratitude, the reasons which impose it upon us, why it is that it should so overburden the souls and the hearts of the American people that they should grant the right of suffrage to the negroes. He tells you, sir, that they went forth following your standard in the late rebellion, as he terms it; that they fought your battles; and none but the God of heaven knows if it had not been for the patriotic exertions of the negro race what would have been the result of that conflict. Humiliating confession! Twenty million people against eight million unable to win the battles of the late war until the prowess and the valor and the wisdom and the indomitable courage of this African race were invoked! When they stepped in there was no doubt then! When their superior genius, intellect, and valor were invoked they came shouting "the battle cry of freedom," and they "rallied around your flag," and the sable sons of Ham preserved the glorious stars and stripes from being tarnished by treason and falling into the hands of traitors! God in his providence sent to this great American people of twenty million free whites in the non-seceding States black saviours! When all was doubt and uncertainty, when your hearts were faint within you, when your souls began to grow sick, when confidence had fled from your minds in the white man, in the valor of the white man, and in the courage of the white man, angels in black came to your assistance and delivered you; and gratitude to this oppressed race now demands of you and your party to confer upon them this inestimable right of suffrage!

Mark you, it is a "debt of gratitude." Had it not been, I suppose, that they acted so nobly and patriotically in your late conflict, you would have been under no such obligation; there would have been no such abstract principle of justice then demanding it. Now, let us test the sincerity of this proposition that gratitude demands that it should be conferred upon them. If gratitude demands that the right of suffrage should be conferred upon the negroes of the South, it equally demands that it should be conferred upon the negroes of the northern States. I ask you where were the negroes of the South when the negroes of the North were enlisting under your banner and were being conscripted into your Army? They were in the South faithfully serving their masters; they were there, not attempting to aid you, not attempting to bear your standard aloft in victory. They were quietly at home attending to their field avocations when the negroes in your loyal States, as you call them, were marshaling to your assistance; and although I have not the figures before me, I will venture to say that more negroes went into your Army from the States that did not secede than from the States that did; and they went into the conflict pretty early, while the comparatively few negroes of the South who went into it went in near the close of the conflict.

Now, if gratitude demands of you that you should confer on the negroes of the South the right of suffrage, pray do you not think the patriotic negroes of the North have the same right? Where is your gratitude to them? Why not confer it upon them? Only six months ago, before you were admonished by the elections, you were in favor of it, you advocated it, you had your bills in this body and your bills in the other House to confer by legislative enactment the right of suffrage upon the negroes in all the States; but lo and behold! when those elections were held, when you heard the sweet music of the voice of the people of your own section admonishing you that there was a lion in the path, beware, you suddenly stopped, these bills were put aside, and we have heard nothing of them since. You do not bring them up now, and hold them up and ask us to vote on them. Why is this? Has your sense of justice become deadened? Are you any less just now than you were before the elections? Are you less grateful now than you were before the elections? No, Mr. President, let my honorable friend from West Virginia confess that the true reason is this: "it is not policy; we cannot win in the great political contest that is coming off by conferring by act of Congress the right of suffrage on the negroes in the northern States." Although it is true, he may say, that they have laid you under an everlasting debt of gratitude to them for the services rendered you in the war, although it is true that they acted as patriotically as did the negroes of the South, yet it is not a measure to win within the non-seceding States, who have admonished you in advance that if you attempt it a Waterloo defeat is yours; but the southern people having no representatives here, having no voice, and having no power in themselves to be represented here, you claiming absolute control over them, (confessing as this bill impliedly confesses on its face that they are States of the Union, but having them in your power,) you undertake to impose this condition upon them, and you plead justice and gratitude to the negroes as the reason why you should do it.

It is true you also say in your platform that the "public safety" demands it. Where is there any evidence of that? Where do we see that the public safety demands that the right of suffrage shall be conferred upon the negro race? Is the South under, I may say, for it is pretty much under, the control of the negro race, (although white men do take their carpet-bags and go down there and somehow or other cheat the poor, deluded negroes out of the offices,) so much better governed now than it was before the war? Look at the conventions there. Go over to Virginia, where once your Marshalls, your Madisons, and the great men of Virginia sat in convention framing a fundamental law for the people of that State, and look in upon the convention now assembled there, and then tell the American people that there is more wisdom, more learning, more true knowledge of the science of government in that convention than there was in the conventions of the fathers who framed the constitution of that State. Go to Mississippi and Louisiana, North Carolina and South Carolina, and hold up those conventions as models of imitation to the people of the non-seceding States!

Mr. President, if the negroes make such wise legislators, if not only their valor was so great in the field that they won for you a continuance of republican government in this country, and have perpetuated the American Union, but if they be so wise in council that their handiwork is to be held up to the admiration of the people of this country everywhere, pray why not throw open your own conventions? Why not confer upon them the right of suffrage in your own States, open your halls of legislation to them, and avail yourselves of all the benefit of the light which comes from their superior intellects? This is a day of progress. We should seek light from every quarter we can get it, and if you should find it in the North, as you found it down South, shut up in a black skin, the same reason that prompted you to open the casket there should cause you to open it in your own States.

But Mr. President, I have said enough. It was only to notice the inconsistency of action of my friend from West Virginia, and those who act with him politically, that I rose to speak. While he here ignores the question of negro suffrage in his own State, and in all the States except the ten seceding States, he stands up boldly and manfully, and claims the right of suffrage for the negro race there, as based upon gratitude, upon justice, and upon every principle of right; and he asks, whence the hostility to the negro race? Why, sir, who has any hostility to the negro race? I know of no one. It has been my lot in life to have been cast in a community where the negro race was very numerous. In my own State, to be sure, the slaves were not very numerous; but before the war we had a larger free negro population relatively to the white population than any State in the Union. I have known them from childhood, played with them in childhood; I grew up among them. I have seen none of this prejudice against the negro race of which we hear. I do not know one who does not wish kindly to the negro race. I know of no one who would not help the negro on the way to prosperity and happiness in life. Hostility to the negro race is not the matter here; the question is a question as to the true policy of the Government, whether a voice in the governing power of the State shall be conferred upon this race; whether sitting here governed by no mere wild feelings of enthusiastic philanthropy or supposed abstract justice, but as statesmen legislating for the good of the people, we can say that the Government will be better, whether the prosperity and happiness of the people will be promoted more by conferring the right of suffrage upon the negro race than by withholding it. That is the question. No man, white or black, where society determines that for its own good it will not be expedient, proper, wise, for the public good, to confer the suffrage upon him, has a right to say that he is entitled to it. As a member of civil society he has no governmental right except what the civil society confers. When a government becomes oppressive, and that oppression becomes so great that the evil of revolutionizing and throwing it off is less than that of bearing it, then it is an inherent right of all people to revolutionize.

This right of suffrage, this right to a voice in the governing power of a State is a political right conferred by society, and conferred by society for the good of society, and not for the particular advantage of the particular individuals; and hence, in approaching a question of this kind, you are met at the threshold by the inquiry, would the public good be promoted, would the state of society be better by conferring it upon this class of society than by withholding it? I am speaking now of a case where you have the undoubted right to confer it. Where you have such right, and you are satisfied that government would be improved, that the laws enacted would be wiser, that those laws would be better administered, and that the general state of society would be improved, then you would undoubtedly be doing right in conferring it, and it would be only a question presented for your calm, cool, and judicious consideration. Does any man believe now that the State of Ohio would be better governed, that its laws would be wiser, that those laws would be better administered by conferring the right of suffrage upon the negroes in that State than they are at the present time? If they would not be so improved what reason have you to believe that government would be better administered, the state of society improved in any other State by allowing negroes to vote? The reason is tenfold stronger against conferring this right in the southern States than it is in the non-seceding States; because the relative numbers of their populations are different in the two sections of the country. Your fifty or seventy-five thousand negro voters, if you have that many in Ohio, are but a drop in the great ocean, so to compare it, with the white voting population of Ohio. But go to South Carolina, go to Florida, go to Mississippi, and some of those other southern States, where there are so many white people disfranchised, and where the whole negro population is enfranchised, (for although they may have fought gallantly by the sides of their masters in behalf of their confederacy, they are all enfranchised,) is not the reason tenfold stronger why they should not be permitted to participate in the Government, especially considering the fact which the honorable Senator does not deny, that they are wholly disqualified; that they are without education; that they have no knowledge or experience in voting or in governmental affairs?

Hence it will not do for the honorable Senator to dismiss with a sneer the remark that some people have been apprehensive of negro supremacy. No person ever thought, no sane person could ever think, that there is any danger of negro supremacy in this country, when you take the whole country together, because the white population of the country so far outnumbers the negro population that it is impossible that there can ever be anything like negro supremacy or even negro equality throughout the whole country; but go into particular locations and take the registered vote of South Carolina, the voting population under your beautiful reconstruction acts, and are not the negroes in the majority? and being in the majority can they not rule? and ruling, will not their rule be supreme if they choose to make it so? Is there not, therefore, apprehension of negro supremacy unless the poor creatures allow themselves to be cheated? I am not in favor of negro governments anyhow; but if they are wise, when these patriotic loyalists, as they term themselves, from the North, who have scarcely known even the location of a southern State, go down there as candidates for the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, and for the local offices, the negroes would say, "If we are fit to vote, we are fit to hold office; you did not come down here among us to tell us of our rights, to cheer us on, and bid us hope when we were in oppression; but when office is to be got through our votes you come down here with your carpet bags to fill them with the crumbs, and with the loaves and fishes of office." If the negroes were wise they would discard all such visitors, and they would assert that if they are fit to vote they are fit to hold office, and they would send these men back into the northern States faster than they went down.

That is the danger, not of negro supremacy throughout the whole country, but of negro supremacy in particular localities. And, sir, is it possible that there can be a white man who is willing to see one of his own race, although that member of his race may have met him upon the deadly field of strife in contention over a question where both sides supposed they were right, subjected to the power of the negro race? Sir, the eternal God that made us has implanted in the heart, I trust, of every member of the race that noble sentiment of honor, that noble sentiment of superiority which causes him instinctively to revolt at such a proposition. No, sir; secure the negroes as far as you have the power in all their civil rights, to life, liberty, and property; as far as you can be kind to them; no one wishes you to be otherwise; but when you come to the consideration of government for a free people let your reason, not your passion; let your cool sense of justice, not your blind prejudices, cause you to do what every other people on earth have done, stand firmly and stand nobly by your own race, because you have the assurance of the history of that race that it is adequate to all the emergencies of government and society. All that has improved human existence upon earth; all that has ennobled man and rendered him but little inferior to the gods; all that has made the waste places of the earth glad and caused them to bloom and blossom as the rose; all that in the development of mind has illustrated the nobility of human nature; all that in art has promoted public good and attracted admiration, has been the work of the race to which we belong. Go to the race which you propose to elevate to a participation in governmental affairs, and point me, if you can, to anything they have ever done or are capable of doing to elevate mankind, to improve society, or even to better their own individual existence.

My honorable friend from West Virginia asks whose fault is this, and he says they did not tear themselves away from their African homes; they did not even emancipate themselves; they are here; and therefore, being here, and not having torn themselves away, and not having emancipated themselves, it would logically follow from his argument that they ought, therefore, to sit in the chief seats of the political synagogue because the honorable Senator cannot escape it; human ingenuity cannot escape it; if they are qualified to vote and thus to enact laws, they must be qualified also to administer those laws. If they can say according to what rule the judge on the bench shall decide a question of right between A and B, they can sit upon that bench and say what is the true interpretation of a statute defining the rights and the duties of contestants in a cause. This matter goes much further than the mere question of voting. Once adopt that and all the rest logically and necessarily follow in the train; and I say here that it would be an act of gross injustice to confer on a class of men the right of voting, and to hold out to them the hope that they may have a voice in the Government under which they live, and then to deny them the further right to actually participate in the execution of that Government in its practical application to society.

Mr. President, I beg leave therefore to assure my honorable friend that those of us who are opposed to negro suffrage in the South, being equally opposed to it in the States that did not secede, are consistent at least. We have not the inconsistency of my honorable friend or of the party to which he belongs. Our gratitude is not bounded by geographical lines or State limits. Our sense of justice is not pent up in any little area of territory, but where it exists it flows out equally everywhere. In regard, however, to this question of negro suffrage, we do not feel a debt of gratitude or a sense of justice, nor do we feel that the safety of the Commonwealth depends upon conferring it. We have too high an appreciation of our own race and of its nobility to believe that it needs assistance from such a quarter as that invoked by the honorable Senator.

Sir, history is not without examples on this subject. Go to your South American republics; go to Central America, where you find equality of civil rights among different races, and what is the consequence? One race degraded and debased. Equal, civil, and political rights lead one step further to social equality. The learned and able Senator from West Virginia thinks this is a mere scarecrow, held up to frighten weak imaginations and to alarm the timid; but point me, if you can, to the history of any people on earth where equal, civil, and political rights have been enjoyed by different races, wherein it did not follow that in the lapse of time, social equality also was enjoyed; and point me, if you can, to the history of any people trying the experiment that have not become debased, where governments have not become unstable, where law has not ceased to have a salutary and obligatory force, where society has not become degenerated.

Mr. President, we are taught in that Book of books which we learned to read at our mothers' knee that there is a great God above us who has made all things according to His will. In the various forms of animal existence we find differences; and human observation and experience teach us that creation is only one great chain, link passing into link, everything made after its order, everything after its own kind, and that thus it was intended by the Almighty Creator of all things.

Sir, you may attempt to thwart the designs of Providence by your legislation; you may undertake to overrule the decrees of Jehovah; but He who rideth upon the wind will see to it that His decrees shall be executed; and who art thou, O man, that thou shouldst say to the potter, "why hast thou made me thus?" The Eternal Creator of all things had the same right in the races of human existence to establish superiority and inferiority of grade and condition that he had on the lowest races of animal existence; and it is not in the mouth of the creature to say to the Creator, "why hast thou made me so?" His sovereign will made it so, and in human existence he who acts well the part assigned to him fulfills the whole measure of his duty and his Creator requires of him no more. Around the eternal throne itself there are cherubim and seraphim, principalities and powers, grades and conditions of inequality. In the spangled heavens which nightly smile upon you there is inequality, for the stars which look down in beauty upon you differ in glory and in luster. Throughout all existence God has marked inequality in diversity as His great law, and it is not in human power to thwart His designs, reverse His decrees, or bring His purposes to naught.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary, to insert the word "Alabama."

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 22, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Conness, Corbett, Ferry, Fowler, Harlan, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Buckalew, Cole, Conkling, Davis, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fessenden, Frothingham, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Johnson, McCreery, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Patterson of Tennessee, Saulsbury, Trumbull, Vickers, and Yates—21.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cameron, Cattell, Cragin, Dixon, Drake, Grimes, Henderson, Norton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Ross, and Sprague—11.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROSS, (who had entered the Chamber as the vote was about being announced.) Can I not have the privilege of voting? I addressed the Chair before the vote was announced.

Mr. POMEROY. The same question will be up after we get into the Senate; when we come out of committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule is peremptory: a Senator who does not vote until the decision is announced cannot record his vote.

Mr. SHERMAN. But the Senator addressed the Chair before the vote was announced.

Mr. ROSS. My recollection is that I addressed the Chair before the result was announced.

Mr. HOWARD. If I am in order I wish to offer an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is an amendment pending offered by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON.] It will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment of Mr. MORTON, which was to add to the substitute reported by the Committee on the Judiciary the following additional sections:

And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the commanding generals of the different military districts in which said States are situated, to cause all officers duly elected under the constitution of either of said States, not disqualified as hereinafter provided, to be installed into their respective offices within twenty days after the passage of this act, and to afford ample protection to such officers in the rightful discharge of their duties: Provided, That such officers shall be deemed provisional only and subject to the paramount authority of the United States, until the provisions of the first section of this act shall have been complied with.

And be it further enacted, That no person prohibited from holding office under the United States, or under any State, by section three of the proposed amendment to the constitution of the United States known as article fourteen, shall be deemed eligible to any office in either of said States, and when any person declared elected to any office is thus disqualified the person having the next highest number of votes for the same office shall be instructed with the discharge of the duties of such office until such time as a new election can be held in accordance with the provisions of the constitution of the State in which it occurs.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will move, if it be in order, that the bill which has been received from the House of Representatives to-day be substituted for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator propose to amend the amendment?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, sir. Let my amendment be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is moved to amend the proposed amendment by striking out all after the enacting clause of the first section of the amendment and inserting as follows:

That the Legislature of each of the States of Arkansas, North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, and Alabama, elected under the constitution thereof, framed and adopted in pursuance of the provisions of an act entitled "An act for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867, and the acts supplementary thereto, be, and hereby is, authorized to meet on such day as may have been fixed, either in such constitution or by the proclamation of any officer authorized to convene such Legislature by the convention which framed such constitution; and if no day shall have been fixed as aforesaid, or if the day so fixed for the meeting of the Legislature of either of said States which shall have passed, or shall have so nearly arrived before the passage of this act that in the opinion of the Governor-elect there shall not be time for the Legislature to assemble on the day so fixed, such Legislature may be convened within thirty days after the passage of this act by the Governor-elect of said State.

And be it further enacted, That whenever either of said States shall be admitted to representation in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of such State, duly elected and qualified under the constitution thereof, and not disqualified by the Constitution or laws of the United States, may be inaugurated without delay, and the government of such State shall thereupon be transferred to the civil authorities thereof.

And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of all civil and military officers exercising authority in either of said States, to afford all practicable aid and protection to the officers of such State in carrying out the provisions of this act; and any such officer who shall willfully withhold such aid and protection, or shall willfully prevent, hinder, or delay the meeting of either of said Legislatures, or the inauguration of any of said State officers, or any other civil or military officer under either of said State constitutions, shall be guilty of a felony, and upon conviction thereof before any Federal or State court of criminal jurisdiction, shall be punished by imprisonment not exceeding five years or by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or both, at the discretion of the court.

Mr. MORTON. It has been suggested to me by several Senators to accept this as a substitute for my amendment. I have no objection to that, with one exception. The amendment I presented provides for the contingency of preventing officers from being inaugurated who are disqualified by the fourteenth article, which is not yet a part of the Constitution. The amendment I offered provides that officers who will be disqualified or ineligible when that article becomes a part of the Constitution shall not be inaugurated in advance. It will prevent rather an anomalous and strange case.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Allow me to suggest that the act of March 2, 1867, prevents that in these words:

"And no person shall be eligible to any office under such provisional government who would be disqualified from holding office under the provision of the third section of the said article."

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is as to the provisional governments. These are the State governments proposed to be set up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was probably in error in suggesting that the amendment of the Senator from Oregon was in order as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Indiana. The Chair did not think at the moment that the Committee on the Judiciary had reported an amendment as a substitute for the original bill, to which the proposition of the Senator from Indiana is an amendment, so that this amendment would be in the third degree. The Senator from Indiana, however, can withdraw his amendment, and then this would be in order.

Mr. MORTON. I withdraw my amendment, and this can be offered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the amendment of the Senator from Oregon is in order as an amendment to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. HOWARD. I ask now whether it is in order to offer an amendment to sections two and three?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Of the original bill?

Mr. HOWARD. No; of the substitute presented by the Judiciary Committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is not now in order, because the pending proposition is an amendment to that amendment.

Mr. HOWARD. I propose when the proper time comes to offer an amendment to those two sections, and the Chair will allow me to state it now. I propose to amend section two so that it shall read as follows:

That if the day fixed for the meeting of the Legislature of either of said States by the constitution thereof shall have passed or shall have so nearly arrived before the passage of this act that there shall not be time for the Legislature to assemble at the time fixed by the constitution of such State, such Legislature shall convene at the end of twenty days from the time this act shall take effect unless the Governor-elect shall sooner convene the same.

It will be seen by this amendment that I dispense with the discretion which is given by the second section to the Governor-elect of a State to call the Legislature together or not, as he may think fit. I do not think he ought to have any such discretion. I think we ought to require by our statute that the Legislature-elect shall convene at some given time, and render that time absolutely certain by law, and not leave it to the discretion of any Governor-elect or anybody else. This amendment will allow twenty days from the passage of this act for the Governor-elect of any State to assemble the Legislature, at the end of which time, if he does not call the Legislature together, it is required to assemble by law. It then becomes a legislative body, invested with all proper functions for the transaction of the business which is conferred upon it by this act and by the Constitution.

Then again I propose to amend section three, so that it shall read:

That the first section of this act shall take effect as to each State except Georgia, when such State shall by its Legislature duly ratify article fourteen of the amendment of the Constitution of the United States proposed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and as to the State of Georgia, when it shall, in addition, give the assent of said State to the fundamental conditions hereinbefore imposed upon the same.

And I propose to strike out all the remainder of the section as being surplusage. This section, it will be observed, gives to the President of the United States, as it is now written, authority to make proclamation of the ratification of the fourteenth article of amendment by any one of these rebel States, and it does not authorize the admission of the State to representation in Congress until such a proclamation shall have been made by the President. For one, I have not the slightest idea that Mr. Johnson would ever issue any such proclamation; he would keep the States out so long as he possibly could unless we should consent to bring them in under his policy; and if this clause is retained in the third section I do not foresee that these States will ever be admitted in virtue of the President's proclamation.

I propose, therefore, to dispense with that proclamation entirely, and to declare when each of these States shall have ratified the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution that it shall be, ipso facto, entitled to representation in Congress whether that ratification shall take place during the session or in the vacation of Congress. That will make an end of the question forever; for the moment we confer on these rebel States the right of representation in the two Houses of Congress then the President of the United States has nothing more to say about it; the rights which they lost by the rebellion are restored to them by the action of the two Houses of Congress in this bill, and nothing should keep them out longer. As it is not, however, in order at this time to offer this amendment, I merely make this announcement for the purpose of indicating what I intend to do.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, I have not had time to examine carefully the bill that has come from the other House, and that is now offered as an amendment; but I think we had best not adopt it without, at any rate, having it printed and before us, so that we may see the effect of it. The object which we all have in view is the recognition of these State governments at an early day. The bill before the Senate, as it is reported by the Judiciary Committee, allows the Governors of these States to convene the Legislatures at any time within thirty days. The Senator from Michigan suggests one or two amendments to the bill as reported by the committee, and I think, perhaps, it may be wise to adopt them. If his amendments shall be adopted the Legislatures of all these States will be required by law to assemble within twenty days after the passage of the act, provided the Governor-elect does not convene them sooner than that. How can we get it in any better shape than that?

Then the bill provides that if they ratify the fourteenth article of amendment to the Constitution they are to be entitled to representation. The Senator proposes to strike out the requirement that was in the bill as it came from the House of Representatives, and that is in the bill as reported by the committee—that the President shall issue his proclamation announcing that fact. The law, as it now exists, requires each State, when it ratifies a constitutional amendment, to send the evidence of that fact to the office of the Secretary of State, who is required, when a sufficient number of States have ratified any constitutional amendment to make it part of the Constitution, to publish a notice officially proclaiming that fact.

It seems to me that if the amendments which are suggested by the Senator from Michigan be made, we shall accomplish all that it is desirable to accomplish. The bill just sent in from the House of Representatives and now offered as an amendment to this bill, contains a provision which, I am very sure, the Senate on reflection will not want to adopt. If I understand it correctly, it contains a provision that the Legislatures are to convene at the times fixed by the constitutions. Those periods are very remote in some of these States.

Mr. POMEROY. Unless that time shall have expired.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then it does not fix a time for them to convene afterward, does it?

Mr. POMEROY. Yes; thirty days after the passage of the act.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have not had sufficient time to examine it to see whether there is a provision of that kind.

Mr. POMEROY. I understood it so.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] thinks the Senator from Kansas is incorrect.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator from Illinois will allow me, I desire to suggest that this amendment, which I have not had an opportunity to read, go over for the present. There are other amendments to be offered that may take up the time of the Senate until the adjournment to-day. I think we ought to look at this proposition and read it. I should like to have an opportunity to look at it; and certainly the Judiciary Committee ought to have an opportunity to examine it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I trust it will not be adopted without our having an opportunity to examine it and compare it with the bill under consideration more carefully than we can do by hearing it read at the Clerk's desk.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the amendment will be withdrawn for the present.

Mr. SUMNER. Why not order it to be printed?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think it ought to be printed if the bill is to go over until to-morrow. If the Senator from Oregon would withdraw the amendment for the present, at any rate, and let an order be made to print, we could go on with other amendments, and he can offer it again if he thinks it proper to do so. I have had no opportunity to compare it with the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am willing to pursue any course that will accommodate Senators and expedite business. If there is any way to ever reach a vote on this bill, I am willing to accede to any suggestion for that purpose.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I suggest that the amendment be withdrawn and that an order be made to print it at once, so that it may go to the printer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the amendment to the amendment withdrawn?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, sir.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Now, let an order be made to print it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be entered if there is no objection.

Mr. MORTON. I should like to have the order to print include the amendment that I originally offered. ["Certainly."]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order to print will be considered as covering both amendments, if there be no objection.

Mr. HOWARD. I now move to amend section two of the substitute reported by the committee by striking out in lines four and five the words "in the opinion of the Governor-elect," and by striking out in lines seven and eight the words "may be convened within thirty days after the passage of this act by the Governor-elect of such State," and inserting "shall convene at the end of twenty days from the time this act takes effect unless the Governor-elect shall sooner convene the same;" so as to make the section read:

That if the day fixed for the meeting of the Legislature of either of said States by the constitution thereof shall have passed, or have so nearly arrived before the passage of this act that there shall not be time for the Legislature to assemble at the time fixed by the constitution of such State, such Legislature shall convene at the end of twenty days from the time this act takes effect, unless the Governor-elect shall sooner convene the same.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will say in regard to that amendment that I have no authority to accept it for the committee, but it makes the section more specific, and individually I have no objection to it.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. I now move to amend the third section by striking out in lines three and four the words "the President of the United States shall officially proclaim the due ratification," and inserting "such State shall;" by striking out in line four the word "of" and inserting "duly ratify;" by striking out the word "he," in line seven, and inserting "it," by striking out in the same line the word "proclaim," and after the word "addition," in that line, inserting "give;" and to strike out all after the word "same," in the ninth line; so as to make the section read, if amended, as I propose:

That the first section of this act shall take effect as to each State, except Georgia, when such State shall by its Legislature duly ratify article fourteen of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States proposed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and as to the State of Georgia, when it shall in addition give the assent of said State to the fundamental condition hereinbefore imposed upon the same.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This matter as to what functionary should proclaim the assent of the State to this article of the Constitution was very carefully discussed and considered in committee, and we came to the conclusion that the true policy in regard to it was to follow the established course of business in that regard, which always has been to admit a State or to set her up upon the final evidence of a proclamation by the President that she had complied with the law. That, I believe, has been the constant uniform practice, so far as I know, without any exception whatever. We thought it was better to adhere to that practice in this case and to make it the duty of the President, as we clearly have a right to do, when such events should have occurred and the official evidence of it have been transmitted to him, to make the proclamation which should restore the State to its original relations with the Union.

It is said by my friend from Michigan that he has no idea that the President of the United States will do any such thing, although the law imposes upon him the duty of doing it. I do not agree with him about that. The President of the United States will not run any risk of that character upon a duty to which even his own political friends would tell him was one which he was bound to perform. I think my friends on the other side of the Chamber will agree that it is perfectly constitutional to require the President to do a certain ministerial act of that description upon the happening of a certain event which the law requires. It has been done a thousand times. I take it there will be no dispute about that. Therefore I have no fears that the President of the United States would fail to do that duty which the law has hitherto imposed upon him, and which he and his predecessors have hitherto done. It is better to adhere to that, to take the usual method. If we find that the President of the United States, these things having been done and the evidence of them having been transmitted to him, chooses to set his face against the law, I even have faith in this body and in the other body to believe that some method would still be found which all would agree would be a constitutional method of curing the evil and punishing the offender. It may be, however, that my hopes or my expectations are altogether beyond probability.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, I would not offer the amendment merely to mar the text of the bill as it came from the Committee on the Judiciary, nor to make any alteration unless I thought it were necessary. As the section now stands it reads thus: "That the first section of this act;" that is, the section admitting these rebel States to representation, "shall take effect as to each State, except Georgia, when the President of the United States shall officially proclaim the due ratification by its Legislature of article fourteen of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States proposed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress."

The honorable Senator from Vermont knows very well that the President has resisted our legislation, upon the subject of the readmission of the rebel States, from the beginning. He knows as well as I do that he has resorted first to the veto, and has endeavored to extinguish and utterly prevent the action of Congress upon the subject of the readmission of these States. He believes, and he has announced that belief over and over again, in his veto messages, in his solemn annual messages, and in his popular addresses upon the stump—he believes the whole system of our reconstruction legislation to be totally void and destitute of constitutional warrant. He entertains that opinion. He does not intend that our mode of rehabilitating the rebel States shall become effectual; but he intends that his mode of reconstructing them by imperial decrees shall prevail as against the legislation of Congress. The two policies, that of Congress and that of the President, are directly antagonistical to each other; they cannot stand together; and the question from December, 1865, down to the present time has been, and still is, which of these two policies shall prevail, ours or his?

And let me say to the honorable Senator from Vermont that he much mistakes the character of the President when he supposes that there is anything that he does not dare attempt. Unless he shall issue this proclamation after all the States shall have ratified the fourteenth amendment, these States cannot be admitted into the Union; they are not entitled to their rights as States at all; they are still kept out; they are not admitted, as I say, even to the right of representation.

Sir, let not my friend lay the flattering unction to his soul that Andrew Johnson will not dare to withhold this proclamation. Sir, he will withhold it, and he will set at defiance all attempts to impeach him in the House of Representatives, and look with contempt and scorn upon any feeling that Senators may entertain in regard to finding him guilty of a breach of the law which we now have before us.

No, sir; his object is to defeat our legislation and to prevent the readmission of these States upon the principles incorporated in our reconstruction acts; and he will do it, if possible. He can do it in this case by simply withholding his proclamation. Now, sir, of what good is a presidential proclamation as to the readmission of a State? It amounts to nothing except simply to certify it to the public and to the world that such and such facts have taken place. Is it necessary that the proof of these facts should exist in such a proclamation? Certainly not.

Is not the solemn ratification of the fourteenth amendment by the respective Legislatures under the seal of the State—and that would be the form undoubtedly in which it would present itself to us—just as valid, just as efficient as evidence to show this fact as the proclamation of the President? Clearly so. Why, then, insist upon this useless ceremony of a presidential proclamation when you know, or at least ought to know, as I think, that such is the opposition of Johnson to our legislation that he will never issue such a proclamation, but persist in keeping these States out as long as practicable. I hope, therefore, that this amendment will be adopted and that this discretionary authority given to Johnson in the section will be taken from him.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I agree entirely with the Senator from Michigan in the preliminary statement he makes, that is, the laying down of the question; the question is whether these States shall be restored by process of law, or whether they shall be restored by process, of what he calls very properly, imperial will? My proposition, as his is, is to restore them according to law, and I intend that the minister of the law, the President of the United States, shall do the last official act that the law requires to restore them. I do not by any means give up, as my friend does, that I am beaten in this contest with the President of the United States as to whether he is to obey the law or not. My friend from Michigan knows as well as I do that but for a difference of opinion among persons to whom we must attribute as much intelligence and as much faith as we had as to what the law meant, the President of the United States, in all human probability, would have left his office before now. What I propose to do is to compel the President of the United States, as the constitutional minister of the law which speaks through this bill, when these States shall have ratified the constitutional amendment, to say so officially. I intend to commit him in that way to the congressional policy of restoration by making him do the last official act that shall restore these States to their proper relations, and I have not a particle of fear as to his not doing it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I would suggest to the Senator from Vermont, and also to the Senator from Michigan, that the amendment of the Senator from Michigan should be retained, so that these States on ratifying the amendment and complying with the fundamental condition become, ipso facto, States in this Union, and that we also retain the latter provision of the section as reported, which is in these words:

"And it is hereby made the duty of the President within ten days after receiving official information of the ratification of said amendment, by the Legislature of either of said States, to issue a proclamation announcing that fact."

It seems to me that that gains for us all that the Senator from Michigan desires to gain, which is a great deal, does not imperil the restoration of these States to the compliance of the President, and it gains what the Senator from Vermont would gain, calls upon the President to perform the last official and usual act of proclaiming that they have so complied with the law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am much obliged to my friend. He has said substantially what I was about to say myself, for I was just going on to contend that the fair and proper meaning of this section, taking it all together, is that when each of these States shall have ratified the fourteenth article they have completed the last act upon their part; the rest is but mere official formality. I am glad, however, that my friend has suggested the amendment, which I should not have suggested, because that certainly does seem to cover the whole ground.

Mr. HOWARD. I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to say one word further as to the value of requiring the President of the United States—I make no secret of it either to the gentlemen on the other side or to him—to do this official act; and that is that when we come to the elections of November, and these States undertake to vote, I do not intend to have the President (unless he has previously violated a law which all men agree to be constitutional) undertake to say "the principal bill is unconstitutional, and I have never assented to it, and I do not intend to permit these States to elect; I am not committed to it in any way; I have made no proclamation about it; my hands are entirely free," or to undertake to get up any difficulty or disturbance when their votes come to be counted. I want the President of the United States, to use a very homely phrase, either to fish or cut bait when this bill is passed and ten days have elapsed. As I said before, it is due to him, because he is not so entirely devoid of sense as some people suppose. I have no idea that he will hesitate a moment, and I am perfectly willing to have it put in a position where hesitation will hurt nobody but himself.

Mr. HOWARD. I have no objection to the amendment suggested by the honorable Senator from New Jersey, and I will therefore withdraw that part of my amendment which strikes out all after the word "same," in the ninth line of the section. I will leave the last clause stand.

Mr. WILSON. I should like to have the section read as it will stand if the amendment as modified be adopted.

The CHIEF CLERK. If the section be amended as now proposed, it will read:

That the first section of this act shall take effect as to each State, except Georgia, when such State shall by its Legislature duly ratify article fourteen of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States, proposed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and as to the State of Georgia when it shall in addition give the assent of said State to the fundamental condition hereinbefore imposed upon the same, and it is hereby made the duty of the President within ten days after receiving official information of the ratification of said amendment by the Legislature of either of said States to issue a proclamation announcing that fact.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to ask, for information, whether this last clause authorizing the President to make this announcement would stand in the way in any respect of the Senators and Representatives from these States taking their seats before the proclamation was made?

Mr. HOWARD. Not at all.

Mr. WILSON. Then I have no objection to it.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to amend the first section of the amendment reported by the committee by striking out all after the word "taxed," in line twelve, to the end of the section. The words which I propose to strike out are:

And the State of Georgia shall only be entitled and admitted to representation upon this further fundamental condition: that the first and third subdivisions of section seventeen of the fifth article of the constitution of said State, except the proviso to the first sub-division, shall be null and void, and that the General Assembly of said State, by solemn public act, shall declare the assent of the State to the foregoing fundamental condition.

This clause relates to Georgia alone, and will create a deep and widespread dissatisfaction in that State. Still, if it was within our power, and if there were not good reasons why we should refrain from interference, I should be willing to run the risk of adopting this condition; but this is a fundamental condition of an entirely different character from any that has heretofore been imposed upon any State when being admitted into the Union. This proposes to ignore an important provision of the constitution of the State of Georgia, without which, in the opinions of thousands in the State of Georgia, the constitution could not have been adopted. It has been affirmed, over and over again in the newspapers, and it is stated to me here, that without what is called the relief clause in the constitution of Georgia, that constitution would probably have failed. And now we propose, in a material and vital matter, to change the constitution by an act of Congress in cooperation with the Legislature. All previous fundamental conditions imposed upon a State being admitted into the Union have been upon one of two grounds, either that the clause in the State constitution objected to was in violation of the Constitution of the United States, or that it affected some great, material right, without which the government would not be republican in form.

The condition adopted in the case of Missouri was rather to exclude a conclusion that might have been drawn from a provision of the constitution of that State. The fundamental conditions we have adopted here have been on the ground that to change a constitution so as to deprive a portion of the people of the State of the right of voting was anti-republican; that we had the power to secure to those who participated in the formation of the State government the right to continue to participate in that State government in all time, on the ground that the withdrawal of the right of suffrage from a portion of the people of a State who had heretofore enjoyed that right, was anti-republican. But this proposes to legislate for the people of Georgia on a matter purely affecting the law of debtor and creditor.

In the first place, I supposed the provision referred to in the constitution of Georgia was much worse than it is; but on examining it carefully, I find that the provision is not very greatly different from the ordinary statutes of limitation of the different States. Nearly all the new States have a shorter statute of limitations running against contracts than has been prescribed in the constitution of Georgia. Let us look at it a little more closely. The seventeenth section of the fifth article of the constitution of Georgia provides:

"No court in this State shall have jurisdiction to try or determine any suit against any resident of this State upon any contract or agreement made or implied, or upon any contract made in renewal of any debt existing prior to the 1st day of June, 1865; nor shall any court or ministerial officer of this State have authority to enforce any judgment, execution, or decree rendered or issued upon any contract or agreement made or implied, or upon any contract in renewal of a debt existing prior to the 1st day of June, 1865, except in the following cases."

The declaration contained in this first clause is very broad indeed. It denies the use of the courts of the State of Georgia for the enforcement of any debt contracted prior to the 1st of June, 1865, the close of the war, except in seven different classes of cases enumerated. These exceptions actually do away with nearly all the harsh and severe stringency of the first clause. What are the exceptions?

"1. In suits against trustees, where the trust property is in the hands of the trustee, or has been invested by him in other specific effects now in his hands, and in suits by the vendor of real estate against the vendee, where not more than one third of the purchase money has been paid, and the vendee is in possession of the land or specific effects for which he has sold it, and he refuses to deliver the land or said effects to the vendor. In such cases the courts and officers may entertain jurisdiction and enforce judgments against said trust, property or land or effects.

"2. In suits for the benefit of minors by trustees appointed before the 1st day of June, 1865.

"3. In suits against corporations in their corporate capacity, but not so as to enforce the debt against the stockholders or officers thereof in their individual capacity.

"4. In suits by charitable or literary institutions for money loaned, property (other than slaves) sold, or services rendered by such institutions.

"5. In suits on debts due from mechanical or manual labor when the suit is by the mechanic or laborer.

"6. In cases when the debt is set up by way of defense, and the debt set up exceeds any debt due by defendant to plaintiff of which the courts are denied jurisdiction.

"7. In all other cases in which the General Assembly shall by law give the said courts and officers jurisdiction: Provided, that no court or officer shall have, nor shall the General Assembly give authority or jurisdiction to try or give judgment on or enforce any debt the consideration of which was a slave or slaves, or the hire thereof.

What is the meaning of all this, taken together? With the exception of cases that grow out of a breach of trust, or where a minor is concerned, in ordinary cases where the right to sue is suspended; in all other cases the matter is left to the Legislature of the State. Notwithstanding the first clause, the Legislature of the State may confer at any time upon any of the courts any jurisdiction they see proper to recover any character of debts. This provision can only affect two classes of debts. One is debts that were contracted prior to the war; prior, say, to the 1st of March, 1861. Before this provision takes effect, in relation to all such debts contracted prior to the war, a period of seven years will have transpired, from 1861 to 1868; so that it can only operate as a statute of limitations as against all debts that existed before the war. Seven years is the period within which the statute of limitations runs against nearly all debts in most of the States of this Union. In the State of Ohio we have fifteen years for a note; but I believe in Michigan it is seven years.

Mr. HOWARD. Six years.

Mr. SHERMAN. In Michigan six years, and in nearly all the western States there is a short period of limitation. Now, under this provision of the Constitution, unless the Legislature shall hereafter otherwise provide, no debt can be sued upon that was contracted before the war, upon the specie basis; in other words, that the period of limitation of seven years shall apply to all that class of debts.

But the main object of this provision was to cut off suits upon debts contracted during the war. It is manifestly just and right that some relief should be given to the people of Georgia against the enforcement of contracts made during the war, and Senators must not be blind to the imperative call of these people for some relief upon such contracts. Debts during the war were made upon the basis of confederate money. In the beginning it was worth probably fifty cents on the dollar; but finally it got so low that it took five or eight hundred dollars of confederate bills to pay one dollar of debt. To enforce debts contracted upon the basis of confederate money during the war, even although those debts may have been honest, may have been contracted between loyal persons, would be seriously, terribly oppressive to the debtors; it would be absolute ruin. Take the ordinary case of a note of hand given during the war by a debtor to a creditor for $1,000. What did the debtor receive for that note? Probably what would now be bought easily for one hundred, or fifty, or twenty-five dollars. Without this provision, the debt might be enforced against the debtor to the full amount of $1,000, because, although it was expressly payable in confederate notes, yet, as we cannot regard those as a legal tender, it would be enforced in dollars, in money. If it was put in the ordinary language,

"I promise to pay C. D. $1,000," it would be enforced in the money which is now the only legal tender; and thus the debtor would be absolutely ruined by being required to pay that for which he received probably but a trifling benefit.

This was the reason that induced the people of Georgia in framing this constitution to insert what they called the relief clause; and I say to Senators that tens of thousands of people will be utterly ruined forever if there is no power in the State of Georgia to protect them against contracts made between each other during the war and before the war. The war operated as a great scourge—

Mr. MORTON. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio if the case of Georgia in that respect is different from that of any other rebel State, and if this provision is not necessary in the other States, why is it necessary in Georgia?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know what provisions have been made or may be made in the other States.

Mr. MORTON. There are none such.

Mr. SHERMAN: But here is the case of Georgia, and it is presented to us by their constitution. These people have met together and framed a constitution, which we declare to be republican in form. They have adopted a certain regulation in regard to the law of debtor and creditor. Now, you propose to strike out that provision of their constitution. Why? It governs them alone; it is a local matter; it will affect only local contracts there at home. Why should you interfere with it? It does not involve the right of the individual citizen to any of those great rights which we may protect as necessary to constitute a republican form of government. It is only the regulation of the law of debtor and creditor. It does not affect the rights of great classes of citizens. It is not one of those fundamental conditions that it is necessary for Congress to watch over and guard. It is simply the regulation of the enforcement of contracts. Why, therefore, interfere with it? When we go beyond securing the enforcement of the guaranty of republican government, which we have the power to do, when we undertake to legislate for them upon matters on which they have passed, we transcend our bounds.

I know that Senators may say that this relief clause would affect or tend to affect that clause of the Constitution of the United States which says that no State shall impair the obligation of a contract. If that provision of the Constitution of the United States is affected at all by this clause of the constitution of Georgia, the latter clause is entirely null. If the courts of the United States hold that this clause does impair the obligation of contracts within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States, what business have we with it here? It is a matter for the courts to pass upon. If this is unconstitutional so far as a citizen outside of the bounds of Georgia is concerned, of course the courts will maintain the Constitution of the United States, and no act of the people of Georgia, either in forming a constitution or in framing a law can affect the right.

It seems to me that you propose to undertake to change the constitution of the State of Georgia in a vital matter upon which they have passed. The very large vote which the honorable Senator from Illinois yesterday quoted as having been cast in Georgia, was cast and induced probably and mainly by this very clause; and yet now you propose to change it without resubmitting to them the constitution. You propose to allow the Legislature of the State to strike out what the people regard as a material and fundamental principle of their constitution. It seems to me it is better and wiser for us to leave this matter to the people of Georgia, and if this provision of the State constitution shall be found to be in conflict in any respect with the Constitution of the United States, the courts will attend to that and protect the citizens of the United States or the citizens of Georgia from an unconditional act.

There is only one other observation I wish to make. I have letters here from different persons, among the rest one from Governor Brown, stating that this relief clause entered largely into the support of the constitution, and that the people of Georgia voted in a large measure in the hope that this provision would be adopted. I will say now that if I were a member of the convention of Georgia I would not have put this provision in the constitution. I would have simply inserted, if it was at all necessary, some reasonable limitation on the statute of limitations, permanent in its character, if you please.

I have already said, Mr. President, all that I deem necessary. So far as I am concerned, I desire to avoid interfering at all with the right of these people to form their own government in their own way except where it is absolutely essential to protect the constitutional rights of other citizens of the United States.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Before the Senator from Ohio sits down, I desire to ask him a question, as this is rather an interesting subject. I desire to know what effect this provision of the Georgia constitution would have, as I understand there is a large amount of indebtedness due by persons in Georgia to citizens in the North, contracted prior to the war. Would it not have the effect to wipe out those contracts?

Mr. SHERMAN. It would have undoubtedly the effect of a statute of limitations.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Then I desire to ask the Senator another question; whether the bonds that were issued by railroad companies prior to 1865 would also be wiped out?

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir. I answered the Senator wrong before. All those are provided for by the exceptions. The third exception provides expressly for "suits against corporations in their corporate capacity." All rights against corporations are carefully reserved; and the Senator will observe, if he will read the exceptions, that nearly all the cases of what are called privileged debts, or favored debts in law, cases growing out of trusts or confidential or fiduciary relations, are preserved. The power of the Legislature to give jurisdiction in all other cases is carefully reserved; but the case of corporations is expressly provided for.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish simply to say that I think my honorable friend from Ohio was mistaken in his other answer to the Senator from Vermont. If there are any creditors in the North of persons living in the State of Georgia, suit may be brought in the courts of the United States upon those claims, and this constitutional provision does not in any way interfere with the recovery of any claim that is due from a citizen of the State of Georgia to a citizen of any other State in the Union.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I desire to ask the Senator from Oregon whether the courts would be justified in so deciding after Congress have passed upon this constitution?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not suppose there is any question about that. Certainly the mere recognition of this State and the approval of this constitution is in no respect a law of Congress that would govern the courts of the United States.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, the authority by which Congress declares these clauses null and void in this particular case, is to be found in a provision in the constitution of Georgia itself. The people of the State of Georgia, when they adopted their constitution in convention and ratified it at the polls, provided that Congress might accept the constitution with conditions. That provision will be found in section eleven of article eleven:

* Should this constitution be ratified by the people and Congress accept the same with any qualifications or conditions, the government herein provided for, and the officers elected shall nevertheless exist and continue in the exercise of their several functions as the government of this State, so far as the same may be consistent with the action of the United States in the premises."

I suppose it was competent for the people of Georgia to authorize the Congress of the United States, if they thought proper, in the adoption of the constitution to impose conditions, and one of the conditions that is proposed by the bill as it passed the House of Representatives and as it is reported to this body by the Committee on the Judiciary, declares null and void the first and third subdivisions of the seventeenth section of the fifth article, with the exception of the proviso.

The ground upon which that is done, I will say to the Senator from Ohio, is this: that this clause which he has read and which declares that no court in the State of Georgia shall take jurisdiction of any cause of action which arose prior to 1865 is unconstitutional; it is contrary to the Constitution of the United States. It impairs directly the obligation of contracts, which no State can do by the passage of any law or by a provision in its constitution, or otherwise. It is not a limitation, let me say to the Senator from Ohio, that prescribes a time for the future, declares that after a certain length of time a debt shall be presumed to have been paid, or a debt cannot be enforced where the statute of limitations is interposed. But a statute of limitations which gave no time within which a contract could be enforced would be held unconstitutional everywhere, I apprehend. Although the Legislature has a right to regulate the remedy, Legislatures cannot destroy the remedy; that impairs the contract. A contract is valueless unless it can be enforced. There must be in it the reciprocal obligation, and some way of enforcing it, or else the contract is valueless. Here is a provision which inhibits the courts of Georgia from taking jurisdiction of any cause of action which arose prior to 1865, and forbids any ministerial officer in that State from executing any process to enforce a contract originating before that period.

But, says the Senator, this is a long time; it is seven years since the war began. Does not the Senator know that during those seven years debts could not be collected; and is not that to be taken out of the time that the statute would be running, even if it were a statute of limitations, which this is not at all? It seemed to the committee that this provision was palpably unconstitutional.

But it has been suggested that the United States courts could have jurisdiction in favor of non-residents. That would only be in case the amount was sufficient to authorize the United States courts to take jurisdiction.

Mr. HOWARD. Five hundred dollars.

Mr. TRUMBULL. What will you do with a debt that amounts to but $400? Is the poor man, the creditor who has a debt of only $400, to lose it?

But the Senator from Ohio goes on and says that striking out this provision will be ruin to the people of Georgia. If he will look at another clause of the constitution of Georgia he will see that it provides for a homestead exemption of $3,000 in specie, that cannot be touched for any debt. That is a pretty good protection to the poor people of Georgia.

Mr. CONKLING. And they can pass exemption laws as to personal property besides.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Here is the exemption:

"Each head of a family, or guardian or trustee of a family of minor children shall be entitled to a homestead of realty to the value of $2,000 in specie and personal property to the value of $1,000 in specie, both to be valued at the time they are set apart. And no court or ministerial officer in this State shall ever have jurisdiction or authority to enforce any judgment, decree, or execution against said property so set apart."

Three thousand dollars in specie! There is a protection that will prevent the people of Georgia from being ruined by the oppression of creditors. It seems to me if the Congress of the United States were to sanction such a principle as this, that any State in this Union under a constitution that forbids the passage of a law impairing the obligation of contracts could at any time pass a law and say that no courts within its jurisdiction shall take cognizance of any cause of action which has arisen before that time. If they can say 1865 they can say 1867.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to this consideration: if there is any benefit to accrue to Georgia from having the provisions retained in their constitution, the fundamental condition imposed by this law does not deprive them of that benefit, for the provisions which they have placed in their constitution would be just as effective and valid if placed upon their statute-book, and the fundamental condition imposed by this law does not prevent their placing them on their statute-book. My own opinion is that they would be as perfectly worthless and invalid on their statute-book as they are in the constitution, because, being contrary to the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, they would be so declared by the courts; but if they are worth anything in the constitution there is nothing in our act that prevents their having all the benefit of them by enacting them as laws.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, disguise this as we will, it is simply repudiation. We can make nothing else out of it. The Constitution of the United States provides that no State shall pass a law impairing the obligation of a contract. It cannot do this by a simple law, nor can it do it by a constitution. It is simply repudiation; and although this provision may have contributed to make the constitution popular in the State of Georgia, we cannot and dare not give it our indorsement here. Sir, there is a party in this country that stands on the very threshold of repudiation of our whole national debt; there is a party that stands ready to seize any, the slightest pretext for repudiating the national debt; and I ask how the party of the Union, I ask how the Republican party, the party of good faith, would be paralyzed if it should dare to justify the State of Georgia in repudiating honest debts there—all debts contracted before a certain time in 1865? Sir, we would thus indorse in advance the very thing with which we are threatened in this country.

The debts to be repudiated by this constitution are many of them as honest as our national debt, as honest as any class of debts, and the State of Georgia has no more right to repudiate them than we have to repudiate the national debt. This provision is false in principle. It may have been put in for the very purpose suggested by the Senator from Ohio, expecting that it would be repudiated by Congress. It may have been put in for the purpose of making the constitution popular. I will not say that, but that there are thousands of men in that State who would be willing to get rid of their debts there is no doubt. There are plenty of men in every State who would be willing to vote for a constitution that would relieve them of all their debts. But, sir, we dare not give it our sanction here.

It seems, under the provision referred to by the Senator from Illinois, that we can strike out or disagree to this provision, and yet not prevent the organization of the State government of Georgia. It will be organized and will go on just as well as if this was not done, and steer clear of all the legal difficulties, as is suggested by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.] But how dare we give our sanction to a bold, palpable, and bald repudiating clause? I do not wish to argue it further.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to ask my colleague one question before he takes his seat.

Mr. MORTON. Certainly.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I agree with him that this is a monstrous proposition, that any State can repudiate debts that were legal at the time they were contracted; but if this provision, however vicious it may be, appealed to a class of the community and secured for the constitution a large vote which, perhaps, otherwise might not have gone for it, after this provision is stricken out, how can the Senator say that the constitution thus changed would have received the vote of the people?

Mr. MORTON. I will endeavor to answer my colleague. The argument that this constitution would not, perhaps, have been adopted but for this provision, was not made by me. I do not know how many voted for it on that account. Probably there were more men who voted against it on that account than who voted for it on that account, or as many. If one man owes a debt, he owes it to somebody else, and if he is interested in getting clear of his debt, and therefore votes for the constitution, the other man is interested in collecting his debt, and therefore votes against it; so that, perhaps, the thing would operate both ways. The constitution was adopted by a large majority. But, sir, whatever the motive may have been that put it there, it is unconstitutional, and it is dishonest.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President—

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Will the Senator give way to enable me to move an executive session?

Mr. HOWARD. I have but a few words to say.

Mr. SHERMAN. So far as this amendment is concerned, if my friend from Maine will allow me, I will withdraw it. My impression is that the eleventh section of the eleventh article—

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The Senator from Michigan has the floor.

Mr. HOWARD. I have but a few words to say, and then I will yield to my friend from Maine.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I hope the Senator will allow me to move an executive session now.

Mr. HOWARD. Very well; I yield for that purpose.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, June 9, 1868.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m., pursuant to order, for the purpose of receiving the Chinese embassy.

The SPEAKER. Before directing the Clerk to read the Journal of yesterday, the Chair announces the appointment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BROOKS] on the committee of reception in the place of his colleague, [Mr. WOOD,] who is detained at home by illness. The reading of the Journal will be suspended when the Doorkeeper shall announce the presence of the committee of the House of Representatives and the Chinese embassy; and in coming from the principal door down to the area in front of the Speaker's desk the House of Representatives will receive them standing. Before the formal presentation takes place the Chair will announce the period at which members shall resume their seats by a single stroke of the gavel, and after the presentation the committee will introduce the embassy to members individually who desire so to be introduced to them. The Clerk will now read the Journal of yesterday.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the Journal of yesterday until interrupted by the Doorkeeper, who announced the committee of the House of Representatives with the Chinese embassy.

RECEPTION OF THE CHINESE EMBASSY.

On the announcement of the presence of the committee of the House of Representatives with the Chinese embassy the members of the House arose in their seats. The committee and the embassy having taken their position in the area in front of the Speaker's desk,

Mr. SCHENCK, on behalf of the committee, said: Mr. Speaker, the committee charged by your appointment with that duty, have the honor to present to the House of Representatives his Excellency Anson Burlingame, and their Excellencies his associates in the Chinese embassy.

The SPEAKER. Your Excellencies: The House of Representatives intermits its ordinary labors to-day to receive in this Hall the embassy which the oldest nation of the world has commissioned to America and Europe; and in the name of the people of the United States we bid you welcome. Spanning a continent in our area, from the Bay of Fundy to the granite portals of the Golden Gate, we turn our faces from the fatherland of Europe to clasp hands in closer relations than ever before with those who come to us from that continent which was the birthplace of mankind.

Nor does it lessen our pleasure that the chief of this embassy, when transferred from membership here to diplomatic duties abroad, so won the confidence of his imperial majesty to whom he was accredited that he returns to our midst, honored with his distinguished associates, as the custodians of the most remarkable trust ever committed by an emperor to his envoys.

This embassy of the Chinese empire, which has attracted such universal attention, has been hailed throughout our land, not only as marking an onward step in the world's history, but as being of peculiar interest to this Republic. With our western States fronting the same Pacific sea on which the millions of China have looked, ages before our country was born, into the family of nations; with our Pacific railroad rapidly approaching completion, and destined, with the steamers plying from its termini, East and West, to become the highway of commerce between Asia and Europe; with our possessions on the Pacific slope, nearest of all the great nations to the empire from which you come, we hail your appearance at this Capitol as the augury of closer commercial and international intercourse.

Wishing you as cordial a greeting wherever you may go, on the Thames and the Seine, the Danube and the Rhine, the Baltic and the Adriatic, I give you again an earnest and a heartfelt welcome.

Mr. BURLINGAME said: Mr. Speaker, in behalf of my associates and myself, I thank you for this warm and unusual reception. It transcends all personal compliment. It is the greeting of one great people by another. It is the Occident and the Orient for the first time in that electric contact whose touch makes the whole world kin. It is the meeting of two civilizations which have hitherto revolved in separate spheres, and it is a mighty revolution. Let us hope, sir, that it will go on without those convulsions which are too apt to mark great changes in human affairs. Let us hope, sir, that it will be achieved without the shedding of one drop of human blood. We are for peace. We come not with beat of drum, nor martial tread, though representing the latent power of eighty million fighting men. We are heralds of good will. We seek for China that equality without which nations and men are degraded. We seek not only the good of China, but we seek your good and the good of all mankind. We do this in no sentimental sense. We would be practical as the toiling millions whom we represent. We invite you to a broader trade; we invite you to a more intimate examination of the structure of Chinese civilization; we invite you to a better appreciation of the manners of that people, their temperance, their patience, their habits of scholarship, their competitive examinations, their high culture of tea and silk; and we shall ask for them from you modern science, which has taken its great development within the memory of man and the holy doctrines of our Christian faith. It is for the West to say what our reception shall be. It is for the West to say whether or not it was sincere when it continued a long time to invite China to more intimate relations with it. It is for the West to say whether it is for a fair and open policy, or one founded upon that assumption of superiority, which is not justified by physical ability nor moral elevation.

The people of the United States have responded through their executive head and through this House and through the press with a unanimity and nobility of sentiment which makes me proud of the civilization in which I was reared, and glad to see it passed in review by the scholars and statesmen of China.

I trust, sir, that the American people will abide by this sentiment; and I hope that it is but an earnest of that spirit which will meet us on the shores of the distant sea and the banks of the beautiful rivers you have named.

Thanking the House for this reception, and you, sir, for the felicitous and able manner in which you have expressed its welcome, we await such further action as the proprieties of the occasion may require. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The Committee of the House of Representatives will now introduce to the embassy the members of the House individually.

[A recess was taken informally for that purpose.]

At half past eleven o'clock a. m. the House was again called to order.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the Journal of yesterday, but before concluding,

Mr. FARNSWORTH moved that the further reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to by unanimous consent.

DIVISION OF TEXAS.

Mr. BEAMAN, from the Committee on Reconstruction, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1203) to erect two additional States out of the territory of the State of Texas; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

Mr. BEAMAN. There is a rough sketch or map, which is part of the bill, which I suppose will be printed with the bill.

The SPEAKER. By the law all maps which it is desired to publish must be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The map was accordingly referred to the Committee on Printing.

GOVERNMENTS OF SOUTHERN STATES.

Mr. PAINE, from the Committee on Reconstruction, reported back, with a substitute, House bill No. 1194, to provide for the inauguration of State officers in Arkansas, North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, and Alabama, and for the meeting of the Legislatures of said States.

The question was upon agreeing to the substitute, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That the Legislature of each of the States of Arkansas, North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, and Alabama, elected under the constitution thereof, framed and adopted in pursuance of the provisions of an act entitled "An act for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867, and the acts supplementary thereto, be, and hereby is, authorized to meet on such day as may have been fixed, either in such constitution or by the proclamation of any officer authorized to convene said Legislature by the convention which framed such constitution; and if no day shall have been fixed as aforesaid, or if the day so fixed for the meeting of the Legislature of either of said States shall have passed, or shall have so nearly arrived, before the passage of this act, that, in the opinion of the Governor-elect, there shall not be time for the Legislature to assemble on the day so fixed, such Legislature may be convened within thirty days after the passage of this act by the Governor-elect of said State.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That whenever either of said States shall be admitted to representation in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of such State, duly elected and qualified under the constitution thereof, may be inaugurated without delay, and the government of such States shall thereupon be transferred to the civil authorities thereof.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of all civil and military officers exercising authority in either of said States to afford all practicable aid and protection to the officers of such State in carrying out the provisions of this act; and any such officer who shall willfully withhold such aid and protection, or shall willfully prevent, hinder, or delay the meeting of either of said Legislatures, or the inauguration of any of said State officers, or any other civil or military officer under either of said State constitutions, shall be guilty of a felony, and upon conviction thereof before any Federal or State court of criminal jurisdiction, shall be punished by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or both, at the discretion of the court.

The substitute was agreed to.

The question was upon ordering the bill, as amended, to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. PAINE. I call the previous question on the bill.

Mr. BROOKS. I do not expect to be permitted to enter into any discussion of this bill. I rise to say all that I suppose we on this side of the House will be permitted to say, that we are opposed to this whole series of measures, and particularly to this bill as one of them.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. BROOKS. Upon that I call the yeas and nays.

Mr. PAINE. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. PAINE. I desire to say but a word or two in explanation of this bill. The object is to provide for two things: first, that the Legislatures of the States named in the bill may be convened immediately at the time fixed by the constitutions of the States, or by officers authorized to convene them by the conventions that framed said constitutions; or, if no day shall have been fixed by the constitutions or by any such officers, then at a time to be fixed by the Governors-elect of said States. And the other provision is to authorize the inauguration of the executive and judicial officers of the State after the State shall have been admitted to representation and the transfer of the State governments to the civil authorities. I now ask for a vote.

The question was upon the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. On this question the yeas and nays have been demanded by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks.]

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 113, nays 32, not voting 44; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Beatty, Benjamin, Benton, Blaine, Blair, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Butler, Calkins, Churchill, Reader W. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Wood, and Woodbridge—44.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. PAINE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ROCK ISLAND BRIDGE.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a communication from the chief of ordnance, recommending an appropriation of $100,000 for a bridge to connect Rock Island arsenal with the city of Rock Island, Illinois; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

COLONEL MULLIGAN, OF ILLINOIS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, relative to the late Colonel Mulligan, of Illinois; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

BERGEN HEIGHTS ARSENAL.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting certain papers relative to the Bergen Heights arsenal property in New Jersey, recommending its sale as no longer needed by the Government; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS IN MISSOURI.

Mr. PILE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1204) to confirm certain private land claims in the State of Missouri; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

AMANDA HOPPER.

Mr. HARDING submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to;

Resolved, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions be instructed to report to this House upon the expediency of granting a pension to Amanda Hopper, whose husband, a soldier on parole, was killed, as she represents, by collision of a railway train.

OTIS HULL.

Mr. HARDING, also, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions be instructed to report to this House on the expediency of granting a pension to Otis Hull, an invalid soldier.

ISABELLA C. HOFFMAN.

Mr. HARDING, also, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions be instructed to report to this House on the expediency of granting a pension to Isabella C. Hoffman, widow of a deceased soldier, and report by bill or otherwise.

[At this point business was momentarily suspended while the Chinese embassy retired from the Hall.]

REFERENCE OF BILLS.

Mr. UPSON. I move to reconsider the various votes by which bills have been referred this morning to committees; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NAVAJO INDIANS.

Mr. BUTLER, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported back Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 733) for the relief of the Navajo Indians at the Bosque Redondo, and to establish them on a reservation.

Mr. BUTLER. The Committee on Appropriations recommend non-concurrence in the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that they be reported.

The SPEAKER. They are as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert as follows:

That the commission heretofore authorized and created under the act of July 20, 1867, "To establish peace with certain hostile Indian tribes," is hereby authorized, if on examination it be thought advisable, to conclude a treaty with the Navajo Indians now at the Bosque Redondo, in the Territory of New Mexico, providing for the removal of said Indians to their former home in the northern part of said Territory, or to such other lands in the Indian territory west of the State of Arkansas as may be thought best suited to their present condition and future prosperity; and for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act, and to subsidize the Indians during the period of removal, there is hereby appropriated the sum of $150,000, to be expended, if found necessary, by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, under the direction and supervision of said commissioners.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the sum of $75,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended in accordance with the preceding section, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated for the purpose of enabling said commission to conclude a peace with the Sioux Indians of the Powder river, the northern Cheyennes, and other Indians recently hostile in the western part of Dakota, now being assembled at Fort Laramie, and also meet the Shoshones, Snakes, Bannocks, and other Indians, on or near the line of the Union Pacific railroad.

Amend the title by adding "and for other purposes."

Mr. BUTLER. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to report non-concurrence, and that the House take no further action concerning this bill. In the first place, we have already, in the general Indian bill, while this was pending before the two branches, passed an appropriation of $100,000 for the purpose of carrying on this reservation. I have since learned that most of the Indians have gone off the reservation in any event. Therefore no further appropriation is needed.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman desires to dispose of the bill finally he should move that the amendment of the Senate be laid on the table, which will carry the bill with it.

Mr. BUTLER. I will make that motion, but I yield first to the gentleman from New Mexico.

Mr. CLEVER. The Indian Bureau has estimated something over three hundred thousand dollars for the support of these Indians. It is true an appropriation of $100,000 has been given to feed the Indians. There are between seven and eight thousand Indians on the Bosque Redondo reservation, and if Congress fails to make this appropriation the officers of the Government will be compelled to go into debt. I see no reason why Congress should now refuse to provide the Indian Bureau with means to carry on the reservation. One hundred thousand dollars are not sufficient to feed those Indians. The amount appropriated during the last Congress was exhausted, I believe, on the 1st day of February last, and the Indian Bureau is now feeding those Indians without having any appropriation whatever. If this does not pass, the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona will soon be desolated by these Indians, for they will then be compelled to leave the reservation; and, as they have hitherto done, they will live by plundering and murdering the whites in those two Territories.

I hope this will be recommended to the Committee on Appropriations for the further consideration of this matter. I say the Government will gain nothing by voting down this bill. I hope the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts may be laid upon the table, and the committee directed to further inquire into the subject.

Mr. ROSS. I would like to have the bill read, so as to know which way I am to vote.

Mr. BUTLER. I think I can state the matter better than the provisions of the bill. In December last the Secretary of the Interior asked us to make an appropriation of $150,000 to feed the Navajo Indians during the fiscal year ending on the 30th of June, 1868. The Committee on Appropriations offered a bill appropriating $100,000, which was passed. It went to the Senate, and that body struck out all after the enacting clause and inserted two propositions, one to appropriate $75,000, if I remember right, for the purpose of establishing the Navajo Indians on the Bosque Redondo reservation, and another to appropriate the sum of $75,000 for making a treaty with the Sioux and Cheyennes, leaving nothing of the original bill. In the mean time the Committee on Appropriations, in the general appropriation bill, appropriated $100,000 for the support of the Navajo Indians. That passed the House, and is now before the Senate. In the mean time this bill has come back, and, in the judgment of the Committee on Appropriations, there is no further occasion for the amount appropriated in this bill, because we have already appropriated $100,000. Since this bill was returned to the House with the amendment of the Senate we have learned, first, that the Navajo Indians have largely left the Round Road reservation. Whether that be so or not would make no difference, because our report was independent of that fact. We have appropriated all we think that tribe ought to have.

Mr. ROSS. If the gentleman will permit me to make a suggestion, I understand the Senate amendment to propose to return the Navajo Indians to their own country, and makes an appropriation for that purpose. If that is so, I am very much in favor of the amendment of the Senate. I do not think the Navajos should ever have been brought from their own country and put on this reservation. They have caused great expense to the Government while they have been there, and if the amendment of the Senate proposes to let these Indians go back to their own country, it will be better for them and will be a great saving to the Government.

Mr. BUTLER. I agree fully with the gentleman. They never should have been brought to the Round Road reservation. But we have appropriated $100,000 to be disposed of as the Indian commission and the Indian Bureau see fit, and we do not want to appropriate $75,000 in addition.

Mr. ROSS. It is costing us about one hundred thousand dollars a month to keep these Indians on this reservation. Now, if we can get them removed to their own country for $75,000, or even $150,000, it will be a great saving to the Government. And I know this is desired by the Indians. I had a conference with their chief some three years ago, in company with others, and they begged of us to say to the President of the United States and to Congress that they were desirous of going back to their own country, where they would support themselves in peace and quiet without being any charge to the national Government. In my judgment that is the best thing that can be done. It would save $100,000 a month which is now paid for keeping them on this reservation.

Mr. BUTLER. I agree with the gentleman in all he has said; but that is not involved in this question. One hundred thousand dollars is already appropriated for these Indians.

Mr. ROSS. Do I understand this appropriation is to return them to their own country?

Mr. BUTLER. Not unless the Indian commission think it best. If they do think it best they will use the $100,000 for that purpose. I now resume the motion to lay the Senate amendment on the table, which will carry the bill with it.

The amendment of the Senate was laid on the table.

REGISTERS' AND RECEIVERS' COMPENSATION.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has now commenced. The first business in order is the consideration of the bill reported from the Committee on the Public Lands by the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. ASHLEY] on the 4th instant, which was pending at the expiration of the morning hour on that day, being the bill (H. R. No. 652) to increase the compensation of registers and receivers in the Territory of Idaho. The previous question has been demanded, and the pending question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOFIELD,] to lay the bill on the table.

The bill was read. It provides that the annual salary of registers and receivers in the Territory of Idaho be, and the same is hereby, increased to the sum of $3,000.

The committee reported a substitute for the bill which provides that the annual salary of the registers and receivers of the United States land office shall be increased to the sum of $1,000. This increase to take effect on the 1st of July next, and to continue for two years and no longer, provided such increased salary, together with fees and commissions now authorized by law, shall not exceed the annual sum of $3,000 to each officer.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope there will be some explanation of the necessity of increasing these salaries.

The SPEAKER. The bill was discussed at some length on Thursday last, and at the close of the debate the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. ASHLEY] demanded the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Is there not a motion to lay the bill upon the table pending?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] moved that the bill and substitute be laid upon the table.

Mr. FLANDERS. I hope that motion will not prevail.

The SPEAKER. There are two undebatable motions pending, and no debate is in order.

Mr. FLANDERS. I ask unanimous consent to make a statement.

No objection was made.

Mr. FLANDERS. I send to the Clerk's desk, and wish to have read, an extract from a letter from the receiver in the Olympia land district, Washington Territory.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I have no objection if the subject will be open to full debate and I can be allowed to answer the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must ask unanimous consent for every gentleman, as there are two undebatable propositions pending.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If I can have a chance to reply, I will not object.

Mr. ALLISON. I object to debate.

Mr. FLANDERS. Unanimous consent was given to me to say a few words, I believe.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has leave to proceed.

Mr. FLANDERS. I now send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read the extract which I have marked from the letter of Mr. Cushman, the receiver, at Olympia.

The Clerk read as follows:

"The entire compensation, fees, commissions, and salary, for myself and Marsh, the register, was only $927 each in currency. Shameful! I gave $90,000 bonds as revenue disbursing agent and United States designated depository. My salary ought to be $3,000 per annum, at least. I run the risk of the errors in court, and counterfeit moneys, and safe keeping of all Government funds in my hands, and my pay is not only entirely inadequate for a living, but is and ever has been a great wrong to me as a revenue officer of the Government. I have had frequently over eighty thousand dollars in my hands as depository for a considerable length of time, and have to run some risk personally, for if robbers should present loaded pistols at my head demanding of me to open the safe without noise, why these $927 per annum in currency will not pay for these liabilities."

Mr. FLANDERS. If gentlemen have given attention to the reading of that letter they will see the propriety of increasing the pay of this officer, Mr. Cushman, who is the receiver at the land office in the Olympia district, Washington Territory, as the Committee on Public Lands propose. This officer was required to give $90,000 bonds for the faithful performance of his duties, and, as he states in his letter, he sometimes has as much as $80,000 of Government funds in his custody. The building he occupies is a temporary wooden structure, and as a consequence he never feels quite safe when he is away from the building. He has to be there day and night, and there is not a more faithful and efficient officer in the employ of the Government anywhere. It was stated the other day when this bill was before the House that the registers and receivers in the land offices all became wealthy. How it may be in other parts of the country I do not pretend to know, but I do know that such is not the case in Washington Territory, where we have two land offices, and in each office a register and receiver who have held the offices for the last six or eight years.

Mr. ROSS. I would ask the gentleman if there is anything in the law that would prevent his friend from relieving himself by resigning the office?

Mr. FLANDERS. I know of nothing in the law which could compel this gentleman to continue to hold the office; but the same question may with equal propriety be asked with reference to every person who holds office under the Government and whose pay is inadequate.

Mr. MULLINS. I would ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Ross] whether he will not extend the twenty per cent. to these officers as well as to others?

Mr. ROSS. I did not vote for the twenty per cent. The gentleman need not charge that on me.

Mr. FLANDERS. It must be evident that the pay of these registers and receivers is wholly inadequate when all put together it amounts to less than $1,000 in currency. In Washington Territory everything that is bought must be paid for in coin. Reducing the salary of this officer to coin it amounts to less than $700 per annum, an altogether insufficient compensation in view of the fact that he gives bond to the amount of $90,000 for the faithful performance of his duty, and that he often has in his custody as much as $80,000 of Government funds.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. How much more time is the gentleman from Washington Territory [Mr. FLANDERS] entitled to?

The SPEAKER. As the gentleman from Illinois objects to the gentleman from Washington Territory continuing his remarks, the Chair is obliged to rule that the time allowed to the gentleman by unanimous consent has expired. He asked leave to make a brief statement embraced in a letter.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a word on this subject.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to make a statement.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I object; and I do so that the whole morning hour may not be frittered away in this debate.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If we can defeat this principle of increasing salaries the morning hour could not be frittered away in a better cause.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. We can defeat the principle by voting.

Mr. FLANDERS. I ask consent to make a brief additional statement.

Mr. PILE. I object.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. SCOTFIELD, there were—ayes 58, noes 25; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER, under the rule, ordered tellers: and appointed Mr. ASHLEY, of Nevada, and Mr. SCOTFIELD.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 60, noes 36.

So the bill was laid on the table.

Mr. SCOTFIELD moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER announced as the next business in order, during the morning hour, reports from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

MAILS AND MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. FARNSWORTH, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported back adversely a joint resolution (H. R. No. 242) relating to mails and mail service; which was laid on the table.

DISTRIBUTION OF REVENUE STAMPS.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I am directed by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to move that they be discharged from the further consideration of a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Iowa in reference to making postmasters agents for the distribution of revenue stamps, and that the same be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE OVER THE MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. FARNSWORTH, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported back adversely a bill (H. R. No. 966) to authorize the construction of a bridge over the Mississippi river in Madison county, State of Illinois; which was laid on the table.

AMENDMENT OF POSTAL LAWS.

Mr. FARNSWORTH, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1205) to further amend the postal laws; which was read a first and second time.

The bill provides in the first section that when any writer of a letter on which the postage is prepaid shall indorse in writing or in print upon the outside thereof his name and address, the same, after remaining uncalled for at the post office to which it is directed thirty days, or the time the writer may direct, shall be returned to the writer without additional postage, whether a specific request for such return be indorsed on the letter or not.

The second section provides that no money order shall be issued for less than one dollar, nor more than fifty dollars; and all persons who receive money orders shall be required to pay therefor the following charges or fees, namely: for one dollar, or any sum not exceeding twenty dollars, a fee of ten cents shall be charged and exacted by the postmaster giving said order; for all orders exceeding twenty dollars, and not exceeding thirty dollars, the charge shall be fifteen cents; for all orders exceeding thirty, and not exceeding forty dollars, the charge shall be twenty cents; and for all orders exceeding forty dollars, and not exceeding fifty dollars, the fee shall be twenty-five cents.

The third section provides that section thirty-five of the act of March 3, 1863, shall be so construed as to permit weekly newspapers, when sent to regular subscribers, to be delivered free of postage, when deposited at the office nearest the office of publication; but nothing in this act shall be so construed as to require carriers to distribute said papers unless postage is paid upon them.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The House will observe that this is a bill amending the postal laws. The first section provides for the return of unclaimed letters whenever the names and addresses of the writers are indorsed upon them. The second section is in relation to money orders. As the law now stands no money order can be issued for a greater sum than thirty dollars. We propose to enlarge the amount for which the order may be given up to fifty dollars, and changing the charges or fees. The provision of the present law is as follows:

"No money order shall be issued for any sum less than one or more than thirty dollars; and all persons who receive money orders shall be required to pay therefor the following charges or fees, namely: for an order for one dollar or for any larger sum, but not exceeding ten dollars, a fee of ten cents shall be charged and exacted by the postmaster giving such order; for an order of more than ten and not exceeding twenty dollars the charge shall be fifteen cents; and for every order exceeding twenty dollars, a fee of twenty cents shall be charged."

We propose to change the law so that orders may be issued for fifty dollars; and also change the fees, so that they may be a little less than they are now.

The third section provides for the delivery of weekly newspapers free of postage. It is simply construing the present statute as Congress intended it should be construed.

Mr. RAUM. I think the gentleman will find, if he will send for the law, that money orders for fifty dollars may now be issued.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. It is done every day.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Very well; if that is so, and we reenact the law, it will do no harm, and we change the fees.

Mr. RAUM. If the amount should be increased it should be extended to seventy-five dollars.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Fifty dollars is large enough.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. That is the amount now.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I think the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I know from my experience of day before yesterday.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FARNSWORTH moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ILLINOIS AND ST. LOUIS BRIDGE.

Mr. FARNSWORTH, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported back, with a substitute, House bill No. 631, amendatory of an act approved July 26, 1866, entitled "An act to authorize the construction of certain bridges, and to establish them as post routes."

The question was upon agreeing to the substitute, which was read, as follows:

Whereas the St. Louis and Illinois Bridge Company, organized under the laws of the State of Missouri, and the Illinois and St. Louis Bridge Company, organized under the act of the General Assembly of the State of Illinois, have been consolidated in pursuance of the authority granted to the said Illinois and St. Louis Bridge Company in their act of incorporation, and the authority granted to the St. Louis Bridge Company by the act of the General Assembly of the State of Missouri, approved March 19, 1868: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the company formed by this consolidation under the name and style of the Illinois and St. Louis Bridge Company, is hereby recognized and declared to be a corporation by that name, with full power and authority to construct a bridge across the Mississippi river, opposite the city of St. Louis, in conformity to the act of which this act is amendatory, with all the rights, privileges, and powers granted and conferred by the several acts of the General Assemblies of the States of Illinois and Missouri to the respective companies by the consolidation of which the said Illinois and St. Louis Bridge Company was formed, and not inconsistent with the provisions of the act to which this act is amendatory: Provided, That in constructing said bridge there shall be one span of at least five hundred feet clear between piers.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said corporation may execute a mortgage and issue bonds payable, principal and interest, in gold, and their bridge across the Mississippi river and approaches thereto, when constructed, shall be a post road to carry the mails of the United States and enjoy the rights and privileges of other post roads.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That said corporation may hold their meetings in either the State of Illinois or the State of Missouri, as the board of directors may elect, and the directors may be citizens of any of the United States, and said corporation may sue and be sued in any circuit court of the United States: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to deprive the Legislatures of the States of Illinois and Missouri of the right to regulate the tolls and fares which may be charged by said company for the use of such bridge.

Mr. PRICE. I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Very well.

Mr. PRICE. I ask the gentleman whether he considers a span of five hundred feet is practicable? Has the experiment ever been tried? In my judgment such a span cannot be built with safety, and I think the experiment has never been tried in this country.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I am not a bridge builder myself, but the company in their plan propose a span of five hundred feet. The men engaged in commerce on the river do not object.

Mr. PILE. The chief engineer of this company is Captain Edes, one of the best engineers in the United States, and known in connection with the Navy Department, and as the constructor of the best class of iron-clads on the western waters. The proposition to build a span of five hundred feet comes from the company itself. It proposes to build a span of five hundred feet in length; and it proposes to build not only the finest bridge on this continent, but the finest bridge in the world, connected with a tunnel running under the city of St. Louis to the depot of the Pacific railroad in the southwest part of the city. This act merely confirms the consolidation of the bridge companies incorporated under the laws of Illinois and Missouri. I hope there will be no objection to it.

Mr. ALLISON. If I understand the bill it virtually incorporates this company. We have no authority to do that without the consent of the States. It provides that this company shall be incorporated. I want to have this explained.

Mr. PILE. I will state the facts. In 1864 the Legislature of Missouri incorporated the St. Louis and Illinois Bridge Company, which company was confirmed with all of its powers by the Legislature of Illinois. In 1866 the Legislature of Illinois incorporated another company called the Illinois and St. Louis Bridge Company. It was organized under the general law. A rivalry of interests sprung up between the two companies. Two bridges were proposed to be built. The people of St. Louis and Illinois deemed this rivalry fatal. It led to a loss of credit. The two companies have therefore been consolidated. The board of directors of each company have gone out and a new board has been elected, composed of parts of the boards of the two companies. They form a consolidated company known as the Illinois and St. Louis Bridge Company. Now, this bill is simply for the purpose of aiding this company in the money market. It declares that the consolidated company in pursuance of specific authority granted to the Illinois and St. Louis Bridge Company—

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I must decline to yield further. I suppose nobody doubts that we have a right to incorporate this company. We have incorporated the Pacific Railroad Company and a great many companies between States and Territories.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Too many.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Too many, my colleague says. Now, sir, this is not an original act of incorporation. I believe there is no objection to the bridge on the part of the river or railroad men or any other men. I never heard of any. I therefore demand the previous question.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the gentleman to answer my question. I want to know, in the first place, whether or not this bill incorporates this company. If it does, we ought to have a reservation with reference to the rate of tolls and tariffs that can be charged.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. There is a reservation. This bill does not incorporate the company. It adopts a company already incorporated by the States of Illinois and Missouri, and provides that the Legislatures of these States shall regulate the tolls and tariffs.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I ask my colleague why not do it here. It never should be done by those States.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I think the States of Illinois and Missouri, whose people are more interested in this matter than the people of other portions of the country, will be more likely to establish reasonable tolls than Congress.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. What objection to putting on a limit here?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Because the Legislatures of those States have already put on a limit that they shall not charge exceeding the rate now charged by the ferries. And I think it is better we should leave this power in the Legislatures of those two States, whose people are more interested than we are to regulate this toll. For my own part I have no objection to Congress doing it, but I think the State Legislatures will do it more for the benefit of the people than Congress will.

Mr. PAINE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. For a question.

Mr. PAINE. It is doubtless true that the people of these two States are more interested than any other people in the United States in this matter, but it may be that their interest will be adverse to that of the people of the other States. For have we not seen on other lines of communication, as for example Maryland, that the people most interested have made use of the privilege they enjoy to benefit themselves at the expense of the citizens of other States? Now, may it not be true that the people of these States will so regulate the toll as to benefit themselves at the expense of other States?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Does the gentleman suppose the Legislatures of Illinois and Missouri will impose higher rates upon the citizens of Wisconsin for crossing this bridge than upon their own citizens?

Mr. PAINE. It may be not; but it will be very easy for those Legislatures to make such arrangements on this subject as to secure for themselves the benefit at the expense of the people of other States.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It is for the judgment of the House. If the members of the House think Congress will be more likely to impose proper duties than the Legislatures of the States whose people are more particularly interested in the matter, I am willing to make that amendment. But I think Congress will not agree to it.

Mr. PAINE. I suppose it will be for the interest of the people to do so.

Mr. COOK. Does my colleague believe that Legislatures of different States can by joint legislation regulate this toll? that by concert and confederation between two States they can accomplish something that cannot be done by each State independently?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I do not apprehend that there is any more difficulty in that than there was in these States by acts of their Legislatures incorporating this company and doing just what they have already done, fixing the rates of tolls to be charged.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. What is the objection to providing that the rates shall not be increased?

Mr. COOK. I would ask my colleague [Mr. FARNSWORTH] if the courts have ever sustained a corporation made by the conjoint legislation of two States? Have the courts ever sustained a consolidation of corporations in different States made by the conjoint legislation of those States?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Does my colleague remember a case where the courts refused to sustain such an incorporation?

Mr. COOK. I remember a case where the courts decided that a mortgage against a railroad corporation so consolidated could not be enforced.

Mr. EGGLESTON. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads whether the provisions of this bill extend to other corporations than to the Bridge Company at St. Louis?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. None of them.

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to ask the gentleman from Illinois whether this bill does not impose as much restriction on this Bridge Company as has been imposed on those companies that have bridged the Mississippi river at a point above St. Louis?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Yes; and even still more.

Mr. BLAINE. Well, I think we ought not to ask more than that.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I will now yield to my colleague from the Alton district, [Mr. BAKER,] who desires to offer an amendment.

Mr. BAKER. I move to amend the proviso to the third section so as to make it read as follows:

Provided, That nothing in this act or in any previous legislation affecting the premises shall be so construed as to deprive the Legislatures of the States of Illinois and Missouri of their right to regulate the tolls and fares which may be charged by said company for the use of such bridge.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I have no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I desire to offer an amendment providing that the Legislatures shall not increase the tolls hereafter.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I will allow the gentleman to offer that amendment.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I offer, then, the following amendment:

Provided, That the tolls now fixed by the Legislatures of Illinois and Missouri shall not be increased.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPALDING. I desire to ask a question of the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. I want to know if this five hundred feet span is intended as a precedent, as a pattern for all bridges on the Ohio and Mississippi rivers?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It is only intended for this bridge.

Mr. SPALDING. I would ask the gentleman if he has not a bill to report which makes this the general rule for bridges over the Ohio river?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The committee have considered the question in regard to the Ohio river.

Mr. SPALDING. And they will report a bill of that sort?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It has been acted on by the committee, and I am instructed to report such a bill for the Ohio river.

Mr. SPALDING. Exactly!

Mr. FARNSWORTH. But I will state to the gentleman from Ohio that the company who are to build this bridge propose to make it of five hundred feet span. Does the gentleman object to that?

Mr. SPALDING. I do not; but I wanted to know if this was to be a precedent for what is to come after.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FARNSWORTH moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE OVER THE MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. PILE. I ask the gentleman to withdraw and have referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads the bill (H. R. No. 966) to authorize the construction of a bridge over the Mississippi river, in Madison county, State of Illinois.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I have no objection; the bill was laid upon the table at the request of the committee; I ask that it be taken up and referred.

No objection was made.

LAND TITLES.

Mr. JOHNSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1206) to restore to certain parties their rights under the laws and treaties of the United States; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TELEGRAPH LINES.

Mr. FARNSWORTH, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported back, with a substitute, House bill No. 846, supplemental to an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of telegraph lines, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," passed July 24, 1866; which substitute was ordered to be printed, and, with the original bill, recommended to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

NEW ORLEANS AND MOBILE RAILROAD.

Mr. FARNSWORTH, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported back, with an amendment, House bill No. 937, to authorize the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from New Orleans, in the State of Louisiana, to Mobile, in the State of Alabama, and to secure to the Government the use of the same as a military and post road, and for other purposes.

The bill was read at length. The first section provides that James A. Raynor, William S. Williams, Sidney Dillon, Franklin Haven, John B. Alley, William B. Duncan, Cornelius K. Garrison, Peter Butler, and John J. Howell, and all persons who shall or may be hereafter associated with them and their successors and assigns, are hereby created and erected into a body corporate and politic, in deed and by law, by the name, style, and title of The New Orleans and Mobile Railroad Company, and by that name shall have perpetual succession, and shall be able to sue and be sued in all courts of record, of law and equity within the United States, and may have a common seal, and exercise and enjoy within the United States of America the rights, powers, and privileges pertaining to corporate bodies, and necessary for the fulfillment of the objects and purposes of this act; and said corporation is hereby authorized and empowered to lay out, construct, maintain, use, and enjoy, by running thereon its engines and cars, a continuous railroad, with one or more tracks, with the necessary appurtenances, and with extensions and branches as herein provided, and also to construct, maintain, and use a telegraph line from the foot of Saint Joseph street, in the city of New Orleans, in the State of Louisiana, to the foot of Hunt street, in the city of Mobile, in the State of Alabama.

The second section provides that the capital stock of the corporation shall consist of fifty thousand shares, of one hundred dollars each, which shall be subscribed for, and held or transferred in such manner as shall be provided for in the by-laws hereafter established by said corporation. The corporate powers of said corporation shall be exercised, and its business shall be conducted and managed by nine directors, to be appointed or elected by the stockholders of said corporation, as provided in its by-laws; provided, however, that the persons heretofore named as corporators shall be the directors for the first year, and until others are appointed or elected to fill their places. The said directors shall, as soon as practicable after the passage of this act, elect from their own number a president and vice president, who shall hold their respective offices for one year, and until their successors shall be elected. They shall also appoint a secretary and treasurer, and other necessary officers and agents for said corporation, who shall hold their respective offices during the pleasure of said directors. They shall also make and establish proper and sufficient by-laws for the future conduct and government of said corporation, its business and its directors, officers, and agents. They are also authorized and empowered to sell or obtain subscriptions for the capital stock in the name of the corporation, and to demand payment for and enforce the collection of all subscriptions to or sales of said capital stock, at such times and places, and in such proportions as they shall deem necessary for the construction of the said railroad and telegraph as herein provided. A majority of said directors shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of the business of said corporation.

The third section provides that the right of way through the public lands of the United States, except such lands as are occupied by the United States for naval, military, or other purposes, be, and the same is hereby, granted to said corporation for the construction of said railroad and telegraph line, and the right, power, and authority is hereby given to said corporation to take from the public lands adjacent to the line of said railroad, earth, stone, timber, and other materials for the construction thereof; said right of way is granted to the extent of one hundred feet in width on each side of said railroad, where it may pass over the public lands, including all necessary grounds for stations and structures connected therewith. The said corporation is also authorized and empowered to enter upon, purchase, take, and hold any lands or premises, except such public lands as are hereinbefore excepted, that may be necessary and proper for the construction and working of said railroad, not exceeding one hundred feet on each side of its centre line, and also any lands or premises that may be necessary and proper for stations and structures connected therewith, required for the construction, maintenance, and operating of said railroad. And in case the said corporation and the owner or claimant of such lands or premises cannot agree as to the proper compensation and damages to be paid to the said owner or claimant by said corporation, then and in such case the amount shall be ascertained and determined by and through commissioners and proceeding in court, in the same form and manner as like damages are determined in regard to lands thus taken by the Union Pacific Railroad Company, pursuant to and as provided in section three of the act of Congress approved July 2, 1864, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes,'" approved July 1, 1862, the provisions of said section three of said act, so far as the same can be made applicable to this corporation, being reenacted and made a part of this act.

The fourth section provides that the railroad of the New Orleans and Mobile Railroad Company, and any part thereof, shall be a post route and a military road, subject to the use of the United States for postal, military, naval, and all other Government service, upon such terms and subject to such regulations as Congress may impose in regard to the compensation which shall be paid to said corporation for such Government service; and said corporation is hereby authorized and empowered to accept to its own use any grant, donation, loan, power, franchise, real or personal estate, or any aid or assistance which may be granted to or conferred upon said corporation by the Congress of the United States, by the Legislature of any State, or by any county, parish, city, town, or corporation of any State, or by any corporation, person, or persons; and said corporation is authorized to hold and enjoy the same, and to increase its capital stock for such purpose, provided that a majority of the directors and stockholders of the said corporation shall assent thereto. And said corporation is also authorized and empowered, from time to time, to borrow or to negotiate and obtain loans of money, or to purchase property upon its own credit, for the purposes of constructing and maintaining its said railroad, and to issue and sell its corporate bonds or promissory notes for any such loans or indebtedness, or to procure money for the use of said corporation, bearing interest at a rate not to exceed eight per cent. per annum, and payable at such time and place and in such currency as may be therein named; and to secure the payment of the same the said corporation may sell, transfer, or mortgage its said railroad and telegraph line, its franchises, its capital stock, and any of its real and personal property, or any part or portion of the same; and if any of the stock, bonds, or notes of said corporation are negotiated and sold by authority of its directors below its or their par value, such sale shall be in all respects valid and binding as against said corporation to the full amount or par value of such stocks, bonds, or notes sold.

The fifth section provides that the New Orleans and Mobile Railroad Company, instead of constructing each and every portion of said railroad, is hereby authorized and empowered to purchase or lease from any State, corporation, person, or persons owning the same, any railroad that may have been constructed, and which can be used as a part of said railroad, together with any appurtenances and rights, privileges, and franchises thereunto belonging; and said corporation, in case of any such purchase or lease, is authorized to connect and use the same with the portions of railroad constructed pursuant to this act; and the said corporation is hereby authorized and empowered to take, carry, and convey persons and property, by the power of steam, upon said railroad so constructed, purchased, or leased, and to receive therefor such tolls and charges as shall be established by its directors; excepting, however, such charges for Government service as may be regulated by Congress, as hereinbefore provided.

The sixth section provides that in the construction of said railroad across or upon any street, highway, water-course, or river, which said railroad may intersect or touch, the said corporation shall preserve the same, so as not to unnecessarily impair its usefulness to the public; and said corporation is hereby authorized and empowered to construct and maintain bridges over and across the navigable waters of the United States, on the route of said railroad, between New Orleans and Mobile, for the use of said corporation, and the passage of its engines, cars, and trains of cars, passengers, mails, and merchandise thereon; and said railroad and its bridges aforesaid, when constructed, completed, and in use, in accordance with this act, shall be deemed and recognized and known as lawful structures and a post road, and are hereby declared as such; provided, however, that the said corporation in the construction of its bridges over and across the waters known as the East Pascagoula river, the bay of Biloxi, the bay of Saint Louis, and the Great Rigolet, shall construct and maintain draw-bridges in the channels thereof, which, when open, shall give a clear space for the passage of vessels of not less than eighty feet in the channels of the East Pascagoula river, of the bay of Biloxi, and of the bay of Saint Louis, and of not less than one hundred feet in the channel of the Great Rigolet; and shall at all times open said draw-bridges, and shall provide reasonable and necessary facilities for the passage of all vessels requiring the same, except during and for ten minutes prior to and after the time of the passage of its mail and passenger trains.

The seventh section provides that the better to accomplish the object of this act, namely, to promote the public interest and welfare by the construction of said railroad and telegraph line, and keeping the same in working order, and to secure to the Government at all times (but particularly in time of war) the use and benefits of the same for postal, military, and other purposes, Congress may at any time, having due regard for the acquired interests and rights of the New Orleans and Mobile Railroad Company, add to, alter, and amend this act, so as to prevent or remove all material obstructions to the navigation of said rivers growing out of the construction of said bridges.

The amendment was to add to section three the following:

Provided, however, That said commissioners of appraisal may be appointed by any judge of a court of record in the State wherein the land or premises to be taken lie.

The question was upon agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. ROSS. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. ROSS. My point is, first, that it is no part of the duty of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to prepare and report charters for railroads in the several States; secondly, that the Congress of the United States has no power to charter railroads in the different States.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order on the ground that the House, by a direct vote, specially referred this bill to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I will state very briefly the facts in regard to this bill. It is based upon charters from the provisional Legislatures of Louisiana and Alabama, giving all the rights that are secured to this company by this bill. But the parties interested in that road are afraid that those provisional Legislatures will be declared illegal, and thus their charters will fail. They have expended some money to commence the work and they come to Congress and ask that we will aid them by the passage of this bill in order to reassure capitalists, so that they may prosecute this work. That is all there is in this bill; there is no subsidy here of land, money, or anything else. The committee think the right of the Government in reference to the crossing of these bogs and streams along the coast of the Gulf is sufficient to justify this bill. I think the bill in all its details is correct.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. As the morning hour has nearly expired, and as this is a very important bill—still more important in view of what my colleague [Mr. FARNSWORTH] has said in regard to the acts of these provisional Legislatures—I hope he will permit this bill to go over till to-morrow. The provisions of the bill are exceptional in their character. It seems to me that this is a project of a lot of gentlemen in Boston and New York to go down South and get control of railroad matters by the aid of Congress.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I consent that the bill shall go over till to-morrow. I yield the floor to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. HILL.]

AMERICAN LINE OF OCEAN STEAMERS.

Mr. HILL, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported back, with an amendment in the form of a substitute, a bill (H. R. No. 939) to provide for an American line of mail and emigrant passenger steamships between New York and one or more European ports.

The Clerk proceeded to read the substitute, which is as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert the following:

That the Postmaster General is empowered and hereby authorized to contract with the Commercial Navigation Company of the State of New York, a corporation existing under the laws of the State of New York, under a special charter passed by the Legislature of said State under the date of April 23, 1866, for the weekly or semi-weekly conveyance of all European and foreign mails of the United States between New York and Bremen, touching at Southampton, England, or Liverpool, touching at Queens-town, in first class sea-going steamships, to be constructed in the United States and owned by said company, for a term not exceeding twenty years, in the manner and on the conditions hereinafter stated.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said navigation company shall, with a purpose of performing the above service, build, contract, and fit out, within one year from the passage of this act, at least seven first class sea-going steamships, five of which shall not be of less than three thousand tons each, Government measurement, and two others of not less than two thousand tons each, all of which vessels shall be constructed in the best manner, under the supervision and inspection of the American Lloyd's, or, if ordered by the Postmaster General, under the inspection of the most competent engineer, to be detailed for this purpose by the Secretary of the Navy upon a written application of the Postmaster General, so that when completed each vessel shall be of the first class in every respect, and with all known modern improvements in model, machinery, and safety, so as to secure the greatest possible speed and safety; which steamships, when so constructed, shall be organized into and compose the United States mail steamship line, for the proper conveyance of mails and passengers as hereinafter provided; the time of sailing, and all other details, to be arranged and agreed upon between the said company and the Postmaster General, with power to modify such agreements from time to time as may best promote the object in view.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the compensation for carrying and transporting the mails by sea, as herein provided, shall be agreed upon, and shall be in conformity with the act of Congress approved June 14, 1858, and shall in no event or contingency exceed the sum therein provided, being all postage on letters, newspapers, and all other matter transported by or in the mails carried by said navigation company, shall belong to said company, and shall be paid to said navigation company quarterly, or applied to their use or benefit as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That to insure the construction of the above-mentioned vessels within the time and in the manner hereinbefore provided, and the maintenance of the said line, the said Commercial Navigation Company may issue bonds to such an amount that the entire annual interest thereon shall not exceed the sum of $250,000, such bonds to be made payable at the expiration of the before-named twenty years, and the interest thereof to be made payable semi-annually, the principal and interest of such bonds to be made payable in coin of the United States. That for the protection of the holders of such bonds they shall be severally registered at the Post Office Department and certified by the chief clerk of the Department. And the Postmaster General shall receive all moneys for postage earned by the steamships of said company, and shall apply the same as far as needed to the payment of the semi-annual interest upon the before-named bonds, and shall retain the surplus after paying such interest, and shall invest the same quarterly in the securities of the United States to form a sinking fund, to be held solely for the benefit of the bondholders, and to be applied to the payment of the principal of such bonds. And whenever, and as soon as, such sinking fund shall equal in amount the entire principal of said bonds then from that time forward the interest of said bonds shall be paid out of the income of such sinking fund, and the principal thereof out of the same fund at their maturity. And all postage earned after the time when said sinking fund shall belong to and be paid quarterly to the said company by the Postmaster General of the United States.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the aforesaid mail steamships shall be commanded and officered only by citizens of the United States, each mount an armament, if required, of two guns each, and shall have at least one apprentice to be instructed in engineering, seamanship, and navigation for every two hundred tons of registered tonnage for each steamship; and the Government of the United States shall have the power to take and use the aforesaid mail steamships as transports or for ships-of-war whenever in the opinion of the President the exigencies of the United States may require them, who is authorized, in such an event, to take said mail steamers and pay said company a just and equitable sum for their use, or purchase the same, as may be deemed most for the interest of the United States; said payment, whether for purchase or use, to be made to the Postmaster General, who shall pay to said navigation company whatever balance be due them, after deducting sufficient for payment for all the before-named registered bonds, the amount of which in this event shall be paid to the holders thereof at maturity of the same.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the foreign mail agents of the Government of the United States shall have free passage on the ships of the said Commercial Navigation Company, whenever the Postmaster General to such foreign mail agents issues passes certifying to the said company that such is their official character.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the said navigation company shall keep up and maintain for a period of twenty years, for the said United States mail service, at least the said number of seven first class steamships.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the rights and privileges herewith granted shall be and remain to this company, and in no event shall this company transfer or assign the rights and privileges herein granted, nor shall it be lawful for any officer of the Government hereafter to recognize any assignment or transfer, it being the intent and meaning of this act to secure an American line of steam vessels for the transportation of mails and the proper conveyance of emigrant passengers between the port of New York and European ports above named; and Congress may at any time hereafter during the period of twenty years, and having a due regard to the rights of the said company, alter, repeal, or amend this act, and it shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

Before the reading of the substitute had been concluded,

The SPEAKER said: The morning hour has expired, and the bill goes over till to-morrow.

INTERNAL TAX BILL.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and resume the consideration of the internal tax bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 1060) to reduce into one act and to amend the laws relating to internal taxes.

The Clerk read the following section:

SEC. 75. And be it further enacted, That whenever a writ of error shall be issued for the revision of any judgment or decree in any criminal proceeding drawing in question the construction of any statute of the United States, in a court of any State, as is provided in the twenty-fifth section of an act entitled "An act to establish the judicial courts of the United States," passed September 24, 1789, the defendant, if charged with an offense bailable by the laws of such State, shall not be released from custody until a final judgment upon such writ, or until a bond, with sufficient sureties, in a reasonable sum, as ordered and approved by the State court, shall be given; and if the offense is not so bailable, until a final judgment upon the writ of error. Writs of error in criminal cases shall have precedence upon the docket of the Supreme Court of all cases to which the Government of the United States is not a party, excepting only such cases as the court, at their discretion, may decide to be of public importance.

No amendment being offered, the Clerk read the next section, as follows:

SEC. 76. And be it further enacted, That the provisions of the sixteenth section of the act approved August 6, 1846, entitled "An act to provide for the better organization of the Treasury, and for the collection, safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public revenue," are hereby applied to, and shall be construed to include, all officers of the internal revenue charged with the safe-keeping, transfer, or disbursement of the public moneys arising therefrom, and to all other persons having actual charge, custody, or control of moneys or accounts arising from the administration of the internal revenue.

No amendment being offered, the Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 77. And be it further enacted, That after the 1st day of June, 1868, no drawback of internal taxes paid on manufactures shall be allowed on the exportation of any article of domestic manufacture on which there is no internal tax at the time of exportation; nor shall such drawback be allowed in any case unless it shall be proved by sworn evidence in writing, to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, that the tax had been paid, and that such articles of manufacture were, prior to the 1st day of April, 1868, actually purchased or actually manufactured and contracted for, to be delivered for such exportation; and no claim for such drawback, or for any drawback of internal tax on exportations made prior to the 31st day of March, 1868, shall be paid unless presented to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue before the 1st day of October, 1868. And in no case shall any drawback of internal taxes be allowed on any article exported after the 1st day of January, 1869; and no claim for any drawback of internal taxes on exportations made from the 31st day of March, 1868, to the 1st day of January, 1869, shall be paid unless presented to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue before the 1st day of January, 1869. But upon articles manufactured exclusively from cotton exported prior to the 1st day of January, 1869, there shall be allowed as a drawback an amount equal to as many cents per pound of cotton-cloth, yarn, thread, or knit fabrics as shall have been assessed and paid in the form of an internal tax upon raw cotton entering into the manufacture of said cloth or other article, the amount of such allowance or drawback to be ascertained in such manner as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. No allowance of drawback shall be made for any amount less than ten dollars.

No amendment being offered, the Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 78. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall fraudulently claim or seek to obtain an allowance or drawback on goods, wares, or merchandise on which no internal tax shall have been paid, or shall fraudulently claim any greater allowance or drawback than the tax actually paid, such person shall forfeit triple the amount fraudulently claimed or sought to be obtained, or the sum of $500, at the election of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, to be recovered as in other cases of forfeiture.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend by striking out the words "on which no internal tax shall have been paid."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 79. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall sell, or cause or allow to be sold, any goods, wares, or merchandise liable to any tax, before the tax thereon shall have been paid, with intent to evade such tax or any part thereof, any debt contracted by the sale of any such goods, wares, or merchandise, and any security given therefor, shall be entirely void, and the collection thereof shall not be enforced in any court, unless the same shall have been bona fide transferred to the hands of an innocent holder; and if any goods, wares, or merchandise so sold, shall have been paid for, in whole or in part, the sum so paid shall be deemed forfeited, and any person suing for the same in an action of debt, shall recover of the seller the amount so paid, one half to his own use and the other half to the use of the United States.

No amendment being offered, the Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 80. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of every collector and assessor to report to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, on the first day of every month, the bonds accepted and approved by him during the preceding month, giving the names of the principals and each of the sureties, amount of the bond, and for what purpose given; also, a list of all bonds in his office, whether accepted and approved by himself or by his predecessor or predecessors in office, which have matured and remained unsatisfied. It shall be the duty of every collector and assessor, and he is hereby required, to transmit, within forty-eight hours after maturity, exact copies of all bonds in his office which have been accepted under this act or any previous act, and which remain unsatisfied, to the district attorney of the district for prosecution, and he shall at the same time report to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue the fact of such transmission, with a description of each bond so transmitted. No collector, assessor, or other officer shall accept any bond given under the provisions of this act without indorsing his approval thereon, and the day when the same was accepted. Any collector or assessor, or other officer, who shall knowingly accept any false, forged, or fraudulent bond, given in any case in which a bond is required under any provision of this act, or who shall accept any such bond, which at the time of such acceptance shall be insufficient and worthless, shall forfeit and pay $1,000.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend by inserting at the end of the section, the following:

And shall, moreover, be liable on his official bond for any loss which may accrue thereby to the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I move to amend the section in line twenty-four by inserting after the word "shall" the word "knowingly;" so that it shall read, "or who shall knowingly accept any such bond."

Mr. ALLISON. I do not think that amendment should be made. It is the business of the collector to know whether the bond is good or bad. That is a part of his duty.

Mr. ROBERTSON. As the section now reads—

Any collector or assessor, or other officer who shall knowingly accept any false, forged, or fraudulent bond, given in any case in which a bond is required under any provision of this act, or who shall accept any such bond which at the time of such acceptance shall be insufficient and worthless, shall forfeit and pay $1,000.

That, in my opinion, is wrong, and the amendment I offer obviates the objection.

The amendment was disagreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 81. And be it further enacted, That every bond given or required under the provisions of this act shall have annexed thereto or indorsed thereon an affidavit of justification of each and every of the sureties thereto, who shall be residents of the county, or an adjoining county in the same State, or collection district in which such bond is given, and owners of real estate therein, the title to which shall be duly recorded; which affidavit shall be in such form and contain such statements and particulars touching the business, property, and responsibility of such surety as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may prescribe. Such affidavit may be taken before the collector or any deputy collector, assessor, or any assistant assessor of the district, or before any United States officer having power to administer oaths. Any person who shall knowingly make any false statement in said affidavit shall be deemed guilty of perjury, and, on conviction, shall be imprisoned for a term not less than two years nor more than five years. Every official bond required and taken under the provisions of this act, unless otherwise by law provided, shall be returned to and preserved in the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. All bonds given for the carrying on of business by distillers, rectifiers, brewers, distillers of oil, manufacturers of tobacco, snuff, and cigars, dealers in lottery tickets, or any other manufacturer or dealer, shall be preserved in the office of the assessor of the proper district, and shall be by him, for greater security and convenient reference, kept in book form and indexed; and immediately upon the taking of any such bond the assessor shall forward a copy thereof to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

No amendment being offered, the Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 82. And be it further enacted, That all bonds required to be given in connection with the transportation, warehousing, and exportation of any articles to be retained by the collector of internal revenue, accepting them, shall be prepared, bound, and preserved in book form in the office of said collector, and the principals and sureties shall sign the bonds in person at his office; and all oaths and affirmations in connection therewith shall be administered by the collector or his deputy at said office; and the form of any bond required by this act shall be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue with such conditions as he may deem necessary or expedient in addition to those prescribed by law. All expenses attending the warehousing, transportation, removal, marking or branding, and storage of any articles intended for export shall be paid by the owners or exporters of the same, and be a charge thereon; and the same fees shall be paid for the execution of all papers, instruments, and documents relating to the exportation of any such articles as are charged to exporters for like services in the custom-house, and, in addition thereto, all expenses and services of officers of the United States attending the transfer to or from warehouse, transportation, lading, and shipment of any such articles, under any provisions of the internal revenue or customs laws, shall be paid by the owner or exporter thereof, to be paid to and collected by the collector of internal revenue, and by him to be paid into the Treasury of the United States, and accounted for like other public moneys. Any article so exported in bond and reimported into the United States shall be deemed to be of foreign production, and be liable to the same duty and tax, and subject to the same provisions of law as other similar articles of foreign production imported into the United States.

No amendment being offered, the Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 83. And be it further enacted, That any person who shall falsely or fraudulently execute or sign any bond, permit, entry, or other document, required by the provisions of this act, or by any regulation made in pursuance thereof, or who shall procure the same to be falsely or fraudulently executed; or who shall advise, aid in, or connive at the execution thereof, shall, on conviction, be imprisoned for a term not less than one year nor more than five years; and the property to which such false or fraudulent instrument relates shall be forfeited.

No amendment being offered, the Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 84. And be it further enacted, That manual-labor schools and colleges and benevolent institutions shall not be required to pay any special tax on articles manufactured by the pupils or inmates thereof, or on the sales of such articles when the proceeds of such manufacture are applied exclusively to the support and maintenance of such institutions: Provided, That this exemption shall not apply to manufactures of tobacco, snuff, cigars, distilled spirits, or oil.

No amendment being offered, the Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 85. And be it further enacted, That any articles on the manufacture of which any special or specific internal tax is imposed may be purchased by, or for the use of, the United States free of such tax.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to strike out the words "special or specific."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move further to amend by adding at the end of the section the words, "under such regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may prescribe."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Special Taxes.

SEC. 86. And be it further enacted, That every person engaged in or prosecuting any trade, business, or profession, hereinafter mentioned and described, shall pay a special tax therefor, as hereinafter provided, and shall furnish to the proper assistant assessor of the district in which he conducts or proposes to conduct any trade, business, or profession, a statement setting forth his name and residence, or if he be associated with others, the style of the firm or company, with the names and residences of each of the individuals constituting such firm or company, and the trade, business, or profession, and the place where it is to be carried on; if a peddler, under what class he proposes to be assessed; if an innkeeper, the yearly rental value of the house and property he proposes to occupy. All which facts shall be returned, duly certified by such assistant assessor, to both the assessor and collector of the district. And all such special taxes shall be for one year, and become due on the 1st day of May in each year; but on commencing any trade, business, or profession after the 1st day of May in any year shall be reckoned proportionately for that part of the year until the 1st day of May following. And the special tax shall be paid to the collector of the district, as hereinafter provided, who shall give a receipt therefor.

Mr. BUCKLAND. I move to amend this section by adding at the end the following:

Provided, That whenever any person engaged in or prosecuting any trade, business, or profession, after having paid the special tax required by this act, shall assign or transfer his whole business to any other person before the expiration of the year for which such tax has been paid, no additional tax shall be charged in consequence of such assignment or transfer for the unexpired portion of the year for which the tax has been paid.

I understand the rule now is to charge the same rate of tax to the assignee or transferee, notwithstanding the tax has been paid for the whole year by the seller. The object of this amendment is to change the rule in that respect.

Mr. HOOPER. If the gentleman will look at section ninety-two I think he will find that provided for. At any rate, if it is not, there would be the proper place for it.

Mr. BUCKLAND. This relates to special taxes, so called; that is another subject.

Mr. PRICE. I suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts that that provision does not cover this case. A man takes out his license to-day. To-morrow he sells it to another party and makes a transfer. The party has to take out a new license. I understand the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUCKLAND] is designed to cure that evil. It is not provided for in the ninety-second section.

Mr. BUCKLAND. I think the gentleman from Iowa is right, and that that section does not cover the point which my amendment is intended to cover.

Mr. ALLISON. I quite agree to that, and we do not want to have it cover it.

Mr. MAYNARD. I suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that his amendment would be more appropriate to section ninety-two.

Mr. BUCKLAND. I will withdraw it, then, for the present, and offer it when we reach that point.

Mr. SCHENCK. Before we pass to section eighty-seven, I desire to ask the consent of the committee to consider that section by clauses or paragraphs, as each clause is distinct.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was about to state that according to the usage, unless otherwise directed by the committee, the Chair will treat every paragraph as a section while the eighty-seventh section is under consideration.

Mr. WOODWARD. I move to strike out the eighty-sixth section, and I suppose if my motion prevails it will carry out the whole of the eighty-seventh section also, containing all the specifications. I do not know how other gentlemen feel, but I am willing to give them an opportunity to express their opinions as to taxing all these branches of industry in the community. It is only another mode—and not a very direct or honest mode of taxing the consumer. I do not understand it to be necessary to the Government that all these branches of business should be laid under the heavy hand of this Government in its taxing power. I admit the right of the Government to come down on the business interests in this manner. But I do not deem it necessary, and not being necessary, I deem it inexpedient to do it. I am opposed on principle to all this form of taxation. It is to be resorted to only in case of necessities which do not now exist.

I have not time in five minutes to enter into any larger view of this subject, nor have I any disposition to enter into a general discussion of the subject. If there are any gentlemen here who are for emancipating the industry and enterprise of this country from the most odious form of taxation that any Government ever found it necessary to lay upon them, they will vote for my amendment. I say that it is asking the people to bear too great a burden, to bear too irritating a burden, to adopt this mode of inquiring into the profits of every man's business and taxing him according to the enterprise and industry with which he is prosecuting his business. It is an odious tax. It is a tax which, I agree, the people will submit to if it be necessary, but it is not necessary in this case.

The English Government derives its revenue from very few objects of taxation, and those which interfere in the least possible manner with the industry and liberties of the people. This bill, in the sections which we are now considering, is founded upon exactly the reverse of that policy. It interferes with the business of the people in every possible particular. It descends into the minutest account of his affairs and requires him to exhibit them to the collector, to settle his accounts with the Government every year, and to pay a large tax upon his profits.

I have not time in five minutes to enter at large into this question, but I feel such repugnance to all this class of objects of taxation that I have made my motion in good faith to strike out this section; and if it were stricken out, I do not believe the harmony of the proportions of the bill would be impaired; I do not believe the Government would be harmed; I do think the people of this country would be very greatly relieved of a most disagreeable burden.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I am very sorry that from the tone of voice in which the gentleman expressed himself it has been impossible for me to hear one single word of his objections or of the reasons by which he sustains his objection to this form of taxation. I understand his proposition to be to strike out all that relates to special taxes with a view to testing the judgment of this House on the propriety of that mode of raising revenue. To that I answer, in the first place, that it assumes importance from the amount of taxes derived from these objects of taxation. The whole amount during the last year was $18,186,446. By a readjustment of the special taxes and an extension of them, and by including as a part of the special taxes a tax on sales above a certain amount, it is probable that under this head will be included one of the largest sources of our revenue during the coming year.

Now, sir, why should we dispense with special taxes? It is objected that they are particularly odious, and are contrary to the genius of our institutions. These taxes are, perhaps, less felt than any others. They are taxes small in their amount, even in the gross levied upon particular persons; and so far as they are now increased by extending taxation to sales in proportion to the amount of those sales, instead of adding to the burdens of our people it will relieve them of a very heavy burden that was before imposed upon the industrial interests of the country, in the shape of a direct tax upon the commodities produced by different manufactures.

I hope that instead of adopting a sweeping proposition of this sort, and taking from the revenue the large amount which we can derive from this source for carrying on the Government, I hope gentlemen will content themselves, as we consider this section clause by clause, with making their comments or offering their amendments, if they have any to propose, to the particular subjects of taxation as we consider them. And it will be found as we go on that one large source of increased revenue from taxation of this sort is derived from our bringing upon the list at increased rates those things which are more purely objects and productions of luxury, articles involving the ministering to luxurious appetites.

For instance, we have increased largely the tax upon lottery managers, upon public amusements, upon the larger classes of hotels, &c. And to sustain the motion now made would cut off the possibility of reaching those subjects at all, as we propose to do. I hope no such amendment will prevail.

The question was then taken upon the amendment; and it was not agreed to.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move to amend section eighty-six by adding to it the following:

Provided, That in case of the change in the members of a firm such change shall be reported to the assistant assessor, and such change shall not be construed to require a new license or tax.

Mr. ALLISON. I would inform my colleague [Mr. LOUGHRIDGE] that that is already provided for in another part of the bill.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I withdraw the amendment if that is the case.

No further amendment was offered.

The first paragraphs of the next section were then read, as follows:

SEC. 87. And be it further enacted, That the following special taxes shall be, and are hereby, imposed:

Retail dealers. Dealers whose business it is to sell or offer for sale any goods, wares, or merchandise, of foreign or domestic production, not including wines, spirits, malt, malt liquors, or crude petroleum, and whose annual sales exceed $5,000 and do not exceed $25,000, shall be regarded as retail dealers, and shall each pay twenty dollars. But any retail dealer of general merchandise who also sells or offers for sale tobacco, snuff, or cigars, shall pay an additional tax of five dollars, and shall pay five dollars, although his aggregate annual sales may be less than $5,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend by inserting before the clause relating to retail dealers the following paragraph:

There shall be assessed and collected on all bonds, the interest on which is payable at the Treasury of the United States, a tax of one and one-half per cent. per annum on the principal of said bonds; one half of such tax on all such bonds, the interest on which is payable semi-annually, shall be withheld by the proper officer of the Treasury from the semi-annual accruing interest on coupons at the time the same shall be paid; and the tax aforesaid on such of said bonds, the interest on which is payable annually, shall be withheld from the interest or coupons at the time of the payment thereof.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to a point of order: that this amendment is not germane to the subject of this section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] does not relate to a special tax, but provides for a general tax.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend the paragraph by striking out all after the words "Retail dealers," at the beginning of the paragraph, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

Every person whose business it is to sell or offer for sale any goods, wares, or merchandise of foreign or domestic production, not including wines, distilled spirits, malt, malt liquors, or crude petroleum, tobacco, snuff, or cigars, and whose annual sales exceed $5,000 and do not exceed $25,000, shall be regarded as a retail dealer, and shall pay twenty dollars.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR. I move to amend by striking out the paragraph. I make this motion for the purpose of raising a question as to this method of taxation. It is a species of taxation which reaches every class of citizens in the country. It is in the nature of a direct tax upon every person in the land. I do not believe that there is a necessity for such a tax as this. My impression has been, from the beginning, that this bill is calculated to raise a larger tax than there is occasion to raise. I am willing, and the people of the country are willing, to pay such taxation as is necessary to meet the interest on the public debt and the expenses of the Government. I believe the people are not disposed to go beyond that. My impression is that this bill does go very far beyond that point, though I have not time to examine the figures to see how far this statement might be maintained.

The tax embraced in this paragraph is, I think, the most annoying one to be found in the whole bill. It falls upon everybody everywhere. For this reason I think this method of taxation ought not to be resorted to, unless it be necessary. That necessity I am not able to see. Hence I have submitted this motion. I believe that the true system of internal taxation is that stated awhile ago by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Woodward,] to confine the taxation to a few articles. Such a method of levying taxes operates with more uniformity and justice than the system embraced in this bill, and encounters less hostility in its administration. It admits of a selection of the branches of business that can best bear taxation. This paragraph makes no distinction whatever. The man who deals in the necessities of life must pay his tax (or rather the consumer of these necessities must pay it) as much as he who deals in luxuries. The paragraph makes no distinction, and I observe that these special taxes are very numerous, reaching the business of the country in various ways.

A few months ago Congress passed an act removing from the manufacturing industry of the country the special taxation. Now, I must confess that this bill looks to me like an earnest attempt to bring it all back again in other shapes. This bill appears to me as calculated to put back again upon the industry of the country the greater part of that which was taken off by the bill which we passed in the earlier part of the session. I cannot approve such a proposition. I do not believe that the industry of the people will stand this burden. Hence I am opposed to this section. I am opposed to levying upon the productive industry of the country all taxes which are not absolutely essential. I do not believe that the taxes contemplated in this paragraph are required for the revenues of the Government. On the contrary, I believe that if taxation be properly levied upon those things which are either in the nature of luxuries or useless articles, like liquors, tobacco, and things of that sort, we shall realize a sufficient amount of revenue for the purposes of the Government.

Now, it is said that the system of taxation embraced in this paragraph is proper and should be maintained, because the taxes are easily collected. Most undoubtedly these taxes are very easily collected; but I submit that this ought not to be the rule for levying taxes. The rule ought to have regard to the interests of the people. We should consider what they can most easily pay, not what is most easily collected. It would be easier perhaps to confiscate the property of the citizen than to assess and collect taxes in the method we now pursue.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Chairman, there are two or three points in the argument submitted by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BLAIR] to which I think it proper to advert. In the first place, the gentleman is mistaken in opposing this section on the ground that it bears heavily upon the productive industry of the country. The truth is, this is one of those provisions by which we are seeking to relieve the productive industry of the country by putting our taxation upon that which is not the labor of production but which is the mere exchange of commodities. This is not a tax upon manufactures, it is not a tax upon labor, but it is a tax upon commercial transactions.

The present law imposes a tax of ten dollars upon retail dealers from $1,000 up to $25,000, according to the amount of their business. The committee believed that the same amount could be raised by taxing the larger dealers engaged in the retail trade, including those between $5,000 and $25,000, and releasing altogether from taxation every dealer whose business does not amount to $5,000. This was proposed not so much for the benefit of the dealers themselves as for the convenience and advantage of the citizens of the country at large. We propose that those who have their little shops and stores at the cross roads and in the small villages and hamlets of the country, who do not sell an amount equal to $5,000 a year, shall be relieved from any special tax whatever, and that is the purpose of this bill. While we have increased the amount of the special tax with a view to obtaining as much, if possible, as under the present law, we have released everything below $5,000.

The gentleman says by this and other special taxes we will obtain too much money. I wish I was as much afraid of that as he. I have endeavored to give this House, after a careful examination of the subject, with all the aids I could obtain in the several departments, estimates of receipts and expenditures for the coming year and an estimate of what may be produced under this bill. I made out a balance of $50,000,000 in the Treasury over and above absolute expenditures, and I advised the House then, and I repeat now, that out of that $50,000,000 must come whatever bounty you pay to the soldiers, which is not one of the annual expenditures, and whatever you pay to private claimants; in short, whatever appropriations Congress, outside of the regular necessary normal expenses, may make from time to time; $50,000,000 is small enough margin for that. Indeed, the bounties for the coming year, I am informed, will amount to $40,000,000.

Mr. MILLER. I should like to know how much the gentleman expects to get from the tax on retail dealers?

Mr. SCHENCK. We suppose we can raise quite as much as during the last year, when it was $2,047,000.

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to ask the chairman whether the special complaint was not from the class below $5,000?

Mr. SCHENCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLAINE. I move to strike out the last word. It seems to me this is an important paragraph, and ought to be considered carefully. I think the status quo is not worse than the attempted increase. Here is a very large increase on retail dealers. Men on one side of the street below $5,000 go free, while the tax upon a man on the other side of $5,500 has to pay an increased tax. One pays nothing and the other has an increased tax of from ten dollars to twenty dollars. I confess I would prefer to have the law left as it is. The gentleman says on the question of revenue it would be better. I am against all changes merely for the purpose of change.

Mr. HARDING. I hope the committee will determine to retain this clause. It is extremely essential. But yesterday this House determined to vote an additional compensation of two or three millions. I understand that we are going to vote thirty-three and one third per cent. extra to officers of the Army. I will remind my friend from Pennsylvania that in supporting these liberal appropriations, twenty per cent. extra for a special class, it will be indispensable that we should tax retail dealers; that we must tax the retail dealers of the whole country to get the amount of money contemplated in these extra compensation appropriations. I shall therefore vote to retain these measures. I think we should tax the many for the benefit of the few, and therefore I hope, at the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who is always found with the class of liberal voters, this will be retained. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLAINE. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. I renew it for the purpose of making a single remark. I thank the gentleman from Illinois for his warm and earnest support.

I will say to the gentleman from Maine, upon whatever principle of human nature it may be founded—whether founded on ambition or otherwise—wherever a distinction is made between wholesale and retail dealers, between two classes of dealers in commodities, there is a desire to be in the principal class even if compelled to pay ten or twenty dollars. They want to be considered on the side of the street where $5,500 or $10,000 dealers are, and not as being among the small fry. We relieve everybody who sell under $5,000.

Mr. COVODE. I dislike to disagree with the chairman of the committee. I think it would be better to put a ten dollar tax on small dealers. It is hard generally for retail dealers in the country to be able to determine whether their sales are more or less than $5,000. If this pass they will be careful to keep accounts, so as to make their sales appear below $5,000. I am satisfied that a great number of retailers will in that way get rid of paying taxes altogether; and the safe way would be to keep the ten dollar tax on.

Mr. BLAINE. This Congress, under the lead of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, has prided itself on removing taxes. We have taken off the cotton tax and the manufacturer's tax. I am not therefore disposed to begin on a plan of increasing the tax in some directions because we have entirely relieved them in others. I maintain if we take off the tax on manufactures and reach a class of the community who are now entirely exempt, it is an odious thing to take out a large class of retail dealers throughout the length and breadth of the United States, who have heretofore paid a tax of ten dollars on a thousand and to now double that license upon them. I for one am opposed to it, tooth and nail. I believe it is one of those taxes that are unjustifiable and odious in the extreme.

The amendment of Mr. BLAINE was disagreed to—yes twenty-eight, noes not counted.

Mr. BLAINE. I move to amend by striking out twenty dollars in line eight and inserting ten dollars. And I will say, if the chairman of the committee, from whom I always differ with reluctance, desires to bring back the $5,000 to $1,000, I shall certainly second him in making that motion. But I content myself now with moving to strike out twenty dollars and insert ten dollars, leaving the license tax where it always has been.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Chairman, I desire in the very beginning to make this general announcement to the House. We have not been alone engaged in reducing taxes, although in very large fields of industry a very great reduction has been and will be accomplished; but we have also been engaged in readjusting taxes and equalizing them; a matter of just as much moment.

Now, what is the tax proposed on the retail dealer? From twenty dollars up to $25,000, or an average of less than one tenth of one per cent. Now, if the manufacturers are willing, being relieved from their former burden to pay two tenths of one per cent., is it too much to ask of these traders that they shall pay half as much? The object is one, as I say, of readjustment. Well, in the course of this readjustment for the benefit not so much of the trader as of the mass of the people, we have concluded to remit altogether the tax upon the exceedingly small trader by bringing it down to a minimum of only $5,000, releasing all below that amount. Now, by putting it upon those who do a business of from $5,000 to $25,000, so as not to make the average equal to one tenth of one per cent., we are able to accomplish this and get as much revenue.

Now, sir, in regard to the amount of tax to be levied, I desire those who have the controlling majority in this House to remember that when the committee reported this bill they reported it with reference to what you have either already provided by your bills that have been passed, or what you are providing for in bills that are now pending. And it will be for the majority of this Congress to determine whether they will go for such readjustment of taxation, such release of a portion of the taxes, and such equalization of taxes in every respect recommended by the committee in the main as will secure the credit of the country by providing for everything that with another voice you are engaged in voting away.

The gentleman says it can make no question here, because we can get about as much tax if we put a tax of only ten dollars upon the dealer up to $25,000 and tax the dealer down to $1,000 as if we released all below $5,000. Perhaps it may be so, but then we violate this other policy which the committee have attempted to follow of releasing the small trader and the small dealer and the small manufacturer throughout the country. When you come to your manufacturer's tax you will find, although we put a tax of ten dollars upon small dealers and manufacturers, then a per centage of two tenths of one per cent., according to the character of the manufacturer, yet we do not tax any of the manufacturers engaged in any of the ordinary kinds of industry below $5,000. We do not even tax him his ten dollars upon the principle which we suppose this Congress will certainly sustain of reviving, lifting up, and giving exemption to all those who may be considered likely to be hampered by any tax imposed upon them at all, because of the narrowness of their means and the smallness of the business in which they are engaged.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BLAINE. I move to amend the amendment by striking out one dollar. I desire to call the attention of the committee to one feature in the bill, and I have to repeat that this section proposes to double the tax on a very large class numbered by thousands and tens of thousands throughout the United States. Now, my friend proposes to tax the retail dealer who shall sell one dollar's worth over $5,000 twenty dollars; and the same bill, on page 108, imposes a tax of ten dollars on the lawyer whose gross annual receipts do not exceed $3,000. A lawyer, then, in a country town may receive $3,000 a year, all of which is profit, and pay ten dollars tax, while the trader who sells $5,000 worth of goods, on which his profit is very small indeed, pays double the amount of tax.

Mr. SCHENCK. The trader pays nothing at all until his sales reach $5,000.

Mr. BLAINE. But if his sales reach $100 over $5,000 he pays a tax of twenty dollars, while the lawyer who has a net income of $3,000 only pays ten dollars.

Now, I say this, that the existing tax, whether it be just or unjust, is one to which the people are accustomed. It is one to which they have been used for five, six, or seven years, and it is now proposed to change it without adding anything to the revenue.

Mr. MAYNARD. Does the gentleman think it will make any difference with the people?

Mr. BLAINE. It will make a difference with the people who have to pay the tax. I suppose in this unfeeling world it does not make much difference to those who do not, because other people's miseries are very easy to bear. But those who have to pay the tax will complain, and to my mind it is an unjust tax.

Mr. MAYNARD. A tax of ten dollars on sales over $5,000 is not very enormous.

Mr. BLAINE. On the enormous sale of $5,000, he might possibly have a profit of twelve per cent., which would give him the large annual receipt of $600 net, on which he is to pay a tax of twenty dollars. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment, and ask for a vote on my original amendment.

The question was put on Mr. BLAINE's amendment; and there were—ayes 82, noes 30; no quorum voting.

Mr. SCHENCK called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BLAINE, and HOOPER of Massachusetts, were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 43, noes 54.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BARNES. I move to amend the paragraph by striking out the words "and whose annual sales exceed $5,000 and do not exceed $25,000, shall be regarded as retail dealers, and shall each pay twenty dollars," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "shall pay ten dollars and one tenth of one per cent. on the excess over $5,000."

Mr. Chairman, as the bill now stands it taxes the dealer who sells $5,000 worth of goods as much as it does one who sells $25,000 worth. It is very difficult for the committee to make the dividing line between the different classes of traders. For myself, I have been unable to see the necessity of defining retail dealers and wholesale dealers. In one section of the country, or in one part of a city, a retail dealer sells $1,000,000 of goods, and in the same city or in the same section of country a wholesale dealer sells but $25,000 worth. There is really no distinct idea conveyed with reference to the amount of business by the words "retail" and "wholesale." I believe there are wholesale dealers in the district represented by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means in Ohio, who are exclusively wholesale merchants, whose annual sales do not exceed from $50,000 to $100,000.

There are retail dealers in the city where I reside whose sales amount to $1,000,000 annually. Now, it certainly is fair and just that dealers be taxed in proportion to the amount of sales they actually make, whether they are called retail dealers or wholesale dealers. In my estimation $5,000 is a fair exemption, and must be satisfactory to the small dealers who can extend their business, and makes no invidious distinction between the merchant whose sales are $6,000 and the merchant whose sales amount to $25,000.

Mr. SCHENCK. There is, perhaps, not so much out of the way in the principle of the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BARNES.] The argument against it is one of convenience. When you come to the wholesale dealer, whose sales amount to $25,000 and upward, and charge him, as you do manufacturers, a tax of one fifth of one per cent., and require him to make out a monthly return of his sales, you require of him what he can conveniently do. Doing a business of that amount, he has his clerks and his book-keeper, and thus it is not a troublesome matter to him. But the small dealer has not the force at his command to make out these monthly returns so conveniently. We have, therefore, put in a gross sum, as has been the practice with the Government from the beginning, for this reason—for it is founded on reason: we place a gross sum on these small dealers, and do not require them to make these regular returns, which are not so inconvenient to the large dealers who keep a staff of employees.

If, however, we should resort to the principle of percentage, I would call attention to the fact that when you get above $5,000 the amendment of the gentleman would impose a tax of only one tenth of one per cent.

while the manufacturer pays a tax of two tenths of one per cent. I do not think the sympathy of the country should be excited particularly in favor of the trading class, the commercial interest, the men who merely exchange the commodities of others, over the man who by his own labor produces and adds to the wealth of the country.

As I said at the beginning of my remarks, I object to the amendment merely on the ground of inconvenience. And there is so much in that objection, that from the first it has been found expedient not to demand that which requires a great deal of clerical force for its performance from the small operators or traders. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

The question was then taken upon the amendment of Mr. BARNES, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. ROSS. I move to amend this paragraph by striking out the words "tobacco, snuff, or cigars." I do not understand why retail dealers should not be allowed to sell tobacco, snuff, and cigars, if they want to do so, as well as to sell anything else. I know of no reason for a particular tax on those articles.

Mr. ALLISON. I rise to a point of order. The Committee of the Whole have already adopted these words.

Mr. SCHENCK. I moved an amendment, on behalf of the Committee of Ways and Means, as a substitute for the original paragraph, embracing the words the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Ross] now moves to strike out. The proper time for this amendment was while my amendment was pending. The Committee of the Whole having adopted my amendment, it is not in order to move to strike out any portion of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, and rules the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois out of order.

Mr. PILE. I move to amend this paragraph by striking out "twenty-five" and inserting "fifteen," also, by inserting after the word "dollars" the words "retail dealers whose annual sales exceed $1,000 and do not exceed $5,000, shall each pay five dollars."

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I raise the same point of order on this amendment that was raised on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. Ross,] that the Committee of the Whole have already adopted these words, and it is not in order to strike them out.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, and rules the amendment out of order.

No further amendment was offered.

The next paragraph was read, as follows:

Wholesale dealers. Dealers, whose business it is for themselves, or on commission, to sell or offer for sale any goods, wares, or merchandise, of foreign or domestic production, not including wines, spirits, malt, or malt liquor, crude petroleum, tobacco, snuff, or cigars, and whose annual sales exceed $25,000, shall each pay fifty dollars, and two dollars for every additional $1,000 in excess of $25,000; but in making the assessment on such excess of sales a deduction shall be allowed of all sales included in the return, which shall be shown to have been made by or through another wholesale dealer, or by or through an auctioneer, such other wholesale dealer or auctioneer having included such sales in the returns made by him to the assessor or assistant assessor of the district in which he is doing business. The payment of the special tax, as a wholesale dealer, shall not exempt any such person, acting also as a commercial broker, from the payment of the special tax imposed upon commercial brokers.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend this paragraph by striking out all after the first words "wholesale dealers," and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

Every person whose business it is for himself, or on commission to sell or offer for sale any goods, wares, or merchandise of foreign or domestic production, not including wines, spirits, malt, or malt liquor, crude petroleum, tobacco, snuff, or cigars, and whose annual sales exceed $25,000, shall be regarded as a wholesale dealer and shall pay fifty dollars, and two dollars for every additional $1,000 in excess of $25,000; but in making the assessment on such excess of sales a deduction shall be allowed of all sales included in the return which shall be shown to have been made as the special agent for and on account of a manufacturer, and sales made by or through another wholesale dealer, or by or through an auctioneer, such manufacturer or other wholesale dealer or auctioneer having included such sales in the returns made by him to the assessor or assistant assessor of the district in which he is doing business. The payment of the special tax, as a wholesale dealer, shall not exempt any such person, acting also as a commercial broker, from the payment of the special tax imposed upon commercial brokers.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move to amend by striking out in the first clause of the pending paragraph the words "two dollars" in line nineteen, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "one dollar;" so that it will read, "and one dollar for every additional $1,000 in excess of $25,000." It seems to me that the provision of this paragraph, as it now stands, is calculated to impose a very heavy burden on the wholesale grocery dealers throughout the country. This tax is imposed without reference to the question whether they make any profit on their business. A grocer selling goods to the amount of $500,000 in a single year may lose during that year in the course of his business $50,000. Yet, under the provisions of this section he is required to pay nearly one thousand dollars over and above the special tax of fifty dollars, for the privilege of losing that amount of money. As I understand, there is no exception to this rule. How would the provision operate? A wholesale grocer, for instance, does a business of $500,000, or perhaps more annually; and there are perhaps several such in my own town. In the city of Chicago there are doubtless a hundred houses doing an annual business of from $5,000,000 to perhaps $12,000,000. Yet, one of these houses may lose from $50,000 to $500,000 a year, and still it is required to pay not only the special tax, but two dollars for every $1,000 in excess of $25,000. I understand that under the present law the tax assessed upon this class of business men is one dollar on every $1,000. The Committee of Ways and Means now propose to double that tax. I do not see why we should double it while we at the same time take off the tax on manufactures. When we are lessening the tax upon many branches of industry why should this tax be doubled?

Mr. PILE. Does the gentleman mean to say that there are either in Peoria or in Chicago grocers selling goods to the amount of from five or six million dollars annually to $12,000,000?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Not in Peoria; but we have them there doing a business of $500,000 annually.

Mr. PILE. I do not think there is a grocer in the Mississippi valley who sells goods to the amount of $8,000,000 annually, certainly none selling $12,000,000 or even $6,000,000.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I appeal to my colleague from Chicago, [Mr. JUDG.] who sits beside me, to speak as to the amount of business done by houses in that city. He informs me that there are grocery dealers there doing a business of $3,000,000 annually, while some of the dry-goods houses sell goods to the amount of $12,000,000 in a year. Well, sir, the dry-goods dealer who does a business of $12,000,000 is included in this paragraph. I hope the tax of two dollars will be stricken out and one dollar inserted.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Chairman, I am compelled to repeat the statement that the Committee of Ways and Means have had in view not merely a general decrease of taxes, but a readjustment of them. They found the law making a distinction against labor and in favor of trade. They have not sought to frame a law in favor of labor and against trade, but to put trade and labor upon a fair and equal footing. We have released the industrial interests of the country; your shoemakers, your hatters, your cabinet-makers, &c., from the heavy burdens which were imposed upon their manufactures, while they were in numberless instances paying from two to five per cent. ad valorem upon the commodities produced by them; and we have remitted them to a system with which they are well satisfied, under which they pay two tenths of one per cent. upon their sales of above $5,000. In view of our action in that respect, we have thought it fair to bring the commercial portion of the community, the traders of the land, up at least to the same footing. That is just what this bill proposes; that your wholesale dealer shall pay no more and no less than the small per centage of two tenths of one per cent. upon his sales, while your manufacturer who, by his commodity, adds to the wealth of the country, is doing the same thing. I say without reservation that if I were to make a distinction in this respect, I would rather make that distinction in favor of the producing interests—the interests of those who add to the wealth of the country, than to make it in favor of those who, being but traders, are only engaged in exchanging the commodities of the country. We have not, however, sought to make invidious distinctions in any way, but to readjust matters in such a manner as to put labor and trade upon a fair and equal footing. It may be that there are those who sell goods to the amount of millions, and pay large taxes. I apprehend that the reason their taxes are so large is that they do so much business and have so much capital. Mr. INGERSOLL. But their profits are not necessarily large.

Mr. SCHENCK. Their profits are very apt to be in proportion to the amount of business they do; otherwise they would not go on doing it. I hope we shall not legislate in favor of trade as against labor any more than in the other direction.

Mr. BLAIR. I move a pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio move his amendment in the nature of a substitute for the pending paragraph?

Mr. SCHENCK. I do. It is a verbal change with the exception of one line or two. It preserves the features of the paragraph.

Mr. INGERSOLL. My amendment is to the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. So the Chair understands.

Mr. BLAIR. I wish, Mr. Chairman to say a few words in addition to my previous reply to the chairman of the committee. He seems to argue, if he takes the tax off the manufacturers and puts it upon the sale of the article, therefore he has relieved labor and put the burden upon commercial men. He mentioned the manufacturer of shoes. He takes off the tax directly on the manufacture of shoes and turns around and levies it upon the man who sells the shoes. Is the laborer benefited by that?

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman has inadvertently fallen into a misapprehension in supposing the man who sells the shoes is not taxed at all, for part of his special tax is a tax of two tenths of one per cent. upon all sales made by the manufacturer himself of shoes above $5,000.

Mr. BLAIR. What I say to the House, and that is the sum of all I desire to say, is that there can be no method by which a tax can be levied on sales which will not operate as a tax on the manufacturer. It comes back in every instance upon the production of the country. The tax that is levied upon the seller is not a tax upon his commercial transaction. It is a tax upon the article he sells. It must come out of it in the end. We all understand that the party who produces the article pays the tax. It must come back to the seller. It seems to me immaterial whether you tax the manufacturer of the article or put a tax on its sale. It is the same burden upon the manufacturer and on the labor of the country. My opinion is that taxes of every character which are on things useful and necessary are taxes upon the business and labor of the country. It comes to this finally, that the labor of the land has to pay the taxes of the land.

Mr. GARFIELD. Does not all taxation fall on labor at last?

Mr. BLAIR. Most certainly, in a certain sense. There is a tax on ardent spirits, and there is an industry connected with it, but it is not a useful industry. There are industries connected with luxuries, which if depressed are not injurious to the country. One great object is to get taxes levied upon articles of luxury, articles not essential to life.

Mr. MULLINS. I wish to say a few words in reply to the gentleman from Michigan. The idea he advances is that if you levy the tax upon the individual who sells, sooner or later that tax is imposed upon the labor of the country. Now, will any one adopt that theory as correct? In point of fact I hold it is not the case. How do I make this appear? The manufacturer who makes the shoes is not taxed. The object is to remove taxation from the producer, and the man who pays the tax is the consumer. The object in taxing the seller is to keep up the manufacturers. If the seller does not like his position let him become a producer. We tax these non-producers and especially screen the producers. We want to increase as much as possible the number of producers. And by the way it is stopping importation of goods that come in and make a heavy drain upon the Government of the United States. That is the channel through which the great laboring oar to-day is being worked and has been worked from the foundation of the Government. And it was because you have not the raw material nor the manufactured article produced in your own country.

I see nothing improper in the manner in which this tax bill has been brought before this committee. It is intended to divide the burden, as far as possible, between the laborer and producer—to let it come a little more heavily on the salesman. I can see nothing wrong in it, but I see a grand principle of right. Produce the wealth, and I will warrant you will find the country floating with ease over heavy debt and obtaining quick relief. But if wealth is produced, and you tax the producers to death, until his muscles are paralyzed and his energies break down, your country will cease to yield. It will become barren, and being barren, how can you feed your people or pay your debt?

Mr. BLAIR. I withdrew the amendment.

Mr. ELA. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] has taken the ground that this tax bears heavily upon those men who do not realize profits from their business or trade. Now, I grant that all taxes eventually come from the labor of the country, as the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BLAIR] says; yet by this process of distribution it is made more equal upon that labor. For instance, while the tax was levied on the manufacturer alone I knew some manufacturing establishments in my district that were losing $50,000 every six months; and yet you levied upon them a tax of five per cent. Now, by changing that, as here proposed, in the event that all manufacturers lose, you levy only two tenths of one per cent. upon the manufacturer, and you get two tenths of one per cent. more from the party who makes the sale. Instead of spreading the whole loss upon one class you spread it all over the country wherever the sales are made. I now renew the amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. I oppose it.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the amendment.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I renew it, which gives me a right to be heard.

Mr. ALLISON. I rise to a point of order. The gentleman cannot debate it.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection being made, the gentleman cannot renew it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I rise to a point of order. I made an amendment to strike out two and insert one. I withdrew it at the suggestion of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BLAIR] that he might renew it. He spoke to it, and after speaking withdrew it. The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. ELA] renewed it, and after he had spoken withdrew it.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] rose and opposed it and took his seat, which closed the debate upon that amendment.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Then I understand the amendment was not pending because the gentleman had not renewed it?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. ELA] renewed the amendment, and the question now is on the amendment proposed by him.

Mr. BARNES. I move to amend.

The CHAIRMAN. No amendment is now in order.

Mr. WELKER. I rise to a point of order. I suggest that as my friend from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] has farmed out his amendment so often he certainly ought to lose the benefit of it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Not unless it is voted down.

Mr. BARNES. Is it not in order to move to strike out one dollar and insert fifty cents?

The CHAIRMAN. Not until the pending amendment to the amendment is disposed of. The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to insert before the word "wines" in the substitute now pending the word "breadstuffs," so that the latter may be also exempt from this provision.

I have listened with a great deal of interest to remarks made by gentlemen on this subject. Most of them seem to believe that this tax comes from the consumer. In case of breadstuffs it must certainly come from the consumer or producer, and it seems to me in either event that this article should not be taxed even to the extent of two tenths of one per cent. The men in this country who create bread and the men who consume it comprise the entire population of the country, and I believe if there is any article that should be exempt from taxation it is this article of breadstuffs. I hope, therefore, that by the unanimous consent of the committee breadstuffs may be inserted so that they may be exempt from this taxation.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman accept an amendment to include clothing?

Mr. ALLISON. No, sir; because a man may get on without good clothes, but he must have bread.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman proposes to add to these articles which are to be exempt from taxation under this clause breadstuffs. Now, wines, distilled spirits, malt liquors, and so on, are reserved, not in order that they shall be exempted, but because they are provided for elsewhere on a different footing. The gentleman proposes to except breadstuffs, not with a view of proposing to provide for them elsewhere, but to have them go clear altogether.

This is a question of taxing traders. The gentleman proceeds upon the supposition that the man who sells ten thousand barrels of flour does it as a benevolent individual whose desire is simply to feed the poor. Now, I apprehend that the purpose of the trader is to make money, and that whether he deals in breadstuffs or in shoes or in clothes or in cabinet-ware it is pretty much all the same thing. The gentleman says, however, that this is a tax which falls, like all other taxes, eventually upon the consumer. To how great an extent? A barrel of flour at an average in my town, where we make a great deal of it—I represent a good deal of this breadstuff interest—is worth, say ten dollars. The tax of two tenths of one per cent. would require the miller, in the first place, as the manufacturer, to pay two cents on the barrel, and the wholesale dealer would be required to pay two cents more of tax than he otherwise would. I doubt very much whether any man is going to pay two cents more or less for this tax for his barrel of flour. But it will matter very much to the Government whether they get this two tenths of one per cent. or not.

But the gentleman proceeds, as do other gentlemen who would exempt lumber and various other things, under this great misapprehension; they confound the thing in which the man trades with the interest he has in the trade. I repeat, I do not look upon those who deal in what is consumed generally by the people, and by the poor as well as by the rich, as benevolent individuals who have nothing so much at heart as to take care of the population of the country. I look upon them as I do upon any other traders, as men investing their capital with the best advantage they can so as to make more money out of it. As such I would tax them all alike. But if you begin this system of exemptions, and if you are to look upon these traders in breadstuffs as kind, pious dealers who must be relieved from these heavy burdens because of the articles in which they trade, what will the gentleman say as to shoes; what will the gentleman say as to clothes; what will he say as to that which covers the outside of the body as well as that which is put within? It is true that a man must eat and drink, but in a country professing to be civilized, and where clothing is one of our requisites as well as food, those articles which I have named stand upon pretty much the same footing as food.

But again: if you except breadstuffs you must except everything else in the shape of food and let it go clear, not only flour, but all else that serves in any degree as food for man. The true principle is to tax the capital employed, no matter for what purpose it may be employed. There are certain articles of mere luxury, such as billiard-tables, playing-cards, &c., as gentlemen very well understand, which we tax considerably more. We do it upon the principle that if we tax them so very high, it will only increase the cost to the consumers of a class of articles that it is not desirable should be very cheap.

As I would not consent to make a distinction in favor of trade against labor, so I will not, for one, consent to make a distinction between the different kinds of trade, where they deal in those articles which are of common use, and not consumed merely by a particular class of people.

The question was then taken upon the amendment of Mr. ALLISON: and upon a division, there were—ayes fourteen, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BARNES. I move to amend the clause relating to the tax upon every additional $1,000 in excess of $25,000, by striking out "two dollars" and inserting "$1.50." I desire to offer a few remarks in reference to the manner of collecting the tax.

I am not prepared to say that two tenths of one per cent. is too high a tax for wholesale dealers to pay upon the sales of commodities which they handle. I am not prepared to say that one half of one per cent. would be too high; nor am I prepared to say that one tenth of one per cent. would not be too high. I am of the opinion, however, that it is not necessary to tax those articles in the hands of merchants and middle men and likewise tax them in the hands of manufacturers.

For instance, the manufacturer of axes, if his productions are taxed at his door when they leave the furnace, at a rate which is satisfactory to the Government, is more easily reached by the revenue department, the same end is attained by the Government, and a large expense is saved in the revenue system. And the same principle is applicable to the manufacture of every article referred to in this bill. I am in favor either of taxing every article of production in the hands of the manufacturer, or, if it is exempted, then of taxing it only in the hands of the merchant.

But this bill has been framed upon a theory which largely increases the expenses of the revenue department. Of course it is to be supposed that the Committee of Ways and Means have arrived at the best estimate of the amount of taxes to be derived from these two different sources, and probably the amount levied upon the manufacturer, together with the amount levied upon the merchant, will produce the amount desired by the Government. I am not disputing the amount of tax which the committee expect to derive from those sources. I simply desire to submit to the Committee of the Whole a proposition which I have no doubt has been discussed by the Committee of Ways and Means, whether it is necessary to tax the business of the country to have a tax on sales? If it is, I am inclined to think that, upon a full revision of the subject with reference to our domestic industry and foreign industry, which might perhaps be interfered with by this tax, the tax on sales might be the most popular and beneficial means to be devised. If so, I am in favor of voting for just that amount of tax to be levied upon dealers which shall be deemed necessary, whether one half of one per cent., or one per cent., or two per cent. I am not standing here to advocate the claims or interest of any class of dealers, or to say that they shall be exempt.

I do not think they can be exempted where-ever the tax is levied; but this bill not only opens the door for different classes of trades to come here and get reductions upon their particular interests, but opens likewise a competition between the manufacturer and the middle man. If we start upon the proposition that no article shall be taxed in the hands of the manufacturer, so far as it is possible to make the idea practicable, it seems to me the Government would be largely benefited in the saving of expenditure, while the details of the department would be much less.

I withdraw my amendment, which I only offered for the purpose of submitting these remarks.

The amendment of Mr. SCHENCK was then agreed to.

No further amendment being offered, the next paragraph was read, as follows:

Banks using or employing a capital not exceeding the sum of $50,000, and banks chartered, or banks organized under a general law, with a capital not exceeding $50,000, shall each pay $100, and when the capital exceeds $50,000 shall pay two dollars in addition for every $1,000 in excess of $50,000 of capital. Every incorporated or other bank, and every person, firm, or company, having a place of business where credits are opened by the deposit or collection of money or currency, subject to be paid or remitted upon draft, check, or order, or where money is advanced or loaned on stocks, bonds, bullion, bills of exchange, or promissory notes, or where stocks, bonds, bullion, bills of exchange, or promissory notes are received for discount or for sale, shall be regarded as a bank or as a banker: Provided, That any savings-bank having no capital stock, and whose business is confined to receiving deposits, to be loaned or invested for the benefit of its depositors, and doing no other business of banking, shall not be subject to this tax.

Mr. PRICE. I wish to inquire whether it is the intention of the committee that under this paragraph savings-banks paying five per cent. upon deposits and loaning their money at ten per cent. shall be exempt?

Mr. SCHENCK. This paragraph does not apply to savings-banks doing a banking business, but only to those whose business is confined to receiving deposits. This is the same provision as that of the existing law.

Mr. BARNES. I move to amend by striking out the pending paragraph. Mr. Chairman, I look upon money as in the same category with air or water or any of the necessary elements for the subsistence of individuals and of society. I hold that money should be placed in the hands of the community without taxation; that banks being the custodians of money and performing the necessary functions of society in that capacity, should be as lightly taxed as the committee can devise the means of doing; and a sufficient burden, in my view, is imposed upon them in the collateral taxation resting upon this branch of business.

In every community the rate of interest is in proportion to the price of its money. We know that if we should multiply this tax upon the banking capital of the country we can reach the point where money would disappear. The activity of our industrial resources is in proportion to the volume of money which we can command. It is the interest of every trader, of every manufacturer, of every producer of a bushel of grain, of every grower of a pound of wool, of every transporter of a cargo of merchandise, of every man, woman, and child in the country, that money should be placed in the hands of the community at the lowest possible rate. It is, therefore, the policy of communities and States to make their legislation of such a character as to attract capital to the greatest possible extent. There is no business that is not more or less interfered with by the slightest taxation which we may place upon capital. I am not only opposed to the taxation on banks proposed in this paragraph, but when the proper time arrives I shall advocate the entire exemption of banking capital from taxation. Gentlemen may be surprised that such a proposition should emanate from me or from the locality which I have the honor to represent; but it seems to me that one of the generic necessities of the community is to have cheap money. It is one of the duties of legislators to remove every obstacle which may prevent the people from obtaining money to the largest possible extent. I submit to the good sense of the House that the time will come when we shall remove all incumbrances from banking, all taxation from money as money, leaving it entirely free.

As I understand the theory of taxation in other countries of the world that have had longer experience than we have had in raising revenue, it is to single out branches of industry and levy taxation directly upon a few articles.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARNES] presents a very broad proposition—that all things upon the face of the earth in the shape of cash should escape the visits of the tax-gatherer; that money is to be regarded as in the same category with the atmosphere which we breathe, the water we drink—as one of the very elements of human existence, and therefore to be held sacred from taxation. Well, sir, we have proposed here to tax the banker; we have proposed to tax the man who is doing business in money. It is that air that we are after, and not the kind of air of which the gentleman speaks. [Laughter.] I am not, however, very familiar with this question, and I will yield the remainder of my time to my friend from New York, [Mr. McCARTHY], who has dealt in this very commodity, and is well able to discuss these new views on the subject of banking.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. Speaker, there are two sources for supplying taxes to the country from which it will be felt less than from any other; one of these is the wholesale trade of the country. It can well afford to pay the additional tax proposed by the committee, for when a wholesale man in the country increases his business it is with a corresponding increase of profits. As his sales swell up and rise in amount the proportion of profit to the cost of carrying on the business is larger, and he can afford to pay his full share of the expenses of the country. They must be paid.

Now, as to the fact that they fall upon the business classes. The broad position that labor pays the taxes of the country is true, but it is only that labor which reaches to the agriculture of the country that pays the taxes. Taxes are all paid out of the products of the soil. It is the labor which produces that pays the taxes. But in wholesale trade, as in manufactures, oftener than less, competition destroys the cost of that tax to the laborer or the person who sells, and the merchant or manufacturer is not able to carry the tax down in the profit of his goods to the consumer.

Gentlemen on the other side say that banks make money cheap. This is not my experience, for in the town in which I reside I have a practical illustration. A man commences life with small means, and all his industry is in his business. When he has saved ten, thirty, or fifty thousand dollars, instead of lending it out as individual money to make it easy to his neighbors, he, with others, deposits it in a bank and makes it a close corporation and prevents the mass of the common people from touching money. The people who accumulate money make up banking capital and make up banks, which, in addition to the wholesale trade of the country, should contribute to the necessary expenses of the country.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. EGGLESTON. I move to strike out the proviso as follows:

Provided, That any savings-bank having no capital stock, and whose business is confined to receiving deposits, to be loaned or invested for the benefit of its depositors, and doing no other business of banking, shall not be subject to this tax.

I will state my reason for moving that amendment. Savings-banks in some instances should be exempted from taxation; but my colleague has not sufficiently guarded that. I am not satisfied with that proviso. There are many banking institutions which, in order to save themselves from tax, would call themselves savings-banks although they were doing a legitimate banking business, the same business that chartered banks are now doing. I know the tax would be evaded in that way. The gentleman ought to be more particular in designating the savings-banks to be exempted. Savings-banks are supposed to be of that kind where deposits are made by people of small earnings, and which deposits are loaned out for the benefit of the depositors. But they are loaned out for the benefit of those who carry on the bank. They pay interest upon the deposits to the depositors, but they loan at a larger interest, and the profits accrue to the institution. I believe there would be many grew up unless this provision was guarded. I think it should be stricken out entirely, and I am in favor of so doing.

Mr. WOODWARD. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, and I will ask to move at the proper time to strike out the words "having no capital stock and." I do not know what the motives of the committee were in putting this proviso in the section, but I am sure they were wise ones. I hope my amendment may commend itself to the committee. It provides what I suppose was the motive of the committee in exempting savings-banks. If there is merit in exempting savings-banks it is in exempting those which have stock to make the depositors safe instead of those which have no stock to render the depositors safe. Now we have such banks in Pennsylvania, banks in which there is some stock, and the fact that there is stock has attracted many people to make their small deposits until they have become in some instances very large and successful banking institutions. I hold that there is no merit surely in a savings-bank having a solid stock to insure its stockholders. If my amendment is adopted those banks only are to be exempted which are engaged in no other business.

That savings-banks ought to be exempted is a proposition that I think cannot be successfully controverted. In Pennsylvania we have many of them, and they have proved a great benefaction to the public. There is an institution in Philadelphia that began some time in the last century with deposits of ten and twelve cents, and which to this day, as I am told, has never received in one deposit exceeding $200, and yet the earnings of that institution now are counted by millions. It has fallen away from its original proprietors who were its depositors, and who were poor people, into the hands of the most respectable merchants and business men of Philadelphia, who are appointed by the courts as directors, and who conduct it without fee or reward with as much skill and prudence as any bank in the city. There are two such institutions in that city. They have grown up by gradual accretion from very small beginnings to very large, wealthy corporations, and in them the deposits of all poor people have been protected, put at interest at about five per cent., and returned to them whenever they wanted them in specie without regard to the suspension of other banks. They have been in fact the best banks we have had in the State.

Mr. MILLER. I would inquire if the gentleman does not know that there is a large amount deposited in these banks that is unclaimed?

Mr. WOODWARD. A very large amount of what now may be considered the capital is unclaimed by any one.

Mr. MILLER. They ought to be taxed.

Mr. WOODWARD. The probability is the State government will confiscate that capital and take it to itself. Much of the capital is really without an owner.

Now, sir, I want to speak of another class of savings-banks in the interior of Pennsylvania, where we have large mining operations, and where laborers accumulate their monthly earnings. There the saving-banks are found to be useful in this way; they have induced our Irish population and others who are not remarkable for thrift to deposit their surplus earnings and put the money at interest, and thus to be laying up something for their families in the future; and that fact inculcates steadiness of habit, sobriety, industry, and frugality, on their part, the very virtues which they lack, and which are necessary to make them good American people.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ALLISON. I only desire to say a word in reply to the argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WOODWARD.] The amendment proposed by him I think will have the effect to reduce taxation very much; because if these banks, without reference to the amount of capital, are exempt from taxation, of course nearly every bank would resolve itself into a savings-bank.

Mr. WOODWARD. Not at all. Read the last words of the proviso.

Mr. ALLISON. We have a provision by which we tax all deposits one twenty fourth of one per cent. in this bill, or one half of one per cent. per annum. Now, if we allow persons to organize savings-banks with capital stock, in the large cities especially, they would make it their sole business to receive deposits and reloan those deposits to other persons, and thus escape taxation altogether; not only the license tax or special tax proposed in this paragraph, but also the tax on deposits of banks as provided in section one hundred and thirteen.

The same language is used, the gentleman will observe, in that section as is used in this section. This is the existing provision of law, and applies to a class of banks that have sprung up all over the country, organized especially and exclusively for parties to deposit in them, and paying only out of those deposits the actual expense of conducting the business, so that there are no profits to stockholders. Now, we propose to except that class of banks, and make them pay no tax. But it seems to me that all other bankers, or all banks having a stock upon which dividends are paid, should pay a portion of the tax allotted to banks and banking. The argument of the gentleman from New York [Mr. McCARTHY] is perfectly applicable to this class of cases. There is no class of people in this country that can so well afford to pay a reasonable tax upon their capital as those engaged in banking.

The question was taken on Mr. WOODWARD's amendment; and it was disagreed to.

The question recurred on Mr. EGGLESTON's motion to strike out the proviso; and being put, the motion was disagreed to.

The next question was on Mr. BARNES's motion to strike out the entire paragraph.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to offer an amendment to the paragraph before the vote is taken on striking it out. It seems to me that the amount of tax on banks may very properly be increased, and I therefore move to strike out "one hundred" and insert "three hundred" in lieu thereof. There is certainly no interest in the country that can so well afford to bear a reasonable taxation or a very high taxation as the banking institutions, which are based exclusively on the labor of the country, which are adding nothing to the wealth and industry of the country, and are only incidentally promoting the prosperity of the country as agents of exchange. They certainly ought to be subject to full taxation. It seems to me that a tax of $100 on banks whose capital is $50,000, considering the facilities they possess, whether they be State or national institutions, is an exceedingly meager tax. I trust, therefore, that the Committee of Ways and Means will not object to a slight increase of this tax. The laboring interests of this country feel that the burdens of taxation have been thrown upon them, that capital is escaping from those burdens to a much greater extent than it ought to escape, and that these agencies connected with the administration of our financial affairs, which are not necessary to the promotion of the public wealth, which do not add to the wealth of the country or encourage the creation of wealth, and which live off the labor of the country, can well afford to bear a higher rate of taxation.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman from Indiana has, perhaps, not adverted to the fact that in other portions of this bill banks have additional taxes to this special tax imposed on them. If there were no other tax on banks than this special tax there might be some propriety in increasing it; but besides this, if the gentleman will turn to page 166, he will find that we have continued, in addition to the special tax, a tax upon the deposits, a tax upon the capital, and a tax upon the circulation of banks; and we have doubled the tax upon circulation compared to what it is now. And in addition to that we have brought in the national banks and subjected them to the same rule of taxation as other banks. I hope, therefore, the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. LYNCH. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means whether this tax upon page 166 is in addition to the tax imposed by the currency act?

Mr. SCHENCK. It is in addition to this special tax.

Mr. LYNCH. But the gentleman is aware that the currency act provides for a tax on circulation.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman will find, if he will look at the bill, that we have repealed that and brought the national banks into the internal revenue law, and put them on the same footing with other banks.

The question was taken on Mr. HOLMAN'S amendment, and it was disagreed to.

The question was then taken upon the motion of Mr. BARNES, and it was not agreed to.

No further amendment was offered.

The next paragraph was read as follows:

Brokers shall each pay $100. Every person whose business it is to negotiate purchases or sales of stock, bonds, exchange, land-warrants, bullion, coined money, bank notes, promissory notes, or other securities for himself or others, shall be regarded as a broker. Any person having paid the special tax as a banker shall not be required to pay the special tax as a broker.

Mr. WELKER. I move to amend this paragraph by striking out the words "brokers shall each pay $100," and insert in lieu thereof the following:

Brokers whose annual business does not exceed $40,000, shall each pay fifty dollars; those whose business exceeds $40,000, and is less than $80,000, shall each pay $100; and those whose business exceeds $80,000 per annum, shall each pay $150.

As the paragraph now stands all brokers pay the same tax. I think the tax should be graded according as they do a greater or a less amount of business. There is a class of brokers in the different towns of this country who do a very small amount of business. It seems to me to be unfair to make them pay $100 tax, when brokers in large cities, doing a much larger amount of business, pay only the same amount of tax.

Mr. SCHENCK. The amendment of my colleague [Mr. WELKER] would be a very wise provision if it were not already provided for in another part of the bill. If the gentleman will refer to section one hundred and fifteen of this bill he will find that we bring those brokers under another system of taxation, a tax on sales. The rate at which they are at present taxed is one cent on every hundred dollars of sales. We propose to increase that rate to two cents on every $100. They will be taxed according to the amount of business they do only twice as much as under the present law.

Mr. WELKER. That obviates one of my objections to this paragraph, but not the other objection. It seems to me to be unfair that these small brokers, whose business does not exceed four or five thousand dollars a year, and perhaps not half that much, buying promissory notes or selling them, not engaged in stock business at all, should be compelled to pay the enormous tax of $100 for the purpose of carrying on that occupation in a small country town. It seems to me the tax is too much for the business done. It may be well enough to make large brokers pay more tax than these small ones do.

Mr. SCHENCK. It is true we have increased the special tax on brokers from fifty dollars to $100 under our system of equalization. And one of these worthy gentlemen in the smallest village will probably make it up by the shaving of a single note. I think no man who would follow the business of a broker, either in a country village or in the city, is hardly fit to be trusted by his neighbors in that business, or as a man to be relied upon, if he cannot pay this amount of tax. One would think that any man who is fit to engage in this business would be able to obtain from his gains the sum of $100 to pay for the privilege of acting in that capacity.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SCHENCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I have information from the assessor of my district to this effect: there are those within the district whose nominal business is that of farming or the law or trade; still they make it a business, not openly, but secretly, to buy notes, to negotiate loans of money, and really to do a brokerage business. If you inquire of them what their business is, they will tell you that they are farmers or lawyers or merchants, as the case may be.

Mr. MAYNARD. Corresponding to bush-whackers and guerrillas in the war.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes, sir. They pay no special tax or license as brokers. Now, I want to inquire if this paragraph is so strong as to include these men who are really brokers?

Mr. SCHENCK. It will be the fault of the assessor of the district if they are not included.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Would it not be well to amend this paragraph so as to read, "all persons who shall engage in the business of negotiating purchases or sales of stocks," &c., instead of "every person whose business it is to negotiate," &c.? I will offer that amendment as soon as I can get the opportunity to do so.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, that I may have an opportunity to say a word on this question, I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. I hope that the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WELKER] will be adopted. I know something as to what would be the practical operation of this provision of the bill. Now, sir, there could be no objection to requiring a broker to pay $100, if he were a broker in the ordinary mercantile sense of that term; but to require that every man who is a broker under the legal definition of this act shall in every instance pay at least $100 is a hardship. Now, I know that a country trader in my county in Maine, who is in almost all sorts of business, happened to buy and sell two or three promissory notes. He was indicted before the district court, the judge of which ruled, and I have no doubt rightfully, that if the man bought or sold a single piece of paper and held himself out as willing to buy or sell others, he was a broker within the definition of the law; and the judge further ruled that if the man had bought or sold three pieces of paper, the jury had a right to say that he was a broker within the common law definition. I think there is a great hardship in putting the poor country broker, the man who does a very small business in this line, upon a level with a man doing an immensity of business in New York city. I trust the committee will support the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio, and declare that the little broker in the country may operate in his line of business by paying fifty dollars.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I desire to make an inquiry. Do I understand the gentleman to say that in the case he has mentioned the court decided that if a man engaged in other branches of business happened to buy a single promissory note he was to be considered, in contemplation of the law, a broker?

Mr. PETERS. Not precisely that; but that if a man bought or sold one piece of paper, and held himself in readiness to buy or sell more, although his transactions might be ever so limited, it constituted a business as a broker.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I understand, then, that the ruling was that where a man buys two or three promissory notes, that is to be considered the business of that man.

Mr. PETERS. That that constitutes him a broker within the meaning of the law, and the construction is that he may be a broker and a wholesale dealer and a retail dealer and a liquor dealer, that he may combine twenty different sorts of business, on which he is obliged to pay a distinct license in each case. I say there is a hardship in compelling the man engaging in this business in a small way in a country town to pay the same amount as is paid by the man who carries on business to the extent of millions.

Mr. SCHENCK. He does not pay the same.

Mr. PETERS. Well, I will say, as the man making brokerage his only and large business. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio will prevail. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WELKER. I renew the amendment to the amendment. Since offering my amendment I have turned to the section of the bill regulating the tax on brokers, and I do not see that that will equalize this taxation at all; it is an additional tax. This paragraph of the bill starts off by charging $100 tax upon all classes of brokers. Then on page 168 provision is made for a certain percentage of taxation upon the amount of business that may be done in the purchase and sale of coin, bullion, promissory notes, &c. This of course will compel the man doing a large business to pay more tax than one doing a small business. But the starting point is wrong. We propose to tax as a broker doing a regular business the man living in a village who happens in the course of the year to buy two or three promissory notes. The assessors have always been construing this law as covering that class of transactions in our small towns. If a man buys two or three promissory notes in the course of a year, it is considered as so far his business, and they have required this class of men to take a broker's license. Now, I do think that $100 is too much to be required from this class. Certainly there ought to be some limitation; and if my amendment be not agreed to, there ought to be provided for this small class of brokers some lower tax than that provided for in this bill. I think my amendment would be fair and equitable; for when brokers transact a large business they must necessarily pay more tax under the other provision of the bill.

I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

On the amendment of Mr. WELKER, there were—ayes 47, noes 28; no quorum voting.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am willing that the amendment shall be regarded as agreed to. We can have a vote in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the amendment will be considered agreed to.

There was no objection.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I renew the amendment I offered before, modified as follows:

In line fifty-two, after the word "business," insert "wholly or in part," so it will read:

Every person whose business, wholly or in part, it is to negotiate purchases or sales of stocks, &c.

Mr. WELKER. I rise to a question of order. I believe my amendment is agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. This is an independent amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARNES. I move to strike out "for himself and others" and insert "for others than himself."

Mr. Chairman, I am inclined to think that all taxation of this class of business will operate beneficially. There are gentlemen connected with the business of brokers in the large cities who are among the most respected members of society, yet there are others whom it is no interest of the Government to support by legislation. If I may be allowed to use the expression I would say that there are a large number of men among brokers who are considered a nuisance to the trade. There are men without capital to insure the safe fulfillment of their engagements or for the custody of money put into their hands. There are men without reputation relying upon the introduction of friends to secure capital. There are men without reputation of any kind. The severe taxation of such men would be beneficial.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope that amendment will not be adopted.

The amendment was rejected.

No further amendment being offered, the Clerk read the next paragraph, as follows:

Commercial brokers shall each pay twenty dollars. Any person whose business it is, for others, to negotiate sales or purchases of goods, wares, or merchandise, or to negotiate freights and other business for the owners of vessels, or for the shippers or consignors or consignees of freight carried by vessels, shall be regarded as a commercial broker.

Mr. SCHENCK. At the commencement of the second sentence I move to strike out "any" and insert "every."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move after the word "merchandise" to insert—

Or to sell or to offer for sale as the agent of any merchant, commercial house, or manufacturer residing within the United States, goods, wares, or merchandise by samples, or as agent to solicit, receive, or transmit orders for goods, wares, or merchandise for any merchant, commercial house, or manufacturer within the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

No further amendment being offered, the Clerk read the next paragraph, as follows:

Foreign commercial brokers shall each pay a special tax of $5,000. Every person who makes it his business to sell or offer for sale, by samples or otherwise, goods, wares, or merchandise of any description, as the agent of any merchant, commercial house, or manufacturer, residing or being without the limits of the United States, or to negotiate in any manner for such sale to be made by any such merchant, commercial house, or manufacturer abroad, or to solicit, receive, or transmit orders to such merchant, commercial house, or manufacturer abroad, shall be regarded as a foreign commercial broker. Every foreign commercial broker shall be required by the assessor or assistant assessor of every collection district in which he may so sell, or offer for sale, or negotiate for the sale of, or solicit, receive, or transmit orders for goods, wares, or merchandise, for or to any such merchant, commercial house, or manufacturer, residing or being without the limits of the United States, to produce the receipt showing that the special tax herein provided for has been duly paid to the assessor of some district within the United States within the current year; and if it shall appear that such tax has not been paid, or has not been paid within thirty days after the 1st day of May in such year, or upon such neglect or refusal to produce such tax receipt when so demanded by the proper officer, the party so delinquent shall be liable to a penalty of $10,000, and shall, on conviction, be fined not less than $10,000 nor more than $50,000, or imprisoned not less than six months nor more than two years: Provided, That no person shall be regarded as a foreign commercial broker within the meaning and for the purposes of this act who, being a retail dealer, wholesale dealer, commercial broker, or manufacturer in the United States, pays the special tax as such and makes returns of the amount of his sales for assessment for the payment of any additional tax as required by law.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend by striking out in lines sixty-four and sixty-five the words "shall pay a special tax of $5,000," and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

Whose actual sales do not exceed $1,000,000, shall each pay a special tax of $5,000; and when exceeding $1,000,000, shall pay in addition five dollars for every $1,000 for sales in excess of $1,000,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move further to strike out the word "assessor" and insert "collector."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move further to strike out the words "or has not been paid within thirty days after the 1st day of May in such year."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. I would like the chairman of the committee to explain why he places the special tax on foreign commercial brokers at such a high figure. I understand the present law does not tax them at all. This is a pretty strong beginning.

Mr. SCHENCK. There is a class of men to be found in all large cities, especially in New York, who represent foreign manufacturers and foreign commercial houses. They have no local habitation or name. They have no place of business. They are a species of drummers upon a very large scale. They take each of them a room for a few days at the Astor House, again at the Fifth Avenue hotel, and again at the Continental at Philadelphia, and by exhibiting samples, taking orders, and negotiating sales upon the samples and the credentials they show, they do a business of millions of dollars. Millions upon millions are sold in this way without these foreign manufacturers or commercial houses paying one cent of tax to the United States. The consequence is that they come into competition with settled and fixed traders in this country and with settled brokers in this country who pay their regular tax. Now, the object of this provision is to compel these men to come to roost, to constrain them to open business houses and do a regular business, to give an account of their sales and pay as other commercial traders do, or else on their peril refuse to pay the very large special tax which we impose upon them, which is about the only way we have of reaching them. For that purpose the gentleman will see we have in the case of these roving people gone a little further than in other cases, and require them upon the demand of an assessor to show that they have somewhere within the United States in some collection district paid this heavy tax and are entitled to carry on this large trade in the country; and in default of that go to the penitentiary.

Mr. BLAINE. Is not this tax one which may be very easily evaded? A man reaches New York, and if he makes his sales he finds he has to pay $5,000. Can he not easily employ some person who had paid a fifty dollar or $100 tax to do all this business?

Mr. SCHENCK. Very possibly; but then the trader he employs being a known person, must make his returns, and we thus get the tax.

Mr. BLAINE. But you do not get the $5,000.

Mr. SCHENCK. No; but we get nothing from these men now at all. The object is to drive them either to become settled traders themselves, thus coming into competition with our people, or else employ in this country settled known traders who pay their tax in the regular way.

Mr. BARNES. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. So far as New York city is concerned, I am not aware that this class of persons do as he has represented; and as to their having no places of business in New York, they have lofts as well as other places where they are engaged in their business, and I think it is a great hardship to impose a higher tax on them than on wholesale dealers. If you require them to pay as wholesale dealers upon their sales or orders, it would be right and just. In several instances they have paid a license as commercial brokers. There is a large number in the city of New York, and this will drive them out entirely.

Mr. SCHENCK. The difficulty is that they do not pay a tax as wholesale dealers, or if they do they will escape this rigorous law. All they have to do to escape the rigor of this law is to become, as I said before, regular dealers in the country. But as it is now they pay nothing at all. And so far from there not being just such a class of men as I have described in the city of New York, I suppose if I have received one letter, I have received a score of letters thanking the Committee of Ways and Means for having made this provision for the defense of regular dealers as against these roving chaps with commissions from manufacturers and traders abroad.

Mr. STEWART. The difficulty is that you will drive all this trade into the hands of the importers. The large houses like Stewart & Co., and Claffin, Mellen & Co., have agents abroad whom they pay for staying there and ordering goods for them. The manufacturers abroad have agents in New York city and in other cities to solicit orders and they are merely acting as agents to the parties abroad who fill the orders. Now, by this provision you will drive that branch of trade out of the country.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman will observe that this applies only to agents who are the agents of foreign commercial houses and foreign manufacturers, and not to the representatives of our own legitimate traders.

The Clerk read the next paragraph, as follows:

Custom-house brokers shall each pay ten dollars. Every person whose business it is, as the agent of others, to arrange entries and other custom-house papers, or to transact business at any port of entry relating to the importation or exportation of goods, wares, or merchandise, shall be regarded as a custom-house broker.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to offer the following amendment:

Page 97, line ninety-nine, strike out the word "ten" and insert in lieu thereof "twenty;" so that it will read: "Custom-house brokers shall each pay twenty dollars."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next paragraph was read, as follows:

Insurance agents, whose annual receipts from fees and commissions do not exceed $2,000, shall each pay ten dollars; when exceeding $2,000, shall each pay twenty dollars. Every person who, for pay, shall act as agent to negotiate or procure insurance for any fire, marine, life, mutual, or other insurance company or companies authorized by any law of the United States or of any State, shall be regarded as an insurance agent.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I offer the following amendment:

Page 97, line one hundred and six, after the word "commissions" insert the words "exceed $500 and;" so that it will read: "Insurance agents, whose annual receipts from fees and commissions exceed $500 and do not exceed $2,000, shall each pay ten dollars."

Mr. ALLISON. There is no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARNES. I would like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means how in this particular instance they propose to ascertain the amount of receipts of insurance agents? So far as my knowledge extends they are generally a class of itinerants and do business for a large number of companies, and their statistics are in their pockets or in their heads. I make the inquiry for information, and if the suggestion which I make is correct I think the clause had better be amended so as to fix a specified tax which shall apply to them as individuals instead of a tax on their receipts.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman will find that there is a general section farther along in the bill providing that monthly returns shall be made in all these cases. As a matter of course there may be difficulty with itinerant persons, but there is the same law now.

Mr. BARNES. In order that this matter may be further discussed I move to strike out "$2,000" and insert "$3,000" in lieu thereof. I desire to say that probably nine tenths of the insurance done in the city of New York is done by agents—by agents who travel from one office to another and solicit this business from large houses, who do their insurance business almost entirely through agents. Almost every commercial house has an agent who calls regularly, keeping an account of the expiration of their policies and the issuing of new ones. The agent attends to the business at the agencies of the different insurance companies in that city. No way suggests itself to my mind by which the amount received in individual cases can be traced or arrived at. If there is any answer to this, to show how the Government is to obtain a revenue from this source, I would be pleased to hear it; I will not press my amendment, but will withdraw it. No further amendment was offered.

The next paragraph was read as follows:

Foreign insurance agents shall each pay fifty dollars. Every person who shall act as agent to negotiate or procure insurance for any foreign fire, marine, life, mutual, or other insurance company or companies, shall be regarded as a foreign insurance agent.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I move to amend this paragraph by striking out "fifty dollars" and inserting "$100."

The amendment was agreed to.

No further amendment was offered.

The next paragraph was read as follows:

Auctioneers, whose annual sales do not exceed $10,000, shall each pay ten dollars; and if exceeding $10,000 and not exceeding $25,000, shall each pay twenty dollars; and if exceeding $25,000, shall each pay fifty dollars, and two dollars, in addition, for every $1,000 in excess of $25,000. Every person shall be deemed an auctioneer whose business it is to offer property at public sale to the highest or best bidder: Provided, That the provisions of this paragraph shall not apply to judicial or executive officers making auction sales by virtue of any judgment or decree of any court, nor public sales made by or for executors, administrators, or guardians of any estate held by them as such.

Mr. STEWART. I move to strike out the proviso of this paragraph, for the purpose of inquiring of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. SCHENCK] the object of inserting this provision here? So far as the city of New York is concerned, where such sales are made, they are usually made by auctioneers who charge the purchaser a certain percentage upon the amount of sales. I do not know how it is in other parts of the country.

Mr. HIGBY. Sales on execution?

Mr. STEWART. Yes; and I think that is so generally throughout the State. However, I will not press my amendment, but withdraw it. No further amendment was offered.

The next paragraph was read, as follows:

Real estate agents, whose annual receipts from fees and commissions do not exceed $2,000 shall each pay ten dollars, and if exceeding $2,000, shall pay in addition five dollars for every $1,000 in excess of $2,000. Every person whose business it is, for others, to sell or offer for sale real estate, or to rent houses, stores, or other buildings or real estate, or to collect rent, except lawyers paying a special tax as such, shall be regarded as a real estate agent.

Mr. BENTON. I move to amend this paragraph by striking out "five dollars" and inserting "ten dollars," so that that portion will read, "shall pay in addition ten dollars for every $1,000 in excess of $2,000." I think that is a very reasonable tax. When a person makes sales and receives fees and commissions to the amount of $2,000, he can better afford to pay ten dollars for every $1,000 over $2,000 than he could to pay five dollars upon the first $1,000. It seems to me that the rate of tax should be increased as the business increases. I think this is so plain that it requires no argument.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman proposes to make the tax one per cent. The committee proposed to make it one half of one per cent.

Mr. BENTON. A man who can make four or five thousand dollars in this business can well afford to pay one per cent.

The question was then taken upon the amendment of Mr. BENTON; and upon a division there were—ayes twelve, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. MILLER. I move to amend the paragraph by inserting after the words "whose annual receipts from fees and commissions," the words "exceed $300 and;" so that it will read, "whose annual receipts from fees and commissions exceed $300 and do not exceed $2,000." It seems to me that there can be no objection to this amendment. One whose business does not amount to $300 is hardly worth taxing.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BARNES. I move to amend the first sentence of this paragraph by striking out the words "whose annual receipts from fees and commissions do not exceed $2,000 shall each pay ten dollars, and if exceeding $2,000, shall pay in addition five dollars for every $1,000 in excess of $2,000," and inserting in lieu thereof the words, "shall each pay $100;" so that it will read "real estate agents shall each pay $100." And I submit the same suggestions which I offered in regard to insurance agents. There is no known way, so far as I can understand, by which any amount of revenue can be derived from this class of individuals.

The business done by them is very large, especially in cities; and if they could be reached a considerable amount of revenue might be derived from them. But it is well known that there is no practicable way by which one dollar in a hundred which that class of individuals receive can ever be taxed. I think this paragraph should be amended so as to afford a reasonable amount of revenue or else be stricken out entirely.

Mr. PILE. A real-estate agent in the city of St. Louis, where I live, has his regular office and makes his returns regularly. I think the tax should be graded upon them in proportion to what they make, as it is in the case of other classes of business men, agents, and dealers. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

The amendment of Mr. BARNES was not agreed to.

No further amendment was offered.

The next paragraph was read, as follows:

Produce brokers shall each pay ten dollars. Every person other than one having paid the special tax as a commercial broker, or cattle broker, or wholesale or retail dealer, or peddler, whose business it is, for others, to negotiate sales or purchase of agricultural or farm products exclusively, shall be regarded as a produce broker.

No amendment was offered.

The next paragraph was read, as follows:

Pawnbrokers, using or employing in their business a capital not exceeding $50,000, shall each pay $100, and if exceeding $50,000, shall pay, in addition, four dollars for every $1,000 so used in excess of $50,000. Every person whose business or occupation it is to take or receive, by way of pledge or pawn, any goods, wares, or merchandise, or any kind of personal property, as security for the repayment of money, shall be deemed a pawnbroker.

No amendment was offered.

The next paragraph was read, as follows:

Claim agents and patent agents shall each pay twenty-five dollars. Every person whose business it is to prosecute claims in any of the Executive Departments of the Government, or to solicit or procure patents, shall be deemed a claim agent or a patent agent, as the case may be.

Mr. ELA. I move to amend by striking out the first sentence of the paragraph just read, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

Claim agents and patent agents whose annual receipts from fees do not exceed $1,000, shall pay ten dollars; if exceeding $1,000 and not exceeding $2,000, twenty dollars; if exceeding $2,000, thirty dollars.

Mr. Chairman, there are some sections of the country where there is not enough business done by claim agents to warrant the payment of a tax of twenty-five dollars, yet where it will be a great inconvenience if those requiring the services of this class of agents are required to go as far as they will be compelled to go if there be no smaller rates of tax than twenty-five dollars. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not know that there is any objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next paragraph was read, as follows:

Patent-right dealers shall each pay ten dollars. Every person whose business it is to sell or offer for sale patent-rights, shall be regarded as a patent-right dealer.

No amendment was offered.

The next paragraph was read, as follows:

Intelligence-office keepers shall each pay ten dollars. Every person whose business it is to find or furnish places of employment for others, or to find or furnish servants, shall be regarded as an intelligence-office keeper.

No amendment was offered.

The next paragraph was read, as follows:

Express carriers shall each pay ten dollars. Every person engaged in the carrying or delivery of money, valuable papers, or any articles for pay, or doing an express business, whose gross receipts therefrom exceed the sum of $1,000 per annum, shall be regarded as an express carrier: Provided, That such tax shall be imposed but once upon any person in respect to business done by such person on a continuous route, and shall be required only from the principal in such business; and draymen and teamsters owning only one dray or team shall be exempt from such tax.

No amendment was offered.

The next paragraph was read, as follows:

Peddlers, when traveling with more than two horses or mules, shall be rated as of the first class, and shall each pay fifty dollars; when traveling by boat, or with two horses or mules, as of the second class, and shall each pay thirty dollars; when traveling with one horse or mule, as of the third class, and shall each pay fifteen dollars; when traveling on foot or by public conveyance, as of the fourth class, and shall each pay ten dollars. Every person whose business it is to travel from place to place to sell or offer for sale, at retail, goods, wares, or other commodities, shall be regarded as a peddler; but peddlers of the third and fourth class, who sell only charcoal, newspapers, books, magazines, the products of their own farms or gardens, fish, shell-fish, pies, cakes, nuts, fruit, or confectionary, shall be exempt from a special tax. Any peddler who sells, or offers for sale jewelry, or dry goods, either foreign or domestic, in the original package, whether traveling on foot or otherwise, shall be rated as of the first class, and shall pay fifty dollars. No peddler shall sell, or offer for sale, any distilled spirits, fermented liquors, or wines. A manufacturer or producer of any article, except distilled spirits, who may by himself or his agent, and by his own conveyance, deliver the same at places other than the place of manufacture, shall not, by reason of such delivery only, be regarded as a peddler.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend by striking out in the paragraph just read the sentence, "No peddler shall sell or offer for sale any distilled spirits, fermented liquors, or wines," and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

And any peddler who sells or offers for sale distilled spirits, fermented liquors, or wines, shall pay, in addition to the special tax of the class in which he is rated, the special tax of a wholesale or retail liquor dealer according to the amount of his sales.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move further to amend by striking out the word "only," the sixth word from the end of the paragraph.

The amendment was agreed to.

No further amendment being offered, the next paragraph was read, as follows:

Lottery managers shall each pay $3,000. Every person who shall own or manage any lottery or prepare any schemes for lotteries, or own, hire, or have the control or enjoyment of any lottery grant, franchise, or privilege, or make or devise, or issue to be sold by others, any lottery tickets or fractional parts thereof, or any token, certificate, or device, representing or intended to represent a lottery ticket or any fractional part thereof, or any policy or combination of numbers in any lottery, or the evidence in any form of any chance or interest in the drawing of any lottery, shall be regarded as a lottery manager.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend by striking out in the second sentence of the paragraph just read the words "own or," and also the word "own;" so that it will read:

Every person who shall manage any lottery or prepare any scheme for lotteries, or hire, or have the control or enjoyment of any lottery grant, franchise, or privilege, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move further to amend by inserting after the word "lottery," in line two hundred and twelve, the words, "or who shall be a backer or guarantor for the payment of bets or wagers won or amounts lost upon any scheme or policy of numbers or on the drawing of any number or numbers in any lottery."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BROOMALL. I move to further amend by adding at the end of the paragraph the following:

Provided, That nothing in this act contained shall be so construed as to authorize the establishment or management of any lottery or the sale of any lottery policies or tickets in any State where the same is prohibited by the laws of such State.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have no objection to that. It is only reenacting the law as declared by the Supreme Court.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. In section ninety-six, on page 130 of the bill, the gentleman will find a provision covering the same ground as his amendment.

Mr. BROOMALL. I find that is so. I withdraw the amendment.

No further amendment was offered.

The next paragraph was read, as follows:

Dealers in lottery tickets shall each pay $100. Every person who shall sell, or offer for sale, lottery tickets, or fractional parts thereof, or any token, certificate, or device representing or intended to represent a lottery ticket, or any fractional part thereof, or any policy or combination of numbers in any lottery, or the evidence in any form of any chance or interest in the drawing of any lottery, shall be regarded as a dealer in lottery tickets.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend by inserting before the words "shall be regarded," near the close of the paragraph, the following words:

Or who shall make, receive, or record as a writer, or in any other way, either with or without backers, any wager or bet on the drawing of any number or numbers in any lottery.

The amendment was agreed to.

No further amendment being offered, the Clerk read the next paragraph, as follows:

Proprietors of gift enterprises shall each pay $500. Every person who shall sell or offer for sale any real estate or article of merchandise of any description, or any ticket of admission to any exhibition or performance, with a promise, expressed or implied, to give or bestow any article or thing to the purchaser of such real estate, merchandise, or ticket, or shall in any manner hold out the promise of gift or bestowal of any article or thing, shall be regarded as a proprietor of a gift enterprise. No such proprietor, in consequence of being thus taxed, shall be exempt from paying any other tax imposed by law, and the special tax herein required shall be in addition thereto.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to strike out the words "or implied, to give or bestow any," and insert "implied or contingent, to give or bestow."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee of the Whole, in pursuance of the order of the House, will now take a recess until half past seven o'clock to-night.

The committee accordingly (at four o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) took a recess until half past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

At half past seven o'clock the House reassembled in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 1060) to reduce into one act and to amend the laws relating to internal taxes.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no amendment pending, and the Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read the next paragraph, as follows:

Architects and civil engineers shall each pay ten dollars. Every person whose business it is to plan, design, or superintend the construction of buildings, ships, roads, bridges, canals, or railroads, shall be regarded as an architect and civil engineer: Provided, That this shall not include a practical carpenter who plans only the building on which he labors.

No amendment being offered, the Clerk read the next paragraph, as follows:

Builders and contractors shall each pay ten dollars. Every person whose business it is, by contract, to construct buildings, vessels, bridges, wharves, canals, turnpikes or railroads, or to remove buildings, and whose receipts from such contracts exceed $2,500 in any one year, shall be regarded as a builder and contractor.

No amendment being offered, the Clerk read the next paragraph, as follows:

Plumbers and gas-fitters shall each pay as retail or wholesale dealers, according to the amount of their annual sales. Every person whose business it is to fit, furnish, or sell plumbing materials, gas-pipes, gas-burners, or other gas-fittings, shall be regarded as a plumber and gas-fitter.

No amendment being offered, the Clerk read as follows:

Assayers, assaying gold or silver of a value not exceeding in one year $250,000, shall each pay $100, and $200 when the value exceeds $250,000, and $500 when the value exceeds $500,000. Any person whose business it is to separate gold or silver from other metals or mineral substances with which such gold or silver, or both, are alloyed or combined, or to ascertain and determine the quantity of gold or silver in any ore, alloy, or combination with other metals, shall be deemed an assayer.

Mr. HIGBY. I move to strike out the last sentence.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that portion of the paragraph should be stricken out. It does not well enough define the business referred to. A person in what is called the quartz mining business, who separates the dross from the gold, which makes it the pure article, may be an assayer under this definition. If there is any member of the Committee of Ways and Means here, I would like to know whether this is the language of the present law in the definition of an assayer?

Mr. MAYNARD. It is in substance the same as the law now is.

Mr. HIGBY. The gentleman says the language is the same in substance. I want the language to be precisely the same, so that there shall be no mistake about it. It reads here as though a certain class of miners might be construed to be assayers.

Mr. MAYNARD. I find the language of the present law is precisely the same.

Mr. STEWART. The word "occupation" is omitted.

Mr. MAYNARD. The law reads "business or occupation." It is substantially the same.

Mr. HIGBY. I withdraw my amendment.

No further amendment being offered, the Clerk read the next paragraph, as follows:

Miners shall each pay ten dollars. Every person who shall employ others in the business of mining for coal, or for gold, silver, copper, lead, iron, zinc, spelter, or other minerals, not having paid the tax therefor as a manufacturer, and whose receipts from such business shall annually exceed $1,000, shall be regarded as a miner.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I move an amendment from the committee by striking out the words "not having paid the tax therefor as a manufacturer."

Mr. HIGBY. I rise to oppose the amendment. I would like to have some explanation of it.

Mr. MAYNARD. The explanation of the amendment is this: that the words are simply surplusage; they mean nothing, because we tax no manufacturers.

Mr. HIGBY. You did in the original law.

Mr. MAYNARD. This is simply a transcript from the original law, and inasmuch as the manufacturers are not now taxed the words have no meaning.

Mr. HIGBY. Then I understand that under this bill the manufacturer is not taxed, whereas he was before.

Mr. MAYNARD. No manufacturer is taxed under the present law.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HIGBY. I move to strike out the whole section. It is true that we have heretofore submitted on the Pacific coast to a tax on mining, but it was not done in the light of justice to this class of men. We submitted to it together with the other taxes. That upon gold was placed at one half of one per cent. But it was at a time when the country was in trouble, when the rebellion was at its height, and we were not disposed to be so particular at that time with reference to these things as we are now. I hold that there ought to be no such burden imposed upon the business of mining for gold or silver. These men pay their income tax the same as all other people. They have to pay, like those engaged in the business of manufacturing, a license in order to mine for gold and silver. Public policy dictates that there should be no such restraint upon mining for gold and silver.

Another thing: gold and silver that are taken from the earth by the process of mining have a fixed value, while the products of manufacturing establishments have added to the price of the manufacture the amount of the license. But the man who takes gold and silver from the mines can do nothing of the kind. Gold has a fixed value when it is in bullion as well as when it is in coin. It is not to be lessened, it is not to be increased. The policy has been advocated in all these tax measures that the manufacturer of an article could pay the amount of the tax and charge it over to his customers who purchase from him. That has been the argument advanced. But as a manner of public policy there should be no manner of restraint whatever upon the business of mining for gold and silver. Not only as a matter of public policy, but as a matter of principle this House should not put any restraint whatever on a business of this kind. These men pay their income tax and all the other taxes. This is made a specialty. It is not a manufacturing business; it cannot be considered in that light.

Mr. MAYNARD. I regret exceedingly the necessity which is imposed upon us to insist upon this tax. It is an unpleasant necessity that we are laboring under to impose it. This section is simply taken from the law as it has stood for years. I am told it has been opposed every year when brought up on substantially the same ground as it is at present, so that we have a repetition of previous criticisms. This does not impose a tax, it will be observed, upon the laborer who goes into the bowels of the earth, digs the mineral treasure there, and brings it to the surface. It is a tax simply upon the capitalist who is engaged in that business, and has his capital invested in the employment of labor in that kind of business. The section does not limit its provisions, it will be observed, to the mining of gold and silver, but it extends as well to coal, to copper, to lead, to iron, zinc, and spelter, and every other mining interest through the country, and this simply provides with reference to those who engage in this business with their capital in the employment of labor and the other instrumentalities by which great enterprises are carried on, the same taxation that we impose upon capital that is employed in the other useful and industrial pursuits of the country. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. WOODWARD. I rise to support the amendment of the gentleman from California.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on that amendment.

Mr. HIGBY. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. WOODWARD. I move to amend the paragraph by inserting after the word "mining," in the two hundred and sixty-third line, the words "but who does not himself actually work at mining;" so that it will read:

Miners shall each pay ten dollars. Every person who shall employ others in the business of mining but who does not himself actually work at mining for coal, or for gold, silver, copper, lead, iron, zinc, spelter, or other minerals, not having paid the tax therefor as a manufacturer, and whose receipts from such business shall annually exceed $1,000, shall be regarded as a miner.

Mr. Chairman, I do not know that this incorrigible majority can be conciliated so as to allow any amendment to this bill. I do not know but that we have got to take this bill as it comes from the committee without improving it at all. I have no doubt that the committee have taken great pains to perfect the bill. I have no doubt they combine a considerable amount of knowledge in regard to the business of the country; but I think they did not understand the business of coal-mining when they put this provision in this form.

Now, I wish the committee to understand that in the district in which I dwell, the principal business is the mining of anthracite coal. The way in which it is done is this: the coal mines are owned either by large proprietors or by corporations. They are sometimes leased, sometimes worked by the owners. But those mines, which are approached by various chambers or adits, are worked by miners who are employed by the lessees or the corporation, and these master miners employ under them subordinate miners. The master miners, going into the mines with their subordinates, working diligently day by day with them, necessarily superintending the work and actually conducting it themselves, for the safety of all parties and for the good of the mine, because mining is an art which must be conducted by men skilled in it or you bring the whole down on your head; these master miners are the actual employers of the mining labor, and under this section they are taxed, whereas there is no more reason for taxing these master miners than there is for taxing the merest coal-heaver.

Now, the committee evidently did not intend to tax the laborer and yet they have done so by the phraseology of this section, and my amendment is designed to take that consequence out of their provision.

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to ask the gentleman a question for information. This is the law as it now stands and has stood for some time. Does the gentleman say that the law has operated unfavorably on this class of persons? Is he reasoning a priori or a posteriori?

Mr. WOODWARD. I do not pretend to know how many miners have been annoyed by what you say is the law as it stands. I know that the mining interest of my region is greatly oppressed, and I know that when you lay a tax upon the day laborer in a coal mine who is not permitted to earn more than $1,000 a year for the support of himself and his family you are laying a tax upon the very party which this committee evidently did not intend to tax. That is my point. Now, my amendment simply defines the actual miner. I propose to insert after the word "mining" the words "but who does not himself actually work at mining," so as to exempt the man who does actually work himself at mining. That is the effect of my amendment.

Mr. MAYNARD. Does any man who works at mining himself receive $1,000 a year for his labor?

Mr. WOODWARD. Oh, certainly. Why, during the war miners made $100 a month and more by their work.

Mr. MAYNARD. How is it now?

Mr. WOODWARD. It is very much lower, of course.

Mr. BLAINE. I will inform the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] that they can do it now.

Mr. WOODWARD. A thousand dollars a year sometimes is but a small compensation. But it is earned—and that is my point—by his actual, manual labor at mining. The committee certainly do not intend to tax him; but they have done so, so far as this paragraph stands. If my amendment is adopted that difficulty will be obviated.

Mr. MULLINS. I rise to oppose the amendment. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WOODWARD] desires to effect the object he states he has in view, I do not see that he will accomplish it by the amendment he has offered. The sum total of his proposition is that those who do not labor in the mine shall pay the tax. Now, that may be stretched out so as to reach even me in Tennessee, although I never saw a mine. Now, I can see the object aimed at; but I think some other amendment would be better. I cannot go in for this amendment, for you will not get a single man taxed under it. They will run in the mine, do a day's work this month, another day's work next month, perhaps one in a year will save them, and thereby no tax will be levied on any of them.

Mr. WOODWARD. Mining cannot be done in that way.

Mr. MULLINS. I know to what extent men are able to dodge these taxes. They dodge the tax on liquor; and when they can do so that so easily as they do, it will be easy for them to evade this tax by working an hour, and then declare that they have been actually laboring themselves, and expect to work to-morrow. The proper way is to put a tax on the sales of coal, and then you will have them. If you do not intend to tax any individual for his actual labor in mining, then tax the privilege of putting the product of the mines upon the market. And when you have done that, put the tax on a sliding scale, make it a percentage tax, and then you will get every farthing of it if they will only swear the truth; if they do not, then they will be guilty of perjury. Now, I presume the greater part of them are honest and will come square up to the mark. Tax the sales, and then you will get every dollar.

Mr. WOODWARD. I withdraw my amendment if my colleague [Mr. CAKE] will renew it.

Mr. CAKE. I will renew the amendment. I think I can show this committee such reasons as will induce them to agree to the amendment. What my colleague [Mr. WOODWARD] has stated is exactly right. The reason this tax should not be so levied is this: you cannot levy this tax and collect it of all miners alike. If they have ordinary luck there are none of them who cannot make at least $1,000 a year, and many of them more. The tax must be collected in advance if you collect it at all. You collect this ten dollars tax in advance; then the operations of the mines might run against the miners, and they would fail to make a living. That often happens in the coal region. All those miners who make over $1,000 are assessed. That is done under the law as it now stands. These men are contractors, not mere laborers. They employ men to work in the mines. When they take a contract they always employ laborers to carry out their contract. If everything is right they sometimes make a great deal of money. Just at this time they are not making so much. I therefore hope the Committee of the Whole will adopt the amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope gentlemen will not lose sight of the fact that all this is, or is attempted to be, established as a system, and a system which shall result in equality all around. The object is to tax those who employ capital.

In the first place, there are all the manufacturers of the country, they having special taxes imposed upon them, and also taxes upon the sales of their commodities. Then we tax the dealers in something like the same proportion. Then, between these there lie classes of persons who can be regarded neither as dealers nor as manufacturers, but who employ, in one shape or another, capital, who enjoy the protection of the Government, and who are reasonably expected to contribute to its support, such as builders—

Mr. WOODWARD. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. When he speaks of taxing those who employ labor does he mean to include a head miner who selects his men to go and work in the gangway of a mine?

Mr. SCHENCK. No, sir; not if he works as a foreman for others; but if he be a contractor, an owner, or a lessee of a mine, employing others to work for him, carrying on a business in which he employs others, we regard him as a miner. We do not propose to tax the laborer. It is the same principle as that on which we tax the builder or the contractor for building houses or bridges. We do not tax the carpenter or the joiner who actually does the work, unless he be in the capacity of a head workman, not employed himself, but employing others.

Then there are photographers; there are assayers, and various other classes. There are the professional men, such as lawyers, physicians, dentists, and there are the confectioners and the apothecaries—classes of men who do not fall within the description of dealers nor within the description of manufacturers, but who yet employ capital.

Now, sir, this objection to taxing miners, as if they were to stand upon a different footing from everybody else employing capital or hiring others, or engaging in profitable enterprises, has been made here each successive year for five years; and I suppose that if we should have bills of this character for ten, fifteen, or twenty years to come, we should every year have the same thing repeated. I do not know any reason why those whose business lies beneath the surface of the earth should be favored in any way more than those whose occupation is above the surface of the earth. The object is to tax those who employ others in pursuits involving the investment of capital.

Mr. WOODWARD. But do not themselves labor.

Mr. SCHENCK. But do not themselves labor; or, if they labor, labor only with their workmen to encourage and stimulate them. I suppose that in this democratic country of ours there are very few manufacturers who have not begun upon a small scale by being first apprentices, then journeymen, then master mechanics, and finally attaining positions at the head of establishments where they own capital and hire others; and yet, with the habits of industry prevailing in this country, they often, even when they become wealthy, labor on with their own hands, in company with their journeymen and other employes. So it may be with the miners. The object is not to touch the laborer himself, but only him who employs labor. A small tax is proposed upon miners who, whether they labor themselves or not, employ others to dig the minerals or metals from the bowels of the earth, thus investing their capital in enterprises of that sort. We put them upon an equal footing with all other kinds of business.

Mr. CAKE. I would like to put a question to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means; but before doing so I desire the Clerk to read again the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line two hundred and sixty-three, after the word "mining," insert "but who does not himself actually work at mining."

Mr. CAKE. I ask the chairman of the committee whether he can possibly object to that amendment? It seems to me in entire harmony with his remarks.

Mr. WOODWARD. His own speech shows, I think, that he would not object to the amendment if he understood it.

On agreeing to the amendment there were—ayes 27, noes 43; no quorum voting.

Mr. RANDALL. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means had better consent to have a vote on this proposition in the House.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not know that this will make much difference. The tax collected last year was only $26,000.

Mr. HIGBY. I propose this because it does not amount to much.

The CHAIRMAN. No quorum voted.

Mr. ALLISON. I object to a vote being taken in the House, for that occupies time. We may as well settle the question here.

Mr. HIGBY. I withdraw the call for the division.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment, then, is rejected.

Mr. HIGBY. Is it in order to move to strike out the paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. HIGBY. I make that motion.

Mr. BROMWELL. I wish first to perfect the section. I move to strike out "$1,000" and insert "$3,000."

Mr. Chairman, it appears from this paragraph, and the ones which follow, that miners are to pay ten dollars when their business exceeds $1,000, and lawyers only ten dollars when their gross annual receipts for professional services exceed $3,000. Now, it strikes me that a lawyer can afford to pay on $1,000 as well as the miner. His business is certainly as sure and not liable to any greater vicissitudes.

Mr. ALLISON. I call the gentleman to order, as we are not on lawyers.

Mr. BROMWELL. I am not out of order. Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I call the gentleman's attention to the difference in the phraseology. It is any lawyers who do not exceed $3,000. If he makes only five dollars he has to pay this tax.

Mr. HIGBY. I hope this debate will go on in order.

Mr. BROMWELL. There is no difference between them. The miner is to pay ten dollars if his receipts amount to $1,000, but the lawyer may do business exceeding $2,900 and is only to pay ten dollars. Why should it not be the same in both cases? I think, inasmuch as it seems proper to make this provision for lawyers, the same provision should be applied to miners.

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire to inquire how the debate stands on this paragraph. Has any amendment been offered?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California has moved to strike out the section, and the gentleman from Illinois has moved to amend the section proposed to be stricken out.

Mr. SCHENCK. I doubt whether this cock will fight at all. [Laughter.] What is the provision? It is simply this: that each miner shall pay ten dollars if his business amounts to $1,000 or more, no matter how much more. The lawyer must pay ten dollars if his business does not exceed $3,000. If he only receives five dollars he has to pay the tax. So nothing of a democratic or demagogical character can be drawn from that. It will not answer at all. The argument is the other way.

Mr. BROMWELL. I will ask the gentleman whether it is not true that this bill provides that a lawyer may do a business of $2,900 and be compelled to pay only ten dollars?

Mr. SCHENCK. Yes, sir; and a miner may do $1,000,000. The miner is not to go above ten dollars. Now, rather than the committee shall be broken up I will agree that the amendment shall be considered as adopted and a vote taken in the House.

Mr. BROMWELL. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. MILLER. I renew it. I have only a word to say in regard to it. I only feel an interest about coal miners. I am not particularly interested in the other miners. The miner is to pay ten dollars if his business exceeds $1,000. Now, the objection I have to this is, these miners employ others to labor for them; their receipts may be $1,000; and yet when they pay their laborers they may not have $300 left. Our tax bills heretofore have never been in favor of taxing labor, and this does tax the laborer.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate on the pending paragraph.

Mr. HIGBY. I wish to understand what limit the gentlemen are going to allow to debate. I made a motion sometime ago to strike out, and I have had no opportunity to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion was discussed.

Mr. HIGBY. I have something to say on it. The CHAIRMAN. It was debated and opposed.

Mr. HIGBY. Then I ask to take a vote, for I made another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman cannot make a second amendment and retain the floor.

Mr. HIGBY. Then I will ask for a vote upon it.

The motion of Mr. ALLISON, that the committee rise, was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and Mr. BLAINE, as Speaker pro tempore, having taken the chair, Mr. POMEROY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 1060) to reduce into one act and to amend the laws relating to internal taxes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of Whole on the state of the Union on the tax bill; and pending that motion I move that all debate on the pending paragraph terminate in fifteen minutes after going into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HIGBY. I hope the gentleman will allow more than fifteen minutes.

The motion of Mr. SCHENCK was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 1060) to reduce into one act and to amend the laws relating to internal taxes.

Mr. COBB. I desired to get the floor some time ago in order to move an amendment or two, which I think would perfect this paragraph and make it understood by the people. But as I have not time now to perfect the amendment and say what I desired to, I will content myself with speaking to the motion of the gentleman from California, [Mr. HIGBY,] that the clause be stricken out. Now, I desire to state, in the hearing of this committee, that the tax collected from this source during the year 1867 was but $26,000, and in 1866 it was but $28,000. It will therefore be appreciated by the committee that it is but a small matter; nevertheless it is a tax which to a great extent discourages the business of mining.

Mr. Chairman, I know nothing of the business of mining for coal, but I represent a district which is largely interested, or was in former times, in mining for lead ore and zinc; and the idea of the chairman of the committee that capital is used in mining to a greater extent than in farming, or any of the ordinary avocations of life, is a great mistake. In the lead mines and in the gold mines generally very considerably less capital is employed per capita than is employed by farmers. The tools which the miner has to use do not cost half as much as those of the farmer. In mining it is nearly all labor. Therefore, this tax, small as it is, is a tax upon the labor, the sweat of the brow of the miner. I say this with a full knowledge that the paragraph contains words which seem to imply only those who employ others to mine shall be taxed. But such is not, in my humble opinion, the true construction of the section in regard to mining. The paragraph says miners shall pay ten dollars. One gentleman contends that these very words are qualified, and mean one kind of miners. Not so. It is claimed that it includes a class of men who are not themselves miners but who employ men to mine for them—that they shall be taxed as miners also.

Mr. HIGBY. Does it not include an individual who has his mine and employs a man with him?

Mr. COBB. Well, sir, doctors differ in regard to that. The committee last night said it did not.

Mr. HIGBY. You cannot give it any other construction.

Mr. COBB. I understand they do. I yield now to the gentleman from West Virginia, [Mr. HUBBARD,] who desires to say a few words.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. I want to make a single remark in connection with this paragraph. It has been asserted that it has been opposed at every session of Congress, and I say it has been very properly opposed, because it is not in harmony with the remainder of the bill. This is a tax upon persons who produce a raw material. The great purpose of the bill is to place taxes upon manufacturers. Those who take the raw material and put it into a more valuable shape are charged a tax for so doing. This paragraph taxes those who produce the raw material, and we might with as great propriety tax the agriculturist who grows the wheat or the man who sends individuals into the forest to cut timber and float it down to the lumber manufactory. It is a tax on the man who produces the raw material which is to be made more valuable by others.

I have a special objection to the tax upon mining for coal, because it is intimately connected with all other manufacturing pursuits as the producer of steam-power. You might with as much propriety tax the man who employs men to go into the forest to cut timber for fire-wood for fuel, because coal is a great element of fuel throughout the country; and as this paragraph is not in harmony with the rest of the bill I hope it will be the pleasure of the committee to strike it out.

The question was taken on striking out the paragraph; and there were—ayes 28, noes 33; no quorum voting.

Mr. SCHENCK. Rather than break up the committee I am willing that this amendment shall be voted on in the House.

Mr. HIGBY. I agree to that.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the amendment will be considered as agreed to.

The next paragraph was read, as follows:

Photographers shall each pay ten dollars. Any person who makes for sale photographs, ambrotypes, daguerreotypes, or any pictures by the action of light, shall be regarded as a photographer.

No amendments were offered, and the Clerk read as follows:

Lawyers, whose gross annual receipts for professional services do not exceed $3,000, shall each pay ten dollars; when exceeding $3,000, shall each pay twenty-five dollars. Every person who, for pay, shall prosecute or defend causes in any court of record of the United States, or of any State, or give legal opinion or advice, shall be regarded as a lawyer.

Mr. MAYNARD. I was requested by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PERERS,] who is not in his seat and who informed me that he would be unable to be here this evening, to suggest two amendments, one in line two hundred and seventy-five, on page 104, to strike out the words "for pay," and the other is in line two hundred and seventy-six, to insert after the words "defend causes" the words "or enter their appearance." The object of this last amendment is to reach a class of persons who, I understood him to say, in the courts of his country obtruded themselves among the profession to procure its honors and general dignities and franchises, getting in the way of other persons and they ought to pay in the same manner as those who actually and in good faith practice.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I rise to oppose the amendment. I object very much to striking out the words "for pay." The gentleman will see that as the paragraph will then stand, every person who gives a legal opinion or gives any advice to a friend will be regarded as a lawyer and must pay ten dollars. I think the words "for pay" are the essential part of the paragraph. Every person who gives advice to another has got to be taxed ten dollars. He cannot advise a friend without paying ten dollars. I hope the words "for pay" will be retained.

Mr. MAYNARD. There are really two amendments. I move first to strike out the words "for pay."

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. MAYNARD. I now move to insert after the word "causes" the words "or enter their appearance."

The amendment was disagreed to—ayes twenty, noes not counted.

Mr. BROOMALL. I move to strike out the whole paragraph, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

Lawyers, whose gross annual receipts for professional services do not exceed $3,000 shall each pay twenty-five dollars; when exceeding $3,000 shall each pay $100. Every person who for pay shall prosecute or defend causes in any court of record of the United States, or of any State, or give legal opinions, or advice shall be regarded as a lawyer: Provided, That this tax shall not be imposed upon any lawyer until after he has been admitted to the practice of law at least two years.

I have always thought the special tax imposed upon lawyers ridiculously low. I suppose this particular profession has been neglected on account of there having been so few lawyers in Congress since these special taxes arose. It strikes me that the only hardship of a special tax of even twenty-five dollars must be upon those who have just been admitted to the bar, and the committee will see by the provision that I have made that I do not propose to tax them until they have been admitted to practice for two years. If in that time a man cannot pay a tax of twenty-five dollars, I should consider that he had mistaken his vocation and had better go at something else.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend the substitute by inserting after the word "services" the words "shall exceed $500, and;" so that it will read: "lawyers, whose gross annual receipts for professional services shall exceed $500 and do not exceed $3,000." I think the profession can afford to pay that tax. It is a higher tax than most other men pay for exercising a profession; but it seems to me there should be an exception in favor of those with small incomes, as there are in all neighborhoods lawyers who, with great patience and plodding industry, accumulate but a few hundred dollars a year by their profession. They are never successful; but they like their profession, although during their whole lifetimes they make but a few hundred dollars a year. Those, however, whose fees amount to $1,500 or $2,000 a year can afford to pay the tax.

Mr. SPALDING. I think the tax on lawyers should be raised. The highest sum named in the substitute, I think, is $100. I move to double it, and make it $200, which I think is low enough.

Mr. ALLISON. Had not my friend better make the tax fifty per cent. of the gross receipts?

Mr. SPALDING. No, sir; I think my amendment is better.

The question was then taken upon the amendment of Mr. SPALDING; and it was not agreed to.

The question was then taken upon the amendment of Mr. HOLMAN; and it was not agreed to, upon a division—ayes fifteen, noes not counted.

The question was then taken upon the substitute of Mr. BROOMALL; and it was not agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER. I move to amend this paragraph by striking out the words "of record," so that the clause will read:

Every person who, for pay, shall prosecute or defend causes in any court of the United States, or of any State, or give legal opinions or advice, shall be regarded as a lawyer.

There are a large number of courts in our part of the country that are not courts of record technically, police courts, justice-of-the-peace courts, trial-justices' courts, where there is a very considerable practice. I do not think it will harm this paragraph to strike out the words "of record."

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not think it will either. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

The amendment of Mr. BUTLER was then agreed to.

Mr. MILLER. As it is conceded on all hands that young lawyers are generally very poor, I move to amend this paragraph by inserting after the word "services" the words "exceed $500 and;" so that it will read, "lawyers, whose gross annual receipts for professional services exceed $500 and do not exceed $3,000, shall each pay ten dollars," &c.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. EGGLESTON. I move to amend this paragraph by changing the amount of tax to be paid by lawyers from ten to twenty-five dollars, and from twenty-five to forty-five dollars. That will increase the tax a little on these professional gentlemen. I am satisfied there is no class of the community who can pay a tax more easily, and who will pay it more readily and not grumble at it, than these lawyers. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. SCHENCK] says that the object of the committee is to levy a tax upon capital. And as the capital of lawyers is brains, I think he will agree with me that the tax should be raised in this case. And I am satisfied that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] will make no objection to this increased tax being laid upon his profession.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am willing to compromise with my colleague, [Mr. EGGLESTON,] and vote for his amendment.

The question was then taken upon the amendment of Mr. EGGLESTON, and upon a division there were—ayes thirty, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

No further amendment was offered.

The next paragraph was read, as follows:

Conveyancers shall each pay five dollars. Every person other than one having paid the special tax as a lawyer or claim agent, who, for pay, draws deeds, bonds, mortgages, wills, writs, or other legal papers, or examines titles to real estate, shall be regarded as a conveyancer.

Mr. STEVENS, of New Hampshire. I move to amend by adding at the end of the paragraph just read the following:

Provided, That no license shall be required or tax imposed upon any conveyancer, unless his actual income therefrom shall amount to at least fifty dollars.

Mr. BLAINE. Say $100.

Mr. SCHENCK. The word "license" is not a proper word to be used, because the Supreme Court has decided that as licenses we cannot impose these taxes. The gentleman will accomplish his purpose by saying, "conveyancers whose receipts from their business exceed so much." In saying this I do not mean to indicate my intention to support the amendment; but I desire that the gentleman shall frame his amendment in such a form, that it will not, if adopted, mar the harmony of the bill.

Mr. STEVENS, of New Hampshire. I modify my amendment in the manner the gentleman suggests.

Mr. SCHENCK. I think that from those who do conveyancing for pay we ought to receive at least five dollars.

Mr. STEVENS, of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that thirty-five out of the sixty towns in my district have no licensed conveyancer and no practicing lawyer; and under the provision of this paragraph, if it be adopted, the inhabitants of those towns will not be able, without great inconvenience, to find persons to do for them the neighborly act, as it often is, of writing a deed or a will. I desire that this portion of the bill shall be so amended that the people of my district may not be obliged to travel six, eight, and in some cases, twenty miles to find a lawyer or conveyancer to draw a will or a deed. I do not know that I should say "conveyancer," because in New Hampshire we have no persons specially of that class. All the persons who follow conveyancing as a business take out licenses as lawyers.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Chairman, what the gentleman from New Hampshire states in regard to his district is true, I think, in regard to almost all the country districts in the United States. In half our towns there is neither lawyer nor professional conveyancer; and for the drawing of their deeds and other legal writings the people rely upon the justices of the peace and their neighbors. If every man who takes fifty cents for drawing a deed for his neighbor must pay this license, it will certainly operate as a hardship by compelling many a man, when he wants to execute a deed for an acre of land, to travel perhaps twenty miles to find a lawyer. I know perhaps a dozen of these justices of the peace in country towns whose entire gross receipts from this kind of business do not amount to ten dollars a year, and yet they do all the conveyancing for the towns in which they reside. I submit it is hardly fair to compel such men to pay this license.

The CHAIRMAN. No amendment is now before the committee. The amendment of the gentleman from New Hampshire, which was withdrawn for the purpose of modification, is not now in the possession of the Clerk.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move to amend by adding at the end of the paragraph the following:

Provided, That no license shall be required or tax imposed upon any conveyancer unless his annual income therefrom shall amount to at least fifty dollars.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I rise to a point of order. I submit that this amendment is not germane to this paragraph. The paragraph does not provide for any licenses.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order. The amendment is germane to the pending paragraph.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I rise for the purpose of advocating that amendment, and to state a case in point. A justice of the peace in my own county wrote to me to bring his case before the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. He had in the course of a year written out two deeds, and he found himself taxed for a license as a conveyancer. It is the same thing all over the country. A justice of the peace will have to go ten or twenty miles where there is a lawyer or a conveyancer to make a deed.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not see how that can be possible, as this is not in the existing law.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The law now compels conveyancers to pay a license. I have given the case of a justice of the peace, who had made only two deeds in a year, and was required to pay a tax for license. I think this is all wrong.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask the gentleman to modify his amendment, so it shall read, "conveyancers whose gross annual receipts as such exceed fifty dollars," so as to preserve the form of the bill.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I consent to that.

Mr. SCHENCK. Having drawn a speech from every New England squire, as I supposed we would, I hope the vote will be taken on the amendment. [Laughter.]

Mr. LOGAN. The language of the amendment will only apply to conveyancers.

Mr. SCHENCK. The amendment is proposed to be put in this form, "conveyancers whose annual receipts," &c. Then comes the provision which defines who are conveyancers.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to strike out this section, and I desire to say a word on this proposition. The taxes to be derived from this source will be a mere bagatelle. It will not pay the expense of collection. A great multitude of persons are to be made the subject of annoyance for this pittance. It seems to me there are greater subjects of taxation than this. The fewer subjects of taxation there are the better it is for the Government and the country. Taxes like this annoy without doing any great good. They create feelings of indignation against all taxation. I trust this paragraph will be stricken out.

Mr. SCHENCK's amendment was agreed to.

The committee divided on Mr. HOLMAN's motion; and there were—ayes 35, noes 42; no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. BROOMALL.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am willing to agree that this amendment shall be considered as rejected, and that a vote shall be taken on it in the House.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. DAWES. I move to insert, "whose gross receipts from their business as such exceed twenty-five dollars."

The amendment was rejected.

No further amendment being offered, the Clerk read the next paragraph, as follows:

Physicians, surgeons, and dentists, whose gross annual receipts for professional services do not exceed $3,000, shall each pay ten dollars; when exceeding $3,000, shall each pay twenty-five dollars. Every person (except apothecaries) whose business it is, for pay, to prescribe remedies, or perform surgical operations, for the cure of any bodily disease or ailment, shall be deemed a physician, surgeon, or dentist. But no physician shall be liable to a further special tax for keeping on hand and using medicines only for the purpose of making up prescriptions for his own patients.

No further amendment being offered, the Clerk read the next paragraph as follows:

Apothecaries, whose annual sales exceed $1,000 and do not exceed $10,000, shall each pay ten dollars, and, in addition thereto, when their annual sales exceed $10,000, shall pay in addition two dollars for each $1,000 in excess of $10,000. Every person who keeps a shop or building where medicines are compounded or prepared according to prescriptions of physicians, or where medicines are sold, shall be regarded as an apothecary; but a wholesale or retail dealer who has paid his special tax as such shall not be required to pay tax as an apothecary; nor shall any apothecary be required to pay, in addition, the special tax as a retail dealer in liquor, in consequence of selling alcohol, or selling or dispensing, on the prescription of a physician, wines and spirits official in the United States or other national pharmacopœias in quantities not exceeding half a pint at any one time, and not exceeding in the aggregate cost value thereof the sum of $300 in any one year.

Mr. BARNES. I desire to make an amendment at the beginning of this section, by striking out "one" and inserting "two," so that it will read, "apothecaries whose annual sales exceed $1,000." My reason is this: a person whose salary is $1,000 is exempt from all taxation upon his income; but here is a person who gives his time and employs his capital to do $1,000 worth of business, and that includes the cost of the articles, and yet he is called upon to pay ten dollars tax. It seems to me that all branches of business should be exempted to the amount of at least $2,000. The exemption is made of a salary of $1,000, from the fact that the money is partially exhausted. Probably one half the amount of the sales is exhausted in the cost of the articles sold by the apothecary. I wish to test the sense of the House on this amendment. In case it does not prevail, I shall not call it up in the other sections.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. BARNES. I now move to amend by inserting after the word "pharmacopœias" the words, "not to be drank on the premises;" and further in the same line by striking out the words "half a pint," and inserting "one quart," so that it will read, "or selling or dispensing, on the prescription of a physician, wines and spirits official in the United States or other national pharmacopœias, not to be drank on the premises, in quantities not exceeding one quart at any one time." This section, which applies to apothecaries, states the character of their business and specifies the taxation. It is well understood that the business of the apothecary is to sell not only drugs, but numerous other kinds of goods. An apothecary must ordinarily sell glass, putty, spirits, &c. Now, the restriction as regards the sale of spirits to half a pint, it seems to me, is not warranted by the necessity of the case. I have offered this amendment without any intention to dilate upon it at length. I simply desire to call the attention of the committee to it, believing it to be just and necessary. I move further to amend, at the end of the paragraph, by increasing the amount of liquors from $300 to $1,000. Having said all I desire to say upon these amendments, I yield to allow the committee to answer.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. Chairman, this whole provision is the existing law, and has remained in the statute-book ever since 1864. There is no difficulty in relation to it, and I hope the amendment will not prevail. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH.]

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I desire, in addition to what the gentleman from Iowa has said, to ask the Clerk to read a paragraph which I send up.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Hearken, Thomas, to instruction:
For all thy ills a remedy is found,
A panacea, certain, pleasant, sure,
PLANTATION BITTERS—S. T.—1860—X.,
A wondrous tonic, made by Dr. Drake.

"We presume 'poor Tom's' case is not worse than hundreds who are cured daily by this wonderful medicine."

The amendment was disagreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Manufacturers of medicines and medical preparations, whose annual sales exceed $3,000, shall each pay twenty-five dollars. Every person (not being one who compounds or prepares medicines as a physician, or as an apothecary according to prescriptions of physicians) whose business it is to make, compound, or prepare any pills, powders, tinctures, troches, lozenges, syrups, cordials, bitters, anodynes, tonics, plasters, liniments, salves, ointments, pastes, drops, waters, essences, spirits, oils, or other medicinal preparations or compositions whatsoever, for consumption and sale, wherein the person making or preparing the same has, or claims to have, any private formula or occult secret or art for the making or preparing the same, or has or claims to have any exclusive right or title to the making or preparing the same, or which are prepared, uttered, vended, or exposed for sale under any letters-patent, or held out or recommended to the public by the makers, venders, or proprietors thereof as proprietary medicines, or as remedies or specifics for any disease or ailment affecting the human or animal body shall be regarded as a manufacturer of medicines and medical preparations.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to transpose the words "secret" and "art," so that it shall read "art or secret."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Manufacturers of cosmetics and perfumery, whose annual sales exceed $1,000, shall each pay twenty-five dollars. Every person whose business it is to make any essence, extract, toilet-water, cosmetic, hair-oil, pomade, hair-dressing, hair restorative, hair-dye, tooth-wash, dentifrice, tooth-paste, aromatic cachous, or any similar articles, by whatsoever name the same heretofore have been, now are, or may hereafter be called, known, or distinguished, to be used or applied as perfumes or applications to the hair, mouth, or skin, shall be regarded as a manufacturer of cosmetics and perfumery.

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire to say in behalf of the Committee of Ways and Means that the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BARNES,] representing an interest involved in these two paragraphs, this one and the one preceding it, appeared before the committee yesterday to propose a change so that all the taxes which are included in these two paragraphs should come in under the head of special taxes, including a tax on their sales, so as to relieve them from the specific tax collected by stamps, provided for in the latter part of the bill. The committee were unable to act on the subject at that time and intended to vote on it this morning, but the reception of the Chinese embassy prevented the meeting of the committee; and I will ask the unanimous consent of the committee to pass over these two paragraphs until after to-morrow morning so as to give an opportunity to the committee to keep faith with the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BUTLER. I object; and I will give the reason if it is in order.

Mr. BARNES. I supposed an opportunity would have been presented to have changed this manner of collecting the tax before the Committee of Ways and Means, and that I should not have been compelled to argue the question before the House. Some of the members of the committee were willing to receive the information in that way which they had not had an opportunity of receiving, and I would be very much obliged to the gentleman from Massachusetts if he would withdraw the objection, and let these paragraphs be passed upon again by the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. BUTLER. I have a reason for objecting; I do not do it merely arbitrarily. If the committee will bear with me a moment I will state it. It is that the makers of these cosmetics and drugs and patent medicines are of all others the least useful on earth, and are of the least consequence to anybody but themselves. They are taxing the people in every form for articles which are of no use except to poison them, and for that reason I want them taxed in this part of the bill, taxed under the stamp taxes, and taxed everywhere.

Mr. BARNES. Then I would suggest that the taxes may be increased by referring the matter back to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman propose an amendment?

Mr. BARNES. Of course I must offer the amendment in a different form from what was my understanding with the Committee of Ways and Means. I move to strike out both these paragraphs, the one beginning on line three hundred and thirteen, and the one beginning on line three hundred and thirty-four.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that one of those paragraphs has been passed, and that it is too late to move to strike it out.

Mr. BARNES. I move, then, to strike out the paragraph beginning on line three hundred and thirty-four, which is as follows:

Manufacturers of cosmetics and perfumery, whose annual sales exceed $1,000, shall pay twenty-five dollars. Every person whose business it is to make any essence, extract, toilet-water, cosmetic, hair-oil, pomade, hair-dressing, hair restorative, hair-dye, tooth-wash, dentifrice, tooth-paste, aromatic cachous, or any similar articles, by whatsoever name the same heretofore have been, now are, or may hereafter be called, known, or distinguished, to be used or applied as perfumes or applications to the hair, mouth, or skin, shall be regarded as a manufacturer of cosmetics and perfumery.

I should have moved to strike out the preceding paragraph if I had not supposed that the request of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means would be granted, and that the matter would be referred back to the committee. That was the reason why I did not make the motion in time, and, therefore, I ask the unanimous consent of the committee to be allowed to move to strike out both paragraphs.

Mr. ALLISON. I must object.

Mr. BARNES. I move, then, to strike out the paragraph which I have read.

Mr. Chairman, I find that the rates of taxation upon various articles and trades specified in the bill range in comparison something like the following: the rate to be derived from confectionery is one sixth of one per cent., from the manufacture of jewelry one per cent., from gold and silver ware half of one per cent., fire-arms half of one per cent., pianos half of one per cent.

Mr. ALLISON. I will withdraw my objection, so as to let the gentleman from New York test the sense of the committee on striking out the preceding paragraph.

Mr. BEAMAN. I renew the objection.

Mr. BARNES. My remarks will apply to the articles included in both paragraphs. The rate of taxation on the manufacture of billiard tables is one per cent. Then candles, chocolate, gunpowder, white lead, paints, colors, glue, cement, gold leaf, building and monumental stones, mineral water, fancy soaps, enameled leather, &c., are not taxed. The articles enumerated in these two paragraphs of which I am speaking are taxed from six to twenty-five per cent. An article which is sold at wholesale at ten dollars per dozen, or eighty three cents per single item, is taxed specifically six cents, which is seven and twenty-eight hundredths per cent. upon the manufacturer's price. Articles which sell at eight dollars per dozen and are sold at sixty-four cents per item are taxed four cents, which is six and twenty-five hundredths per cent. Those that are sold at fifty cents per dozen are still taxed one cent for each article, which is at the rate of twenty per cent. And if you will examine these articles you will find that some of them are taxed as high as thirty-three and one third and even fifty per cent.

Now, gentlemen will bear in mind that there is a very great difference in the rates of taxation upon these different classes of articles. The lowest rate of taxation on the articles of this class is at least six per cent.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ALLISON. For one I should have been glad to have given the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARNES] a full opportunity to have presented before the Committee of Ways and Means his views upon this paragraph and the one immediately preceding it, although my mind is clearly made up as to the duty of the committee in respect to these two paragraphs. I perfectly agree with my distinguished friend from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] with reference to the ability of this class of articles to bear taxation. I think there are no classes of articles that can better bear taxation than the class of medicines and medical preparations known as "patent medicines." We tax to-day very highly the article of friction matches, and raise from it a revenue of $3,000,000 or more, yet the gentleman from New York asks us to remove from schedule C, for that really is his proposition, everything in it except friction matches. For one, I think we should retain the tax as it is in this paragraph, and also retain the provision in schedule C.

I will say that this question has at least once received the careful attention and consideration of the Committee of Ways and Means. After having received such careful consideration and due deliberation, the Committee of Ways and Means inserted this paragraph in this bill, and have presented it here; and I do not believe it is in the power of the gentleman from New York, although he has a great array of statistics, to convince the Committee of Ways and Means, or this Committee of the Whole, that these articles cannot bear the tax here proposed.

The question was then taken upon the amendment of Mr. BARNES; and it was not agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire once more to say distinctly to this Committee of the Whole—and of course I must thereafter leave it to their judgment—that the Committee of Ways and Means decided to report this bill in its present shape, putting a special tax upon the manufacturers of these articles, and also retaining these articles for taxation specifically in schedule C, as gentlemen will find by reference to section one hundred and twelve of this printed bill.

But the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARNES] appeared before the Committee of Ways and Means, and sought to get the committee to change their decision. After hearing him fully upon the subject the committee agreed to take a vote upon the subject this morning before it came up in the House. The committee, as members very well understand, were prevented from holding any meeting this morning.

I now submit to the gentlemen of this Committee of the Whole whether their minds are so fixed upon this subject that they will not allow the Committee of Ways and Means again to consider it. I feel I am bound in good faith to the gentleman from New York to again submit that matter to this committee.

Mr. BUTLER. And I again object.

Mr. BARNES. I move to amend this paragraph by striking out the word "cosmetics." And I desire to say further to this committee, in continuation of my line of argument, that the majority of the articles enumerated in these two paragraphs are composed in large part of spirits which to-day bear a tax of six hundred per cent.

Mr. LOGAN. But it does not pay the tax.

Mr. BARNES. And if the tax on distilled spirits is reduced to fifty cents a gallon, which, I believe, is the lowest sum that has been mentioned here, the tax will still be two hundred per cent. Then you put an average tax of from twelve to fifteen per cent. upon articles which are made from material already taxed six hundred per cent. I say there is nothing else in this bill that corresponds with it by at least one hundred per cent. And furthermore, the manner of levying this tax is subject to the gravest objection; it is neither ad valorem nor specific. The articles are small in character and cheap in value. One hundred and forty-four small articles constitute a package, and a piece of paper denominated a stamp, the value of which is represented by one cent, two cents, or four cents, is to be placed on each of these small articles.

Instead of taking the package itself, which may contain one or five gross, a larger or a smaller quantity, and putting upon the package a single stamp which shall represent a wholesale manufacturer's price, the law, under the recommendation of the Committee of Ways and Means, has been so framed heretofore, (because the matter was not properly understood,) as to require the pasting of these small pieces of paper upon each of these small articles, when the stamp could be much better applied upon the gross product. Such a requirement is not made in regard to any other class of articles except friction matches, to which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] has referred, an article of such a character that the tax can be added to the selling price and is always paid by the consumer. The class of articles to which I refer are to-day sold at about the same prices as they were in 1860. The manufacturers advanced the prices upon these goods, but finding the advance could not be sustained, they have been compelled to reduce the prices. You can now enter any store on Pennsylvania avenue and purchase a majority of these articles at the same prices at which they were sold ten years ago.

In reply to the wholesale assertion which has been made here with reference to the profits of this branch of business, I say that although there may be individual exceptions where fortunes have been made, yet such instances are in this business less numerous by ninety-nine per cent. than those occurring in any other department of business enumerated in this bill. I can refer gentlemen to a catalogue of those interested in this class of business, with the articles which they have been engaged in manufacturing; and I defy any gentleman to find forty articles out of the one thousand enumerated which have not bankrupted those who were interested in them.

Mr. ALLISON. I rise to oppose the amendment and ask a vote.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BARNES. I move to amend by striking out the words "toilet water" in line three hundred and thirty-seven.

Mr. Chairman, the objections raised to the mode of legislation contemplated in these paragraphs are distinct, they are sensible, they are equitable, and no fair-minded man on this floor can look at them in any other light. The articles here enumerated are such as are almost a matter of necessity in the family of every gentleman upon the floor of this House. If I should go to the residence of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] who undertook to denounce the branch of business of which I am now speaking, I have no doubt whatever that I should find there five, ten, and perhaps twenty-five representatives of the class of articles which he denounces as injurious. So far as that is concerned, I suppose there is not a gentleman upon this floor who does not know that the gentleman from Massachusetts, who deals in this wholesale denunciation of a class of men who are as respectable as any whom he can call kinsmen, has a fellow-townsmen, Dr. J. C. Ayer, who is as respectable a man as any in the community, and who is performing as good a work for humanity when he sells his compounded prescription in a sealed bottle, as when he formerly, as a physician, sent his prescription to an apothecary to be compounded—as good a work as any other physician, when he sends his prescription to be put up, that it may be taken by the patient. So far as regards the general merits of the business, I leave that question to the common sense of gentlemen themselves. I think the business needs no defense. It is a business which is recognized in your tax bills. As I understand, the Committee of Ways and Means do not design to tax out of existence any business. But they are proposing to tax this business, so far as the alcoholic preparations are concerned, entirely beyond the extent to which it can bear taxation. Most of these articles, as I have remarked, are composed largely of double-proof spirits, necessary to preserve them on the one hand against the effects of heat, and on the other against the influence of cold. Seventy-five per cent. of the bulk of these articles is spirits. It is the necessity of their preparation and preservation.

I submit to this House that these articles are as meritorious as any other class of articles, and are not to be burdened with higher taxation than other like articles. The taxation that is imposed upon pianos and billiard-tables is sufficient tax to put upon them. I insist that it is unjust to discriminate as is done against these small articles. It is not fair that they should have so many of these small stamps put upon them. See the great impropriety there would be in taxing the spool of cotton, the buttons, and every other small thing that goes to make up a coat instead of putting the tax upon the coat itself. I can enumerate one hundred and forty-four of these small articles, worth only four dollars, upon which one hundred and forty-four of these pieces of paper are placed, each of which represents one cent.

The percentage of tax is thirty-three per cent., and more.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BUTLER. I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from New York insists upon bringing before the House the name of the gentleman who is engaged in making preparations commonly known as "patent medicines." He is not a constituent of mine, and I have nothing to say against him in any shape or form. I never did believe his medicines did any good to anybody. I do not think that they have added to "the sum of human happiness" in any degree. I do not believe they are a valuable preparation to anybody but himself. From them he has derived a very large income, due to his energy and his persistence, and his advertising so largely.

Now, sir, passing from him, I take up the general subject. The people of the United States would be better off if they could legislate out of existence pills, powders, tinctures, troches, lozenges, sirups, cordials, bitters, anodynes, tonics, plasters, liniments, salves, ointments, pastes, drops, waters, essences, spirits, oils, extracts, toilet-waters, cosmetics, hair-oil, pomade, hair-dressing, hair-restorative, hair-dye, tooth-wash, dentifrice, tooth-paste, aromatic cachous, or any similar articles. I submit if we could tax them so they would never be heard of it would be better for us all. They are a necessary evil.

A MEMBER. They are unnecessary.

Mr. BUTLER. No, sir; they are a necessary evil; because, men believe there is something of health by pouring this poison into them, and men believe there is something of beauty by putting this stuff on them. They are of no earthly use except for the benefit of those who sell them. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that he has argued this case three times, and he has convinced but one man in this House to vote with him, and that is himself. Is it, then, quite right that he should take up the valuable time of the country in discussing this question which he has discussed in the Committee of Ways and Means, and discussed here? In all fairness, should not there be an end of it? I only objected for the purpose of putting forward the public business. I had no other object. I desire to have debate closed on this paragraph.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope, by unanimous consent, debate will be closed on these two paragraphs.

Mr. BARNES. I object.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing this debate.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and Mr. DAWES, as Speaker pro tempore, having taken the chair, Mr. POMEROY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 1060) to reduce into one act and to amend the laws relating to internal taxes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and pending that motion, I move that all further debate on the pending paragraphs shall be closed in one minute after their consideration shall be resumed.

Mr. BARNES. I ask for a division.

Mr. ALLISON. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. BARNES. This legislation has got to go on straight or it cannot go on at all. If I have the power I shall move that there be a call of the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to a point of order. The gentleman is not in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion that all debate shall close in one minute.

The question being put, there were—ayes 46, noes 14; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Messrs. BARNES and ALLISON.

Mr. CULLOM. How much time does the gentleman from New York desire?

Mr. BARNES. I cannot tell; I want tellers. The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 69, noes 13.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that all debate cease in ten minutes after going into Committee of the Whole upon the pending paragraph. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I now move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and resume the consideration of the internal tax bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the special order, being the bill H. R. No. 1060) to reduce into one act and to amend the laws relating to internal taxes.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Chairman, when interrupted I was about to say that I happen to occupy a position—

Mr. UPSON. Mr. Chairman, is there any amendment pending?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York has the floor.

Mr. BARNES. I will renew the amendment on any part of the section for the purpose of debating this subject.

Several MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Chairman, I have in my possession from five to eight hundred letters from druggists and manufacturers of articles enumerated in these two paragraphs of this bill. It so happens that I sustain a relation to this class of persons throughout the United States which makes me the natural receptacle of this kind of information. These parties request me to do what little I can to see that their interests are presented and represented in this House. I have endeavored since I have been here to treat every member of the House with courtesy, and I will appeal to any gentleman here if I have taken offense at any word that has ever been uttered, any insinuation or innuendo that has been intended, directly or indirectly, for myself. But two gentlemen on this floor to-night have deliberately insulted me, and I say to those gentlemen—

Mr. ALLISON. I would like to ask the gentleman if he includes me?

Mr. BARNES. I did not include the gentleman.

Mr. MULLINS. Regular order, Mr. Chairman. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARNES. I am compelled from the action that the House has seen fit to take to explain my relations to this kind of business. From Portland, Oregon, across the Sierra Nevada, throughout the western States to Portland, Maine, throughout the southern States, and I may say beyond the confines of the stars and stripes, I am called upon for information with reference to this kind of business. I have undertaken to consult with the Committee of Ways and Means with reference to it in order that it might have a fair consideration. I am met here with the presentation of the most extraordinary taxes that are to be found in this bill, and applied in a manner that I undertake to say cannot be defended in a five-minute speech by any gentleman, whether he be a member of the Committee of Ways and Means or any other member of the House. Just think of the application of one hundred and forty-four small pieces of paper to one hundred and forty-four tooth-picks! How absurd and ridiculous! No man can sustain it upon any common sense principle. If gentlemen invite plain language, I am compelled to give it to them. I say I am associated with people who feel that they are overtaxed. When a man manufactures a billiard table he is taxed upon the sale of it one per cent. Another man manufactures medicines or perfumery, and he is taxed twenty-five dollars, and has to pay what amounts to one or two per cent. more. I say it is an invidious discrimination, an unjust interference. I say so to the gentlemen who prepared this bill.

I am discussing this subject in a manner in which I did not intend. It was in my mind to refer to stamps in the illustration of books or magazines which we will say Harper publishes. He stamps it at the retail price of forty cents. In New York city it is sold at thirty cents, in Denver at seventy-five cents, in Salt Lake City two dollars, and in San Francisco at another price; and yet, by the action of the Committee of Ways and Means, articles less in volume and price than that magazine, and composed of more duplicates, are compelled to apply stamps—which shall do what? Why, that shall represent the retail price. I ask the Committee if they can defend the idea of putting a retail price on a bottle of medicine, an article of perfumery, or any of the things of which I am speaking? This bill would not stand an hour's investigation before any judicial tribunal, for it requires an impossibility, and a law of that kind, I undertake to say, before the common sense of any community is null and void, and could not be enforced.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ALLISON. I rise to oppose the amendment, and I will yield my time to the gentleman from New York to continue his remarks.

Mr. BARNES. I am much obliged to the gentleman. I desire now to call the attention of the committee to the absurdity of taking the infinitesimally small duplicates of articles like these under consideration here and compelling them to be manipulated in the way this bill prescribes. Why does not the committee take hold of large articles, such as plows and safes and desks, and cause stamps to be put upon them? But instead of that, the committee take these small articles and compel them to be manipulated at an expense of one or perhaps two per cent. to the proprietor for the application of the stamps. It loses sight of the fact that the stamps might be applied to the gross packages. The facts have been presented to the committee, but I felt that the committee did not understand the impracticability of this application of stamps. The articles produced are cheap in price, the stamps required are numerous, and the expense of applying them is greater in some cases than the profit realized. Moreover, there are constant thefts of these stamps. I have known within my own experience of at least fifty children employed at laboratories in the city where I reside who have been arraigned within the last year for stealing stamps, and who had been tempted to become felons by the facilities for stealing them. I know of one lad fourteen years old who had taken from one place and sold in two other places $900 worth of these stamps within three months before he was detected. You can all understand the difficulties attending the operation of using these stamps. I ask gentlemen to point out one single advantage in collecting the tax in this way.

If the assertion of the gentleman is correct, that this is the most effective mode of collecting the revenue, then, sir, why is it not applied to all the articles which are enumerated in this bill? It is very singular reasoning to maintain that large articles, such as planing mills and plows and implements of manufacture and wheels, should be untaxed by stamps, while the cogs of the wheel and the buckles of the harness are to be stamped in duplicate. I submit to gentlemen that they have no argument upon this point.

Mr. Chairman, I shall be compelled, as we progress with the bill, to offer amendments with reference to the amount and character of these stamps. I will not now detain the committee longer. I regret to have taken up so much of its time. It was not my intention to do so, but I have been driven into it. I have merely given expression to the views and wishes which have been communicated to me by a large number of persons scattered throughout this country, and if I have made myself understood by this committee and by these gentlemen when they find their just ideas defeated I shall be very glad. I now withdraw the amendment.

No further amendments being offered, the next paragraph was read, as follows:

Confectioners shall each pay as a wholesale or retail dealer, according to the amount of sales. Every person whose business it is to sell or offer for sale confectionery in any building shall be regarded as a confectioner. No person who has paid his special tax as a wholesale dealer or retail dealer, keeper of a hotel, inn, or tavern, or keeper of an eating-house, shall be required to pay an additional special tax as a confectioner.

No amendments were offered, and the Clerk read as follows:

Manufacturers of confectionery, whose annual sales exceed $1,000 and do not exceed $5,000, shall each pay a tax of twenty dollars, and when the sales exceed $5,000 shall, in addition, pay six dollars for each $1,000 in excess of $5,000. But a manufacturer of confectionery who sells or offers for sale exclusively the products of his own manufacture shall not be required, in addition to his tax as a manufacturer of confectionery, to pay the special taxes imposed on a confectioner.

No amendment was proposed, and the following paragraph was read:

Grinders of coffee and spices, whose annual sales exceed $1,000, shall each pay a tax of twenty dollars. Every person who grinds coffee, spices, or mustard, or any article intended for use as a substitute for, or as an adulteration of, coffee, spices, or mustard, or who compounds, mixes, or prepares for sale any article intended for use and sale as coffee, spice, or mustard, or as a substitute therefor, shall be regarded as a grinder of coffee and spices.

No amendment was offered.

The next paragraph was read, as follows:

Keepers of hotels, inns, or taverns shall be classified and rated according to the yearly rental or the estimated yearly rental value of the house and property intended to be so occupied, as follows, to wit: when the rent or valuation of the yearly rental of said house and property shall be $300 or less, they shall each pay ten dollars; and if exceeding $300, for every additional $100 or fractional part thereof in excess of $300, shall pay five dollars. Every person whose business it is to furnish food and lodging to travelers and others, for pay, shall be regarded as a keeper of a hotel, inn, or tavern. Any person keeping a hotel, inn, or tavern may keep and feed the animals of travelers or sojourners without the payment of an additional special tax as a livery-stable keeper; but wines, spirits, or malt liquors shall not be sold to be drunk upon the premises without the payment of the additional special tax of a retail liquor dealer. Owners of steamers and vessels upon the waters of the United States, on board of which passengers or travelers are provided with food or lodgings, shall be subject to and required to pay a special tax of twenty-five dollars. The yearly rental value of hotels, inns, or taverns shall be determined by the assistant assessor, but at not less than the actual rent when rented.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to move to amend this paragraph, in the third sentence, by striking out the words "to be drunk upon the premises without the payment of the additional special tax of a retail liquor dealer;" and inserting in lieu thereof the words, "without the payment in addition of the special tax of a wholesale or retail liquor dealer, according to the amount of his sales."

Mr. BUTLER. I rise to oppose this amendment, and for reasons which I will state to this committee. I do not see any use in passing this amendment, because I am quite certain that, at this period of this session of Congress, there is no reasonable prospect that we can pass this bill. Therefore it is not worth while to try any longer to amend it.

This bill was reported to the House on the 12th of May, after having been for five months under consideration by the Committee of Ways and Means. I appreciate the labors of that committee, and think they have made a bill as near perfect as it is possible for any committee to do. We have now been all this time upon this bill and have only reached page 108, the bill containing three hundred and sixty pages; and we have not yet reached the really debatable matter contained in the bill.

I am afraid, if we continue the consideration of this bill, we will not be able to get it through this House before the 1st of July. The bill will then have to go to the Senate, where it will be referred to the Committee on Finance. Many gentlemen who have interests at stake will want to be heard before the Committee on Finance. That committee will not get through with its consideration in much less time than a month, however well they may work upon it. Then the Senate will take, at least, another month to discuss and amend it, as they are without the previous question. Thus it will be September before we will be able to receive this bill from the Senate so as have an opportunity to examine their amendments. In the mean time we shall have lost the advantage of passing some provisions in regard to the tax on tobacco and distilled spirits.

I wish, therefore, now to give notice—and that will be a reason why I do not want this amendment to pass—that on to-morrow, when the motion is made to go into Committee of the Whole upon this bill, I will oppose it for the purpose of moving a postponement of the further consideration of this bill until the first Monday of December next. At the same time I shall ask that a resolution be passed instructing the Committee of Ways and Means to report in a separate bill the sections in regard to the tax on distilled spirits, malt liquors, and tobacco, with such general provisions of legislation as will be necessary to make that tax effective. That is practically all we can do.

Mr. CULLOM. That is about all there is in this bill.

Mr. BUTLER. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I am told that that is about all there is in the bill. That may be all that is practical in the bill. But there are other provisions here which it would be an immense annoyance to this House to attempt to perfect while we can obtain all the practical advantages that will be derived from the bill by the course I propose to take.

Now, let me submit this to our friends of the Committee of Ways and Means. They have required five months to bring this bill to its present state of perfection, and they have done a great work; it is a work that has been well done. Now, we ought in both Houses to be quite as long over the bill as were the Committee of Ways and Means.

But, it is only because of this late hour of the session that I oppose—I beg pardon; I take back that word; I do not oppose the bill, but I suggest a postponement, which is not a motion hostile to the bill. It may be regarded as hostile in parliamentary language. But it is not, because I do hope the bill will pass at some time.

Now, I put it to the majority in this House if it is not their opinion, if it is not the opinion of almost every gentleman here, that it is extremely doubtful if we can pass this bill this session. Does any gentleman here believe that this bill can be put through Congress and become a law before September next?

Mr. SCHENCK. Since the Chair has permitted this argument upon a motion to amend I suppose it is equally competent to oppose the amendment in the same vein.

I am very much afraid, sir, that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] takes counsel from his wishes rather than his fears when he speaks of the impossibility of getting this bill through. What are the facts? The gentleman speaks of the length of time occupied in preparing the bill. A good deal of time was so occupied, and the work is before this committee. The Committee of Ways and Means are not disposed to feel any shame for having bestowed so much time and labor in what was so onerous an undertaking, the condensation, collation, and codification of all your internal revenue laws.

The delay, however, has not been alone that of the Committee of Ways and Means. There are other circumstances which have protracted this session. The gentleman does not need to have me specify them. But how do we stand? After the termination of the delays arising out of impeachment, and since we have been enabled to bring the bill before the House, there have been but three full days of work upon it. Last week we were interrupted by privileged questions of various kinds, and by some allowance of general debate, demanded upon all hands, so that until the middle of the day on Thursday there was no opportunity to consider the bill in detail. On Saturday we were once more interrupted, and again yesterday by questions arising out of matters over which the gentleman from Massachusetts has more control than anybody else in this House. Yet, occupying this comparatively small portion of the time of the House, what have we done? We have gone one third of the way through the bill, or very nearly that. We have considered one hundred and eight pages out of the three hundred and sixty, considerably more than one fourth.

What has been the fact in regard to former bills of this character? Why, sir, a bill introduced in 1866 of a little more than one half the length of this, involving upon almost every page of it and for many successive pages disputes upon item after item, occupied the House twenty days in going through with it, from the 8th to the 28th of May; yet the bill passed finally in good time. And now having commenced the consideration of this bill only last week, and having devoted to it only three full days, we have shown, as I predicted in the beginning, that this bill can be carried through in this House with ten days of work altogether. I say again that if gentlemen shrink from the performance of this work now, they take counsel from their wishes rather than their fears. If we really wish to pass the bill, there is no difficulty in the House of Representatives at least doing its share of the labor and doing it properly. If the Senate chooses to take another responsibility, it is for that body, not for us, and I for one will not consider that question.

One word as to the proposition made by the gentleman. If the Committee of Ways and Means take this bill to their committee-room and arrange the various administrative sections, so as to connect them with the tax upon tobacco and whisky, they cannot report it back in much, if any, less time than it would take to carry through the House this bill with which we have now progressed one third of the way. I speak advisedly. The committee cannot in less than something like a week prepare such a bill as the gentleman speaks of, for the various general and administrative sections must be molded together connectedly if we are to do our work well; we cannot take at random a page here and a page there.

One thing further I desire to say. If this House of Representatives, with a Republican majority, shrinks from meeting all these questions and making provision for the revenue of the country with reference to the necessary demands upon its resources, their constituents will understand that they have shrunk from a labor that was expected from them, and they will, I think, be kept at home individually in consequence of this failure upon their part to do the duty for which they are sent here. And I think they ought to be kept at home. I think if this House of Representatives and this Congress, because of any supposed inconvenience of sitting a week or a month longer, or, if necessary, a month or two longer—though no such necessity is devolved upon us in disposing of the questions involved in the business now before the House—they do not deserve to come back again or to retain power in the country, because they shrunk from that responsibility the people of the country expect them to take. I speak plainly, because I desire to be understood; and I speak earnestly, because I feel earnestly in the matter.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no question before the committee. The Chairman allowed statements to be made because there was no objection.

Mr. COVODE. I move to strike out the last line. It has been my opinion from the commencement, as I have stated on a former occasion, that, while I believe the bill would go through the House—

Mr. SCHENCK. I object to this debate. The gentleman must confine himself to his amendment. When the gentleman from Massachusetts spoke as he did I claimed the privilege to reply. I object to further general debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The amendment of the gentleman is not an amendment to the pending proposition.

Mr. COVODE. What I wanted to say was this—

Mr. SCHENCK. I object.

Mr. SCHENCK's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ELA. I move to insert after the word "less" the word, "whose gross receipts shall exceed $500;" so it will read:

When the rent or valuation of the yearly rental of said house and property shall be $300 or less, whose gross receipts shall exceed $500, they shall each pay ten dollars; and if exceeding $300, for every additional $100 or fractional part thereof in excess of $300 shall pay five dollars.

Mr. Chairman, as it is now, it is almost impossible for a man traveling across the country to get dinner for himself and horse. There is not business enough at the cross roads to warrant a man in paying a license tax.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. ARCHER. I move that the committee rise.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 27, noes 42.

So the motion was disagreed to.

The Clerk read the next paragraph, as follows:

Keepers of eating-houses whose annual sales exceed $1,000 and do not exceed $10,000 shall each pay ten dollars; when exceeding $10,000, shall each pay twenty-five dollars. Every place where food or refreshments of any kind, not including spirits, wines, or malt liquors, are provided for casual visitors, and sold for consumption therein, shall be regarded as an eating-house.

Mr. BUTLER. I move to add the following:

Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to prevent any State restraining by its own laws the sale of intoxicating liquors.

Mr. SCHENCK. That is already provided for in a general provision.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I withdraw the amendment.

No further amendment being offered, the Clerk read the next paragraph as follows:

Livery-stable keepers, when the annual rental or estimated rental value of the stable and premises used for such business does not exceed $2,000 per annum, shall each pay ten dollars; and if such rental or estimated rental value shall exceed $2,000 per annum, fifty dollars; and no additional special tax shall be imposed upon any livery-stable keeper for dealing in horses.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to insert the following after the word "dollars" where it last occurs:

Any person whose business it is to keep horses for hire or to let, or keep, feed, or board horses for others, shall be regarded as being stable keepers.

Mr. BUTLER. I propose to show a reason why we should not adopt this amendment, and as a reason why this amendment should not be passed. I propose again to show that it is a loss of time to this committee to go into this—

Mr. SCHENCK. I object to any debate as to whether the bill shall pass or not upon a question of this kind.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The remarks of the gentleman are not germane to the pending amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. I propose, then, to say that this amendment will only take the time of the House uselessly; therefore it ought not to be passed, and for the reason that here is one of a series of amendments which have got to be put on the bill by the committee itself in order to perfect it; and while we are perfecting it in this way—

Mr. SCHENCK. I insist upon my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains it. Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman cannot proceed except in order.

Mr. BUTLER. The best way to try that is to object on that account.

Mr. SCHENCK. I suppose by the course of the gentleman's proceeding that he is going to speak generally.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I will ask leave of the House to put it to a vote.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. SCHENCK, it was agreed to.

Mr. SPALDING. I move that the committee rise.

The question was put; and there were—aye twenty.

Mr. BARNES. I insist on a further count.

Mr. SCHENCK. It is very evident that gentlemen intend—

Mr. BUTLER. I call the gentleman to order. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I will move, myself, that the committee rise.

Mr. BUTLER. That motion is made already. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope it will be acceded to whenever there is an evident purpose to—

Mr. BUTLER and others. Order.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. POMEROY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 1060) to reduce into one act and to amend the laws relating to internal taxes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

INCREASED DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill to increase the revenue from duties on imports and to equalize exports and imports, for the purpose of having it printed and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. BARNES. I object. I understand the House does not hold evening sessions for this purpose.

Mr. PAINE. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at ten o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut: The petition of Edward J. Nichols, a captain in the naval service of the United States, praying for advancement in rank.

By Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania: Two petitions from citizens of Western Pennsylvania engaged in the manufacture of tobacco, asking for a reduction of tax on cigars and leaf tobacco.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, June 10, 1868.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills yesterday received from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

A bill (H. R. No. 1194) to provide for the inauguration of State officers in Arkansas, North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, and Alabama, and for the meeting of the Legislatures of said States—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A bill (H. R. No. 631) amendatory of an act approved July 26, 1866, entitled "An act to authorize the construction of certain bridges and establish them as post roads—to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

A bill (H. R. No. 1205) to further amend the postal laws—to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Interior, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the 27th ultimo, information in relation to the reasons why a number of persons enrolled as Creek Indians by the Creek agent in 1867 have been stricken from the rolls and refused payment of their per capita dividend; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, communicating a copy of a telegram from Lieutenant General Sherman, relative to the removal of the Ute and Navajo Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CONKLING. I present the petition of numerous merchants of the city of New York, calling attention to the objections to an act of Congress of 1863 preventing the issuing of execution against collectors of customs, and praying a repeal of that act and similar acts. The petition comes to me with a letter from an eminent lawyer suggesting that it ought to be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. It seems to me, however, that it pertains more appropriately to the Committee on Finance, and therefore I move that it be referred to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I present the petition of the grand and petit jurors of the circuit court of the United States for the first circuit and district of Massachusetts, in which they represent that while, as citizens of the United States, they recognize the duty of doing their part as jurors in the proper administration of the laws, and that such services should not be made a matter of profit, they yet think that a just compensation should be paid them in order that no person may be compelled to bear more than his fair share of the public burdens. They then proceed to represent that the fees of jurors, as now established by law, being only two dollars per day for attendance and five cents per mile each way for travel, are undoubtedly inadequate to their support during the discharge of these duties; that they cannot pay their bills at the hotels where they reside in Boston for the fees which they receive; and they petition Congress to make such an addition to the per diem of jurors as may seem expedient and just. This petition is signed by the two juries, headed by their respective foremen, and it has, then, this memorandum, signed by Nathan Clifford, associate justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, and John Lowell, district judge:

"We concur in the foregoing petition, and hope it will receive the attention of Congress."

To this is added also the following memorandum, signed by G. S. Hillard, United States attorney, and George L. Andrews, United States marshal:

"We concur in the above petition, and earnestly hope it may receive the early and favorable consideration of Congress."

It seems to me that this petition is certainly very equitable, and that there ought to be an addition to the per diem of jurors.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HOWARD. I think a similar memorial has been presented to Congress from my own State, making the same complaint, and it is a very serious evil in the administration of justice, and I wish to call the particular attention of the Committee on the Judiciary to this subject. Certainly it cannot be the desire of the Government of the United States that jurors called from their homes should be obliged to pay a large portion of the expenses of doing their duties as such.

Mr. SUMNER. I do not see the chairman of the Judiciary Committee in his place, but there are certainly three or four gentlemen of that committee present, and I hope they will not think I take too great a liberty if I invite their attention to this petition.

Mr. CONKLING. As this subject seems to be dwelt upon somewhat, I beg to suggest to the honorable Senators who have it in view that the theory was in early times, and the theory is now in the part of the country with which I am most familiar, that a man who sits as a juror is not to receive compensation in money, as he would for services rendered, but that it is in part a contribution which he makes to the general welfare, and in part it goes upon the idea that he receives remuneration and compensation in other ways than merely through his per diem allowance.

Mr. SUMNER. Listening to the lawyers? [Laughter.]

Mr. CONKLING. I have heard the honorable Senator from Massachusetts before disclaim much respect for the lawyers, and I regard his want of veneration in that respect as one of the few foibles which may be attributed to him. It is greatly to be regretted by his friends that he has not more veneration for lawyers and for the bar than he seems to have. Yes, sir, there may be some advantage in listening to the lawyers, and becoming acquainted with affairs and business. In the State of New York I believe no juror is paid more than ten shillings a day; I speak now of the State courts, and I speak of those counties in which the supervisors have placed the rate at the highest figure; and there is no difficulty in obtaining juries, no difficulty in securing the attendance of the most respectable men, the most substantial men in their localities; and I am very sorry that either in Massachusetts or Michigan men should be less public spirited or less patriotic than they are in the larger States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition is referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. McCREERY presented a petition of citizens of Paducah, Kentucky, praying compensation to Dr. J. M. Best for losses sustained during the battle around Fort Anderson, on the 25th and 26th of March, 1864; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. THAYER presented a petition of citizens of Nebraska, praying the establishment of a mail route from Fremont to Lincoln in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. RAMSEY presented additional papers in relation to the claim of Antoinette Darling, for property destroyed by the Indians; which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I present the memorial of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian church of the United States, convened at Harrisburg, Pennsylvania, who represent that the Indians have no adequate protection by the laws of the United States, and they pray that Congress will remedy by appropriate legislation these evils, by enacting that the Indians of our country shall be subject to the criminal laws of the United States, and of the States and Territories in which they may be found, just as well as others, whether native or foreign, who may be within the bounds of our national or State or territorial jurisdiction, are subject to those laws. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORTON presented the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of Cincinnati, Ohio, praying the passage of a general law to regulate the construction of bridges over the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, so that they shall not obstruct nor make dangerous the navigation of those rivers; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. CORBETT presented a petition of citizens of Idaho Territory, praying the establishment of a mail route from Placerville to Bluff Station, in that Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, from the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 605) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1869, reported it with amendments.

Mr. FERRY, from the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 783) for the relief of Samuel Pierce, reported it without amendment, and submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORGAN, from the joint Committee on the Library, to whom was referred the petition of John S. Hittell, in regard to the appointment of a board of commissioners to prepare a report upon the question of whether the introduction of the phonetic alphabet into common use in Great Britain and the United States is practicable, and whether it would be beneficial, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported amendments intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 605) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1869; which were ordered to be printed.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 531) for the organization, government, and payment of the Army; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

PRINTED MAIL MATTER.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 176. It is important that the bill, if passed at all, should pass now. It proposes to amend the act of Congress of 1864, regulating the conveyance of printed matter by mail between western Kansas and eastern California. The Postmaster General is about entering into contracts for the conveyance of the mail overland again, and it is important that this bill should pass now. I move to take it up.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 176) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for carrying the mails from the United States to foreign ports, and for other purposes," approved March 25, 1864. The bill proposes to repeal the fourth section of the act of March 25, 1864. The Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads proposed to amend the bill by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting:

The operation of the fourth section of an act to provide for carrying the mails of the United States to foreign ports, and for other purposes, approved March 25, 1864, shall cease and determine on and after the 30th day of September, 1868.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have the fourth section of the act referred to read.

Mr. CONNESS. That is the section which prohibits the transmission of newspapers without the prepayment of letter postage between certain points in the West.

Mr. RAMSEY. Between western Kansas and eastern California.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let it be read.

Mr. RAMSEY. Almost all the Territories of the West are protesting against the continuance of this provision of law, and asking that they may be placed on an equality with the other States and Territories of the country and allowed to receive mail matter of all sorts and descriptions by post.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have that law read.

Mr. RAMSEY. The Clerk has sent for it, and it will be here in a moment. The House of Representatives passed this bill repealing that section of the law of 1864, but the committee found that the contract with the overland mail company was made in subordination to that law, and that the repeal of it now would probably entitle them to come against the Government for liberal damages. The committee, therefore, amended the bill so as to postpone its operation until after the 1st of September, when the present contract with that company expires. The Postmaster General is now about entering into a new contract as from that day, and it is thought advisable to pass this bill before that contract is made.

Mr. JOHNSON. Does the Department concur in the propriety of the bill?

Mr. RAMSEY. Yes, sir; the Department consents to it, and desires that the law referred to should be repealed. The Clerk now has the section, and it can be read.

The Chief Clerk read the fourth section of the law of March 25, 1864, as follows:

"And be it further enacted, That all mailable matter which may be conveyed by mail westward beyond the western boundary of Kansas, and eastward from the eastern boundary of California, shall be subject to prepaid letter-postage rates: Provided, however, That this section shall not be held to extend to the transmission by mail of newspapers from a known office of publication to bona fide subscribers, not exceeding one copy to each subscriber, nor to franked matter to and from the intermediate points between the boundaries above named at the usual rates: Provided further, That such franked matter shall be subject to such regulations as to its transmission and delivery as the Postmaster General shall prescribe."

Mr. CONNESS. I simply wish to say that that provision was inserted in the law when the overland mail ran over the whole route on wheels, and it was found necessary to relieve it from carrying the great mass of newspaper matter. Now the two ends of the railroad are approaching each other very rapidly, and the means of transmission between them furnishes greater facilities. A new contract for the transportation by the overland mail is to be made, to go into operation in September, and the object is that all mail matter may be transported under the new contract to be made.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is it paid for by weight?

Mr. CONNESS. Certainly, according to the newspaper laws.

Mr. SHERMAN. Undoubtedly this will largely increase the contract price for carrying mail matter; and there is no injustice, it seems to me, in requiring this outside newspaper matter to pay a little higher than the present rate. It seems that under the law as it now stands papers subscribed for by regular subscribers and sent even into this middle country only pay the present rates, and the increased rate simply applies to packages of newspapers sent not in the ordinary course.

Mr. CONNESS. It applies to magazines and general newspapers.

Mr. SHERMAN. I see no injustice or inequality in requiring persons who get these packages to pay the increased cost of transportation. Undoubtedly the contractors will make a very liberal addition to their bids for the new burden cast upon them by the repeal of the act of 1864.

Mr. CONNESS. This contract will be made in view of the completion of the Pacific railroad, which will be within the next year, that is, within 1869. The two roads will meet in 1869. That is now as near a fixed fact as anything can be that has not yet taken place. This business of the transportation from the East to all over the West of our leading periodicals has grown to be a great business, and it is a business that lies at the foundation of the circulation of intelligence more perhaps than any other. The people of the West are entitled to all the facilities the mail can give. I do not suppose the Government will be charged with a cent extra for the contract for carrying the mail.

Mr. STEWART. I will say to my friend from Ohio that there is a very marked injustice in the present law, and we have submitted to it for a considerable time. For instance, papers and magazines printed in California are stopped on the boundary of that State and the people of Nevada cannot get them. While the stages were overloaded we were not indisposed to submit to this; but now the railroad is running over the mountains, and there is no reason why there should be a discrimination against the citizens of Nevada in receiving magazines and bundles of papers to the distribution of which they are as much entitled through the mail as are the citizens of Ohio. There is no reason for the existing provision now that railroads extend into the interior.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senate will see that this repeal does not affect the railroad lines, because, so far as the railroads are concerned, they have contracts with the Government by which they will transport everything that would be properly mail matter. So far as railroad lines are concerned, I have not the slightest objection to allowing the same rates of postage to be charged on printed matter in every part of the country; but there are vast regions of country where there are no railroad lines—for instance, the vast region lying between middle Kansas and southern California, including Santa Fé and the whole of New Mexico. At best, our Post Office Department is a great burden upon the public Treasury, and there is no reason why the Government of the United States should carry packages of newspapers at less than the actual cost of transportation. As I understand, the fourth section of the act of 1864 was put in for the purpose of covering a portion of the expense of carrying this rather outside mail matter. The manifest effect of its repeal will be to swell the deficiency in the Post Office Department, already large, and increasing daily by making now routes in the West.

Mr. CONNESS. I will say, in reply to my friend from Ohio, that he is laboring under one serious error. The object of the passage of the section of the act of 1864 was to utterly prohibit the carrying of printed matter, and therefore it charged letter postage upon all such printed matter and required prepayment of it, which was an enormous tax, prohibiting totally and entirely its transportation. Now, the object is to remit and open it up. The purpose of that legislation was to release the direct overland mail between Atchison, in Kansas, and Folsom, in California. It will be remembered that the newspaper matter that will be sent over the lateral lines will be very small, while the great mass of the newspaper matter that would have been sent over the main lines would have prevented the transportation of letters in any ordinary time, and therefore it was found necessary to make this prohibition by charging letter postage that nobody could afford to pay on newspapers. I have not, in the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads of the Senate, been in favor of the passage of this bill as yet, but the committee voted me down upon it and made a report in its favor. I think, on the whole, it ought to enter into the new contract now to be made, and that the repeal ought to take place.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, this bill perhaps ought to lie over one day, as Senators may want to look into it; but if Senators desire to go on with this bill to-day, I will not make the motion I desire to submit.

Mr. CONNESS. We are ready for a vote.

Mr. STEWART. We can vote now.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, I am not clear that it is now the proper time to repeal the section referred to in the bill before the Senate. I think it is too early, too soon. If we wait until these railroads come nearer together there will be much less difficulty about it. But I am informed by some of the contractors that if this bill shall pass, it will require a larger amount of force to transport the mails by more than double; that the newspaper mail will weigh more than all their letter mail and passengers do at the present moment, and that it will increase the expense enormously, and they cannot afford to take it at anything like the rates that are now given under the present contract. It seems to me, therefore, that it would be wise to postpone this repeal until the railroads have approximated to a nearer point of connection. Formerly the Post Office Department was a self-supporting institution; but for the last year or two it has been a very heavy burden, and I am quite sure that this will increase the amount of deficit of the Post Office to a larger extent than any gentleman now here would be willing to admit.

Mr. RAMSEY. I, too, had a conversation with some of the gentlemen who are engaged in transporting the mail across the continent.

They did object to the bill as it was passed by the House of Representatives, but they accepted the proposition reported by the Senate committee as a fair compromise, and gave their entire consent to this modification from and after the expiration of the present contract. The additional expense will not be one dollar.

Mr. SHERMAN. My friend will allow me to say that they accepted it on the ground that the contract expired in September, and that if the change was made, they would, as a matter of course, have a reasonable allowance.

Mr. RAMSEY. No; they anticipated bidding again for the contract, and I presume hope to get the contract; but the railroad will have advanced so far by that time that they can take this additional burden without any additional expense.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads a question. When the contracts expire on the 30th of September, if that be the time—that is the time fixed in the bill—there will not be railroad communication completed; and between the 30th of September and the completion of railroad communication, by what process is it that we are to get this carrying done any cheaper than we shall be able now to get it done?

Mr. RAMSEY. If you do not get it any cheaper, you will get more service done.

Mr. CONKLING. But I understood this to be the idea: that an economical and prudent thing was to be accomplished by this amendment, inasmuch as it fixed a period ahead of the expiration of current contracts as the time when this act shall take effect, of course for the reason that then, in making fresh bids, the whole matter could be adjusted. If the railroads were to be in operation at that time doubtless the bids would be much lower than they are now, going around by water or going overland by horse-power; but in the absence of the railways during the next year or year and a half, whatever the time may be, I inquire of the chairman why it is that the Government is clearly not to pay the whole expense, as it would do now of carrying this matter, and at the same time without any remunerative postage?

Mr. HARLAN. It doubtless will cost something more; but I should like to know on what principle the people who live in the new States and Territories can be compelled to pay more for the transportation of newspapers than the people who live in the old States.

Mr. CONKLING. I did not intend by my question to suggest the contrary of what the honorable Senator says; but I understood some Senator to say that this measure involved no expense and for the reason that the time of its taking effect was fixed at a future day. Of course we do not want to vote under a mistake of facts.

But, to answer the question the Senator puts to me, I beg to suggest that the reason why people in the remoter States should pay more than people in States less remote is that they are further off; that the service is worth more; that like all other things in the nature of property the cost of production, the cost of accomplishing the thing, is to be taken into the account when you are measuring what the compensation should be. That is the reason.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. President, if it were possible to reduce such a theory to practice, it might be well enough to compel the people of Iowa to pay more for the transportation of letters or newspapers than the people of New York or the people of Maryland, who reside nearer the places of publication or the point where letters are mailed; but the system that we have adopted is to charge uniform prices for carrying letters all over the United States. It would result, doubtless, advantageously to the people in the Territories to some extent; but we have heretofore been affording the frontier settlers this small advantage as a slight compensation for the hardships they encounter in opening up a new country. Under the present arrangement the people in these new Territories are compelled to pay express rates for all the newspapers they receive, or else wait until those papers can be shipped around the Cape or across the Isthmus. The time has arrived when the termini of these railroads, the one being constructed eastward from California and the other westward from the Missouri river, have come so near reaching each other that the committee deemed it proper to repeal this law discriminating against the people in the new States and Territories.

Mr. CORBETT. I understand, if this contract is relet, and it should cost a little more than it does at the present time, that as soon as the railroad is completed the contract will be again let under the law, and that then the mails will have to be sent by the railroads according to a fixed rate as provided by law now. Therefore, if it should be relet under this bill, it would go into operation under that contract with an increased cost for perhaps one year or one year and a half, and at the end of that time the expense would be greatly reduced under the law by sending the mails by the railroads; so that it cannot be a great expense to the Government for this short time.

Mr. RAMSEY. The reason why the operation of this bill was postponed until after the new contract was that the Government would be responsible in damages, in all probability, to this transportation company if it imposed upon them the carrying of matter that they were excluded from carrying under their contract. I say that in answer to the Senator from New York. If we impose upon them this new labor, not contemplated in the contract entered into with them, they will be entitled to damages. For that reason we postponed this provision until the expiration of the present contract.

Mr. STEWART. I was about to reply to the Senator from New York that this did not depend altogether upon the cost of production. For instance, my State is about three hundred miles distant from San Francisco and only about one hundred and fifty miles from Sacramento, and there is a railroad there, and yet it costs more to get newspapers there than it does to send them from Boston to Omaha. In fact, the present rate is prohibitory. They cannot be sent without paying full letter postage. This is not a question of distance; it is a question of arbitrary lines dividing California and Nevada, and prevents papers being carried over there when the distance is very short. This discrimination has been a very severe one, but we have allowed it to remain so far because we were unwilling to overload the overland mail so that it could not be carried at all. It has operated very severely on Nevada all the time.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Is there an amendment pending?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the committee is pending.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I move to amend the amendment of the committee by striking out "1868," the last word in the amendment, and inserting "1869."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. How will it read then?

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment of the committee, if amended as proposed, will read as follows:

That the operation of the fourth section of an act to provide for carrying the mails of the United States to foreign ports, and for other purposes, approved March 25, 1864, shall cease and determine on and after the 30th day of September, 1869.

Mr. CONKLING. It ought to be 1870.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. It ought to be, as the Senator from New York suggests, 1870, but certainly it ought to be postponed until 1869. I trust that there will be no objection to that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore put the question on the amendment to the amendment, and declared that the yeas appeared to have it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I ask for the yeas and nays upon it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CONNESS. If the Senator will agree to modify his amendment so as to make it the year 1900, I think he may carry it. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I placed it at 1869 because the Senator from California told me privately he would go for it. [Laughter.]

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 17, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cole, Conkling, Cragin, Davis, Ferry, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Ross, Sherman, and Willey—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Cameron, Chandler, Conness, Corbett, Drake, Harlan, Howard, Howe, Ramsey, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Vickers, Wade, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—20.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Buckalew, Cattell, Dixon, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fowler, Grimes, Henderson, Johnson, McCreery, Morrill of Maine, Norton, Nye, Saulsbury, and Sprague—17.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now, Mr. President, I wish to say only a word in regard to this bill. The law as it stands enables the people of the Territories as well as of the States to receive their mail proper at the same rates of postage that are received between Philadelphia and New York. The same price is charged for a letter addressed to the remotest regions of the United States as is charged for a letter carried five miles. So with all newspapers carried in the ordinary course of transmission to subscribers in the ordinary way. Our postal laws have been within a few years extended to all express matter really. They have been greatly extended so that our postal service now embraces a vast variety of matter that was formerly excluded from the mails. Large packages of newspapers are sent for distribution and resale by dealers; so that the Post Office Department does a great deal of business that in olden times would have been done by express companies.

The fourth section of the act of March 25, 1864, which it is now proposed to repeal, was intended to prevent an abuse. Every ounce of matter carried to these remote Territories costs several times the amount received by the Government for its transmission. So far as letters are concerned, which tend to promote an interchange of communication between citizens of the United States, it may be unwise to discriminate, although the cost of their transmission is a great deal more there than in other settled portions of the country; but when you extend the postal service so that it embraces a great variety of matter, coming more properly within the duty of common carriers, there is then a proper reason for limiting the amount of mail matter that may thus be carried. It seems to me that this fourth section of the act of 1864 was a wise one. I think the amount paid to the Overland Mail Company is $600,000 per year.

Mr. CONNESS. One million dollars.

Mr. SHERMAN. It was formerly when I remembered it $600,000, the original contract, now increased to $1,000,000. In 1860 when the act was first passed, I think it was $600,000. Then we give a sum for transporting mail matter around by water.

Mr. CONNESS. That is deducted from the $1,000,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then probably I was right that $600,000 is the amount paid to this company. Our laws were so arranged that the bulky matter was transported by water at a less price per ounce or per pound, and in this way the expense was lessened. Now it is claimed that because the Pacific railroad approaches completion this discrimination should be done away with. So far as the railroad company can carry the mail matter I am perfectly willing that it should be done away with. The price of transportation on the railroad is fixed by general rules, and just so far as the railroad extends this discrimination should cease; but the expense of this express matter is from the terminus of the railroads though the different by-ways or different roads in that remote country.

We are now organizing new mail service not only over the South, but over the West, and all this service is a vast addition to the expenses of the Post Office Department. During the war the Post Office Department was self-sustaining. Now, it is gradually falling back, and the deficiency in the postal service is largely increasing. This measure will tend still more largely to increase it.

Under these circumstances it seems to me it would be wiser to postpone this measure, which will unquestionably lead to an addition of the expenses of the Post Office Department, until the time when the railroads are spread over that country. There is no hardship in requiring dealers who get express matter, mail matter if you please, over these roads at the expense of the Government, to pay that additional expense. You simply load down your mail and require these stages to carry a great amount of matter over vast distances at the expense of the Government of the United States, not for the benefit of the people, but for the benefit merely of the persons who probably sell magazines, &c. All the citizens who subscribed for a newspaper or who received letters would get their mail matter at precisely the same cost that we would in old and settled communities where the expense is not one tenth the cost in the extreme western country.

As a matter of course I have no care on this subject except so far as it will affect the increased cost. After September we shall undoubtedly have to pay more for this service, and we shall feel it in the end by the increase of the deficiency in the Post Office Department. This is a matter involving, I presume, several hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. CONNESS. Oh, no.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no doubt that the postal service which now costs $16,000,000 altogether will be increased several hundred thousand dollars by the provisions of this bill. That is my deliberate judgment. I cannot say what the amount will be, because I have no material to estimate upon; but our country is so vast and our population is scattered through so vast an extent of territory that the expense of this transportation will be greatly increased. It seems to me it is a matter well worthy of consideration.

Mr. RAMSEY. The Senate might infer from the opposition of the Senator from Ohio to this proposition that there was something extraordinary about it. My own impression is, from all the information I can gather, that it will not cost the Government one cent additional for the transportation of printed matter by mail as provided for in this bill. Now, sir, throughout the United States, no matter what the distance is, east of the Alleghany mountains—and so it is on the Pacific slope—a letter or printed matter will pass at a uniform rate, and the only discrimination known under our law is against these interior Territories, the very region of the country in favor of which discrimination, if discrimination should be had anywhere, should be made. The people there get their reading matter at very great expense as compared with what we pay for it in the States east of the mountains. I am told by those familiar with the newspaper business in the Territories, that a newspaper which you can buy here for five or ten cents costs them fifty cents or a dollar there. Why should this continue? Why should these people who build up your country at a great sacrifice at best have this sacrifice imposed upon them by a discrimination against them in your laws. Sir, there is no reason for it; and there is no reason for the apprehensions of the Senator from Ohio that this bill will add to the expense of the transportation of the mails. It will not add one cent to that expense. The Pacific railroad is almost completed across the continent, and of course the expense of the transportation of the mail will not be one half or twenty-five per cent. of what it used to be. It is simply upon the lateral roads, the roads running north into Montana and south into New Mexico, on which staging has yet to be done, except a small link between the extremities east and west. I hope the Senate will allow the bill to pass.

Mr. CONNESS. I rise to correct a statement of the Senator from Ohio, and to make an additional statement touching the cost of this service. The whole cost, I think, under the old contract was $1,000,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. A single line.

Mr. CONNESS. Certainly; a single line. I am speaking of a single line to which this law applies. One hundred and sixty thousand dollars of that were paid for sea service, leaving $840,000 for overland service. That was when the overland service reached from Atchison, in Kansas, to Folsom, in California, on wheels. I have no doubt, under the new contract to be made in September, the entire service, after the repeal of this provision, will not exceed $500,000; so that in place of its being an increase, there will be a decrease at least of one third. I have no doubt at all on that point. The Senator is entirely mistaken in his estimates.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads is certainly laboring under a mistake in supposing that we are going to diminish the expense of carrying the mails even after we have obtained railroads; for if he examines the subject he will find that we are paying, in many instances, more than we paid before the construction of railroads for the transportation of the mails, so that the amount we are to pay for mail service will not be diminished whenever the Pacific railroad is completed, for they will unquestionably demand the maximum rate per mile for that service, and will be entitled to it. The idea that this is not to increase the expenses of the mails that are transported by stage coaches, to me seems utterly preposterous. We know that the mails will be increased in some cases by tons, and the idea that the contractors are going to take the mails for the same price is certainly without any foundation. It will increase the expense, and we cannot shut our eyes to the fact. I regret that the Senate did not incorporate the amendment that I proposed, to postpone this repeal until 1869. If it had been postponed until 1869, then the increased amount that would be paid on the stage-coach mail between the two points of the railroads would be much less, but that not having been incorporated in it, I trust the bill will fail.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill; and upon that question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 26, nays 12; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cameron, Chandler, Cole, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Davis, Drake, Ferry, Harlan, Howard, Howe, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Vickers, Wade, Wiley, Williams, and Yates—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Conkling, Essendeen, Freligh, Folsom, Hendricks, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Sherman, and Wilson—12.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Buckalew, Cattell, Dixon, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fowler, Grimes, Henderson, McCreery, Morton, Norton, Saulsbury, Sprague, and Tipton—16.

So the bill was passed.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I ask permission to present at this time a report from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the act making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1869.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 601) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1869, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from their disagreement to the third, twenty-fourth, twenty-fifth, thirty-seventh, and thirty-eighth amendments of the Senate, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from their thirty-fifth and thirty-sixth amendments.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the eighth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with the following amendment:

Strike out all of said amendment and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Provided, That the civil engineer and naval storekeeper at the several navy-yards, shall be appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate, and that the persons employed at the several navy-yards to superintend the mechanical departments, and heretofore known as master mechanics, master carpenters, master joiners, master blacksmiths, master boiler-makers, master sailmakers, master plumbers, master painters, master calkers, master masons, master boat-builders, master spar-makers, master block-makers, master laborers, and the superintendents of rope-walks, shall be men skilled in their several duties and appointed from civil life, and shall not be appointed from the officers of the Navy."

And that the Senate agree to the same.

L. M. MORRILL,
RUSCOE CONKLING,
J. W. NYE,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

E. B. WASHBURN,
N. P. BANKS,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The committee agree to recede from the amendment of the Senate, which disagreed to the House proposition to reduce the Navy below eighty-five hundred men. The committee report that the Senate should recede from that and agree to the House proposition, so that the bill, as it stands, will be as presented to us from the House of Representatives in that particular. The Senate also agree to the House proposition as amended in regard to the master mechanics and subordinates in the several navy-yards. The original House proposition required them to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. The Senate non-concurred in that altogether; but the committee now recommend that the Senate shall recede from that disagreement and agree to the proposition as amended, which is that the civil engineer and naval storekeeper shall be appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, and, as to the other subordinate officers, that they shall be appointed as heretofore, without the advice and consent of the Senate. In all other respects the House recede from their position, and concur with the Senate.

The report was concurred in.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the joint resolution (H. R. No. 218) for the relief of John M. Palmer.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 1212) to relieve certain citizens of Arkansas of disabilities, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 218) for the relief of John M. Palmer; and it was signed by the President pro tempore.

REPRESENTATION OF SOUTHERN STATES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1058) to admit the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, and Alabama to representation in Congress, the pending question being on the motion of Mr. SHERMAN, to amend the amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary by striking out the following words at the close of the first section:

And the State of Georgia shall only be entitled and admitted to representation upon this further fundamental condition: that the first and third subdivisions of section seventeen of the fifth article of the constitution of said State, except the proviso to the first subdivision, shall be null and void, and that the General Assembly of said State, by solemn public act, shall declare the assent of the State to the foregoing fundamental condition.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Although this amendment was characterized by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] as an undisguised attempt at repudiation, I do not quite concur in that view of the subject. This seventeenth section of the fifth article of the constitution of Georgia does not propose to affect the obligation of the contract at all; no words can be found in that section, as I understand it, professing to destroy the existence of any contract; but the section undertakes to suspend, to make a temporary suspension of the remedy which the law otherwise would give for the enforcement of these contracts in a court of justice.

Mr. CONKLING and Mr. EDMUNDS. It is an indefinite suspension.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the honorable Senators will allow me to finish what little I have to say, they can reply if I make any mistake.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I beg pardon.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am well aware that this section provides for a suspension of the remedy for the collection of debts until the Legislative Assembly of the State shall otherwise provide, and it amounts substantially to an authority to the Legislative Assembly of the State to suspend according to its own judgment the collection of debts.

This section, I acknowledge, is obnoxious to the objection that it may be in violation of the Constitution of the United States; but it is a question that admits of discussion as to whether or not this section does absolutely violate the provision of the Constitution of the United States which prohibits a State from impairing the obligation of contracts. This constitution was made by a convention of the State of Georgia, consisting of persons who were competent to pass upon the question; it was submitted to a vote of the people of that State, and they have affirmed that this shall be their constitution; and it is barely possible that they may be correct in their judgment as to whether or not the clause of the constitution is in conformity with the Constitution of the United States. If I understand the reconstruction laws, it is not necessarily the duty of Congress to revise the constitution of every one of these States, and if, in the judgment of Congress, some clause be found there which may be regarded as in contravention of the Constitution of the United States, to strike out that clause and revise and amend the constitution and make it in entire conformity to our views of law or expediency, because if we assume to pursue that course we might just as well have made these constitutions at the beginning and sent them down there with instructions to the people to adopt them as the constitutions of the several States. It seems to me, as this is a doubtful question, that the people of the State of Georgia should be left to decide it for themselves as to whether or not this section of their constitution does accord with the Constitution of the United States. To undertake to revise it by these so-called fundamental conditions is undertaking, it seems to me, on our part to make a constitution for the people of the State of Georgia; and certainly it cannot be said that their constitution with this clause in it is not republican in form, as it is required to be by the reconstruction laws of Congress.

This section of the constitution of Georgia was adopted by the convention, and has been approved by the people of that State. I do not understand that it is a section of the constitution which is altogether favored by the debtors in the State of Georgia, but I understand that the creditors there favored the adoption of this section, and I am advised that members of the convention, to whom twenty and thirty and as much as fifty thousand dollars were due in the State, were active friends of this provision in the constitution. It is a section which meets generally, as I understand, with the approbation of both debtors and creditors in that State.

When the debts to which this section refers were created, the people of the State of Georgia were generally possessed of slave property. Many of these debts were contracted upon the faith of that property. Men incurred these obligations with an expectation that out of that sort of property they could meet their contracts. Most of the personal property of that State consisted in slaves. Now that property has been struck out of existence, millions upon millions of that sort of property have been destroyed by the action of the Federal Government with the consent of the people; and so these debtors have been left without the means which they expected to have for the payment of these debts, and thousands of men there are left in the possession of land without the necessary means for its cultivation. In view of this fact, and in view of the devastation of the war and of the general impoverishment of the people, it was believed to be for the advantage of all concerned, creditors as well as debtors, that there should be a relief or a stay law embraced within this constitution. The creditors of men in Georgia who may owe thousands of dollars are as much interested in this as the debtor. Suppose a man owes $10,000 to a dozen different men. This weight of indebtedness is a burden upon his energies; he has no expectation, no hope of success, while his property, whatever he may obtain, is exposed to an attachment or an execution; each creditor is watching the other; each desires to be more vigilant than the other, and if a man who owns land and is without personal property or effects with which to pay his debts acquires any means, if he procures the necessary agricultural implements for the cultivation of his land, or if he puts in a crop, before he can realize anything, before he can make a start, this property may be seized by some creditor anxious to be more vigilant than all other creditors, and he be stripped and reduced to his original poverty. Under these circumstances it is exceedingly difficult, if not impossible, for the debtor to acquire the necessary means for the payment of his debts. Now, if there be a law or a provision in the constitution by which all creditors are required to remain quiet until the debtor can recover himself to some extent, until he can acquire to some extent the necessary means for the payment of his indebtedness, then the Legislative Assembly, if he does not pay without the forcible collection of those debts, may authorize the creditors, each having an equal start, to collect their debts.

Stay laws have been enacted in different States of the Union. They have been found necessary in these southern States. Insolvent laws, bankrupt laws are all of a kindred nature with the clause which is contained in this constitution. And, sir, the Congress of the United States has passed a bankrupt law and made it applicable to existing debts, and has authorized the repudiation and cancellation of millions of indebtedness in the United States by the debtors going through a certain process.

Mr. CONKLING. The honorable Senator will permit me to ask him a question. Is it not true, universally true, that the Federal courts and all other courts have held that such a provision as he speaks of in the laws of any State is absolutely void? In other words, is it not true that all insolvent laws in the States (because they have no power to pass bankrupt laws) have been compelled to be confined to prospective provisions, on the ground that it was absolutely null for any State, whatever its constitution might be, to attempt to strike down or discharge existing debts? And is it not true that Mr. Madison, for example, in what he said on that subject, made the distinction and pleaded as he did the universal acquiescence of the American people, to use his own phrase, for holding that even the Congress of the United States had the power to pass a retroactive bankrupt law?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I know, Mr. President, that there have been decisions that the insolvent laws of a State intended to operate retrospectively upon contracts, were invalid; but Congress has decided that a bankrupt law passed by this body may apply to and dissolve existing contracts; and I say that such a law as that has been in force in the United States now for more than a year, and men who were willing to avail themselves of the benefits of that law have discharged themselves from the obligations of their contracts. I speak of that simply to say that Congress having enacted such a law on the ground that the pecuniary embarrassments of the people required such an enactment, and having authorized the destruction of millions of indebtedness in the United States, ought not to be too eager to condemn the people of Georgia for repudiation because they provide, so far as they themselves are concerned, as among themselves, that there may be a suspension of the collection of debts within that State.

Now, sir, it seems to me that this matter may be properly left to the people of the State of Georgia. Is there any complaint made here by those people as to this clause of the constitution? I understand that this provision of the constitution is one of the most acceptable within the instrument, and that it is not a provision about which there is any party division in the State of Georgia; but it is simply regarded there by all the people, in view of the great losses which they have sustained during the war, in view of the general prostration of business in that State, as a temporary relief, so that men who have lands and plantations there may proceed and prepare themselves for the payment of their debts. If men who have nothing but lands there are to be pursued with this indebtedness from time to time, are to be followed from year to year, can they ever enable themselves to discharge the indebtedness which has been devolved upon them?

The section of the bill which it is moved to amend it seems to me is not quite consistent with itself, for while it proposes to amend the constitution of Georgia by striking out a certain portion of its provisions, it retains another portion which amounts to a repudiation of debt. I allude to the proviso "that no court or officer shall have, nor shall the General Assembly give, jurisdiction or authority to try or give judgment on, or enforce any debt the consideration of which was a slave or slaves, or the hire thereof." Suppose before the abolition of slavery in the State of Georgia a man purchased a slave and gave his note for it; that was a legitimate transaction at the time; that was a valid contract at the time. This constitution undertakes to say that that contract shall cease to exist. It is different from the other provision, for it not only provides that the remedy shall be suspended, but it denies to the General Assembly of the State the power to authorize the collection of any such debt.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There we stand on the higher law.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I know you stand in that respect on the higher law; but if this provision which the Senator proposes to strike out is so obnoxious because it is in violation of the Constitution of the United States, how does he reconcile his support of the proviso which I have just read, which is retained in the section, which is in itself equally unconstitutional? Suppose, while slavery existed there, a man hired a slave and agreed to give $500 for his services for two or three years, and he enjoyed the benefit of those services, he received the labor of the slave, he sold the proceeds of that labor and received the money for it; this constitution declares that such a contract shall be null and void, and that no court of the State of Georgia shall ever enforce a collection of the money under it. Why do you include this and repudiate the other portion of the section? The fact that slavery has since been abolished does not affect the validity of a contract good at the time it was made.

It was suggested by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] that there was danger, if we allowed this provision to stand, that we might encourage the repudiation of the national debt, just as though we are bound, as a Congress, to take care that the people of each State, in the regulation of their own domestic affairs, shall conform to our views of matters and things. If the Federal Government stood in the position that the debtors in Georgia do, repudiation would be inevitable, because the Federal Government could not to-day pay its debt if it was compelled to do so. If there was any power in any court to compel it to pay, to render judgment, and to issue execution against the Federal Government, could the Federal Government pay its debt or one tenth part of its debt under such circumstances? But the Federal Government has the power to provide the terms and conditions upon which it will pay; it fixes the time when it will pay its indebtedness; it puts off the payment for years, and it proposes now to extend the time, and the creditors of the Federal Government have no power but to submit to the regulations that are imposed upon them. So there is no analogy whatever between the cases. The simple fact that the people of the State of Georgia desire that there shall be a temporary suspension of the power to collect debts there, is no reason, and it can be perverted in no way to excuse or justify repudiation.

There have been very many sound philosophers and statesmen who have argued that all laws for the enforcement of the collection of debts should be abolished. Every man has a right in Georgia, who is so disposed, to pay his debts; every man who feels bound in honor to pay has a perfect right to pay; and it has been argued by some very distinguished men that it would be as safe, and that it would be of as much advantage in every point of view to intrust the payment of debts to the honor of the debtor, as to provide that the creditor might pursue him through a court of justice. I do not, of course, indorse that view of the subject; but in view of all the circumstances, considering the condition of the people there and the doubtful character of this legislation, as the question does not seem to me to be entirely clear, I think we had better not interfere. If you take the provision altogether it contemplates that the obligation of the contract shall exist, because there is a clause declaring that at a subsequent time when creditors may proceed under the law of the Legislature to collect debts a certain tax shall be imposed, showing that this section recognizes the obligation of the debt. I do not say that I would have advised such a section in the constitution of the State of Georgia; but I say that after it has been made by a convention of the people there, and after it has been approved by a majority of the people, in view of all the circumstances and of what we know to be the necessities of that people, and in view of the advantages to all, the advantages to creditors as well as debtors, we ought not to disturb it. So far as creditors living in other States are concerned, their remedies in the courts of the United States remain entirely perfect. This is a matter altogether that concerns the people of the State of Georgia; and if they agree among themselves that they will suspend the collection of debts for a given time for the benefit of all concerned, whose business is it? They alone are concerned. Are we to set ourselves up as the guardians of the people of the State of Georgia on this question, and say to them, "You do not know how to take care of yourselves, and we will undertake to regulate these matters for your benefit." Where are the creditors in the State of Georgia who have come here and complained of this section? They say that they desire that it shall be in here; it makes the constitution acceptable; it provides for repose; it enables every man to go to work with a feeling of security and to resuscitate his fallen fortunes. The man who has been unfortunate during this war, who has become involved in debt, whose property in slaves has been taken away by the convulsions of the war or the amendment of the Constitution, may go to work, and he may feel secure that he can do something for the improvement of the country and the support of his family and the benefit of society, without having a sheriff at his heels all the time to seize every crop that he undertakes to raise, and to keep him in a state of servitude under the burden of indebtedness.

Now, sir, ought we not to let the people of the State of Georgia manage this matter for themselves? We are in no way complicated if we accept this constitution. We did not make it. We do not pass any judgment upon this provision of the constitution. I doubt not there are many provisions in all these constitutions about the constitutionality of which men might very properly differ; but if any man is aggrieved by any provision of any constitution there that is supposed to be unconstitutional, the courts of the country are open for redress, and that man can vindicate his rights there. But, sir, I deny that it is our business to undertake to supervise the creation of these constitutions, beyond requiring that they shall be republican, that they shall protect the civil and political rights of all men; but so far as courts are concerned, so far as contracts are concerned, or commerce, or business within the jurisdiction of these several States, I submit that the people there ought to be left to regulate those matters for themselves.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, it is quite evident, from the language of this clause of the constitution of Georgia, at least it is evident to my mind, that it resulted from the efforts of the debtor part of the community. I do not, however, regard it as any worse on that account. The debtor part of the community have their rights as well as the creditor portion; but they have no greater rights. While it is the duty of legislators to protect the rights of the debtor, it is not by any means to be forgotten that the honest creditor is equally entitled to the protection of law. I shall vote against the amendment which has been offered, to strike out the clause in the report of the Committee on the Judiciary disagreeing to this seventeenth section of the fifth article of this constitution. I look upon that section as disfiguring the constitution of that State, and do not believe that to-day, if the opinions of the people of that State could, upon a full consideration of the subject, be taken on the question of retaining this clause of their constitution, they would do so.

If there be any quality of a civilized government more bright and shining than any other, it is the regular, vigorous, and prompt administration of justice between man and man, and particularly the enforcement of pecuniary obligations between them. Without this quality no government is entitled to the name; and I dissent entirely from the views taken by those philosophic writers to whom my honorable friend from Oregon has referred, that it would be better for all to leave the question of indebtedness to be settled between the parties without any intervention of the laws. I do not believe that debts would be paid upon the principle of mere honor as promptly as they are now paid under the threat of an execution and forced sale for that purpose. We have not yet quite reached those millennial days when every man regards the rights of his neighbor as equally precious with his own.

Now, sir, what is this clause? It is as follows:

"1. No court in this State shall have jurisdiction to try or determine any suit against any resident of this State upon any contract or agreement made or implied, or upon any contract made in renewal of any debt existing prior to the 1st day of June, 1865; nor shall any court or ministerial officer of this State have authority to enforce any judgment, execution, or decree rendered or issued upon any contract or agreement made or implied, or upon any contract in renewal of a debt existing prior to the 1st day of June, 1865, except in the following cases."

It cannot escape the attention of Senators that here are two classes of contracts, both of which come within the prohibitory terms of the clause. The first covers every executory contract that may be made between parties or that may have been made at any time in that State prior to the 1st of June, 1865. For instance, a party in Georgia enters into a contract with his neighbor upon a valuable consideration to convey to him at some future time a tract of land; he has not yet conveyed it; the time within which he is to make the conveyance has arrived; and this clause of the constitution steps in and declares that even under such a contract a court of equity shall be deprived of the power to compel the party to perfect his contract and give a conveyance to the purchaser. Is this just? Of course it is the height of injustice. The constitution in this respect operates as a fraud upon the honest purchaser by taking away from him all judicial remedy to compel the vendor to perform his agreement. The same may be said as to every description of executory contracts whether in reference to real estate or to personal property. All those contracts are brought within the category of this prohibitory clause.

Again, it declares that no contract out of which an indebtedness shall have grown and no renewal of such a contract, whenever that contract may have been made, however old it may be, however sacred it may be, shall be the foundation of any remedy in a court of justice. Mr. President, this is very harsh and sweeping; and we are now called upon to approve and affirm this strange provision in the constitution of Georgia. Why, sir, it was long ago settled that every law of a State by which all substantial remedy is taken away from the party upon his contract is a violation of the obligation of that contract. Take away the remedy of the party upon his contract, say to him that the court of justice shall not come to his aid, and you legally violate the contract itself. This, sir, is very old doctrine; it was decided as long ago as the case of Green vs. Biddle, in 8 Wheaton's Reports. It was there decided that such an act is a violation of that clause of the Constitution of the United States which prohibits the States from passing an act impairing the obligation of a contract. Can we consistently, even by our silence, approve such a principle as this? Can we here vote an approval of this constitution, which, by its very terms, is a violation of the Constitution of the United States, which we have sworn to support? Sir, I cannot do this. I cannot forget my obligation to the Constitution; I cannot forget that that instrument prohibits the adoption of any such principle by a State.

Now, sir, I insist that there can be no necessity even in Georgia for such a clause as this. It will not be long before the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States will become to all intents and purposes a part of the Constitution. That amendment declares that all manner of indebtedness contracted in aid of the recent rebellion shall not be the foundation of any claim in any court of justice. This is the language:

But neither the United States nor any State shall assume or pay any debt or obligation incurred in aid of insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or any claim for the loss or emancipation of any slave; but all such debts, obligations, and claims shall be held illegal and void.

No matter where they are set up, whether as a claim against a State or a claim of one private party against another, this amendment of the Constitution declares them to be void. Of course they can never be enforced even in a private proceeding between man and man, so that so far as any such kind of claims is concerned, the provision is already ample and sufficient, and all debtors involved in them may rest perfectly secure from all molestation on their account.

Again, we have recently passed a bankrupt law which is of universal application in all parts of the United States and to all the people of the United States, the people of Georgia included. That act enables every honest debtor who is insolvent, by a certain proceeding to be taken according to the terms of the act, to discharge himself from his indebtedness. Every man in Georgia who owes debts and who has honestly become insolvent, whether by the emancipation of his slaves or any other cause which is not illegal or dishonest, may resort to this act and discharge himself entirely from his indebtedness. Is not this a consideration which ought to have weight with us in our discussions of this constitution, and with the people of Georgia? We have thus relieved the suffering people of Georgia, every man of them who is honestly insolvent, from the pressure of his debts; and he has it in his power to-day, by a simple proceeding, to discharge himself and become again a free man by making an assignment of his property for the benefit of his honest creditors.

Again, sir, this constitution itself makes very ample provision against almost every case of hardship that can occur in the State of Georgia. It declares, in article seven, that:

"1. Each head of a family, or guardian, or trustee, of a family of minor children, shall be entitled to a homestead of realty to the value of $2,000 in specie, and personal property to the value of $1,000 in specie, both to be valued at the time they are set apart. And no court, or ministerial officer in this State, shall ever have jurisdiction or authority to enforce any judgment, decree, or execution against said property so set apart—including such improvements as may be made thereon, from time to time—except for taxes, money borrowed and expended in the improvement of the homestead, or for the purchase-money of the same, and for labor done thereon, or material furnished therefor, or removal of incumbrances thereon. And it shall be the duty of the General Assembly, as early as practicable, to provide, by law, for the setting apart and valuation of said property, and to enact laws for the full and complete protection and security of the same to the sole use and benefit of said families as aforesaid."

Here, I undertake to say, is a larger exemption of homestead property than exists in any other State of the Union. If there be any constitution or statute containing a more liberal provision on that subject, I have not yet seen it.

When the convention of Georgia passed upon this constitution they contemplated that Congress might not consent to every clause of the instrument, and hence they declared in article eleven, subdivision eleven.

"XI. Should this constitution be ratified by the people, and Congress accept the same with any qualifications or conditions, the government herein provided for and the officers elected shall nevertheless exist and continue in the exercise of their several functions, as the government of this State, so far as the same may be consistent with the action of the United States in the premises."

They have thus invited our attention to this clause of their constitution; and they have agreed in the instrument itself that in case Congress shall dissent from any of its provisions they may do so, and that those provisions shall not be considered and treated as parts of their constitution, although the government of the State is to go on, notwithstanding our dissent and rejection of objectionable provisions. There was some person in that convention who saw that there might be an objection raised here against this clause, proclaiming, as it does, an almost universal jubilee to the debtor part of the community in that State; and the people who voted upon the Constitution and ratified it have in like manner agreed that we may revise and correct it as we may see fit. Now, sir, I propose to avail myself of this privilege thus extended to us. I cannot consent to this attempt to repudiate honest debts created before the commencement of the rebellion as well as after. I am opposed to this system of repudiation, (for it is nothing else,) because where you take away all remedy from a party, where you say to him there shall be no court to which he can resort for a remedy, you as much violate the contract itself as if you had taken it in your hands and destroyed it.

It is very true, Mr. President, that this constitution in a subsequent clause declares that in case the Assembly shall by law give the courts jurisdiction over the excluded contracts they may do so; but this does not satisfy my mind. We are called upon as legislators here to pass upon the propriety of this system of repudiation, and, for one, I cannot agree to it, and I do not believe the people of Georgia will complain if we strike it out of their constitution. I cannot imagine that there can be a majority of the people of Georgia who are willing to say to the poor man or to the rich man who has an honest claim against his neighbor that he shall have no legal means whatever to enforce it. I do not believe that a majority of that people have so far forgotten their obligation to the Constitution of the United States; I do not believe that a majority of them have so far lost sight of the principles of common honesty as to deny all remedy to a creditor, whether he be poor or rich. Sir, it is a violation of the first principles of civilized government; it is a broad and deliberate departure from that definition of justice which the Justinian code so beautifully expresses: "Justitia est constans et perpetua voluntas jus suum cuique tribuere;" which, being interpreted into English, if the Senator from Massachusetts will allow me to translate it, [laughter,] means: "Justice is the constant and perpetual willingness and wish to give to every man that which is his own." This clause denies it.

I hope, therefore, Mr. President, that this clause in the bill will not be stricken out. The people of the State of Georgia who have passed upon this constitution expect us to act upon it, and if they entertain that expectation, as they say they do in the constitution they have sent us, they must foresee that there can be but one result in our action upon it; and that is, that we shall abide by the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, having concurred, as a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, in recommending the imposition of this condition, although I do not believe in the general policy of imposing conditions on the admission of States, I beg to assign briefly my reason for concurring in the report of the committee.

The constitution proposed by the State of Georgia provides for its own acceptance by Congress with such qualifications or conditions as may be thought necessary by the Congress of the United States; but I did not suppose that it was necessary to appeal to this provision of the constitution of Georgia in order to vindicate the recommendation of the committee. On the contrary, it seemed to me that this proposition fell precisely within the principle of the Missouri case. That constitution, as was alleged, in defiance of the Constitution of the United States, attempted to set up an inequality in its own favor; and it was to level that distinction, and to conform it to the Constitution of the United States, that Congress imposed what was there called a condition. This case seemed to me to fall within that principle, because I could not doubt, and after hearing the remarks of the honorable Senator from Ohio and of the honorable Senator from Oregon, I still cannot doubt that these provisions are in palpable and flagrant conflict with the Constitution of the United States.

I assume, first, Mr. President, that if it be true that this provision of the constitution of Georgia does conflict with the provisions of the national Constitution we shall have little difficulty in harmonizing here upon the proposition that our right extends as far as we are now asserting it. Indeed, I think upon that hypothesis there would be but one answer and one objection to this part of the bill in its present form, and that is, that the proposed constitution, infringing upon the Constitution of the United States, would be therefore and thereby void, and thus it would be unnecessary for us to impose this condition, and its imposition would be surplusage. That argument was made in the case to which I have adverted, and it may always be made in these cases; and it goes rather to the question of convenience, to the question of discretion, than to anything else. It may be said that it is just as well to commit to the action of the courts, without any direction from us, the whole question, and trust to the adjudication there; but the other view has been accepted repeatedly, and in the various compacts which have been made in reference to the taxation of the public lands, and a variety of things heretofore referred to in a previous debate Congress has assumed, so that I think we may consider that the better practice, that it is well worth while, on the threshold, to point out and give notice of such repugnancies in proposed constitutions as we intend to insist upon and denounce as void by the Constitution of the United States. The only question then remaining upon this branch of the subject is, whether the Senator from Oregon, for example, is right in affirming that there is nothing here conflicting with the injunction of the Federal Constitution that no State shall pass laws impairing the obligation of contracts.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to correct the Senator. I made no such affirmation. I said that it was a doubtful question as to whether or not it was in conflict with the Constitution of the United States; a question upon which men would differ and did differ, and in consequence of that it was the province, in my judgment, of the convention of the people of Georgia to decide the question for themselves.

Mr. CONKLING. I am going to argue briefly to the Senate that it is not a question upon which men differ, or upon which lawyers can differ, and I am going to ask the Senator to agree with me, that these provisions are so palpably in the teeth of the other provision, to which I will advert, that they cannot stand together, and that no lawyer can affirm that he thinks there is a rational doubt on the subject.

We start with a provision in this constitution that no judicial and no executive officer shall take part in the enforcement of any debt or obligation created anterior to the year 1868; and there is no redemption, there is no salvation or qualification as to this section, excepting the provision that the Legislature by affirmative action may rescue certain cases from its operation. I say there is no qualification, excepting this, beyond the few isolated and specified cases which are withdrawn by the constitution. Thus, then, we have this provision, that no creditor whatever, with the exception of the few here described, shall have any remedy now, or at any time in the future, against his debtor, unless at some future time the Legislature shall set up the means by which that remedy is to be acquired.

Stop there one moment, Mr. President, and let us see where this proposition falls, tested by all the cases on this subject, not only the case of Green vs. Biddle, referred to by the Senator from Michigan, but a variety of other cases, some of which I have been looking at this morning, where the court has said in various forms "the laws which exist at the time and place of making the contract, enter into and form a part of it, and they embrace alike those which effect its validity, construction, discharge, and enforcement;" and see now how recently this has been affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States, and see how striking one case is in particular, which will be familiar to my honorable friend from Illinois, in which the decision has been made. There was in the State of Illinois recently a stay law proposing to stay for only twelve months, according to my recollection, the collection of debts, and that, I think, upon the assent of two thirds of the creditors, or with some prudential qualification of that kind; and that law, the court said, in 1 Howard, directly interfered with this provision of the Federal Constitution, and was void, proposing merely and literally a postponement of the remedies by which debts were to be collected. And so in a variety of other cases which I have here, embracing every instance of an insolvent law, whether called by that name or called a bankrupt law, in which any State has attempted to unsettle or interfere with existing debts. And therefore it is, as the honorable Senator from Oregon will remember, and therefore it was that the Constitution of the United States commits and commits exclusively, as the courts have held over and over again, to the Congress of the United States the power to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy. Were it otherwise, were it in the power of the States to do what, even in the mild construction of the Senator, these provisions mean, why would it be necessary or useful for Congress to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy? Every State could regulate the matter for itself by stay laws or otherwise, and we should have the whole country checkered with ununiform and peculiar systems of bankruptcy.

But, Mr. President, go a little further in these provisions, and you find that no debt, that no evidence of debt which is in any respect tainted by affinity or contact with the rebellion, is to be enforced. That is all well so far, but entirely unnecessary, by the by, as was said by the honorable Senator from Michigan, because this constitution is not to speak until this bill is consummated, until it has passed both Houses and received the executive signature or been passed over the executive veto, and whenever that occurs, and the act shall take effect by the ratification by each of these States of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, then every debt tainted by reason of connection with the rebellion is paralyzed and annihilated by a provision paramount to all this. But I say going only so far the provision is quite defensible; but what do they add to it? That "The burden of proof shall be upon the plaintiff to satisfy the court and jury that the bond, deed, note, bill, or other evidence of indebtedness upon which said suit is brought, is or are not, nor is any part thereof founded upon or in any way connected with any such illegal contract."

Stopping right there it would have been pretty hard to impose the negative on a plaintiff for example, if usury were set up in a State where there are usury statutes, to show affirmatively that there was no usury as a part of his case in chief. But further:

"And has not been used in aid of the rebellion and the date of such bond."

I ask the attention of my honorable friend from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] to this, in view of a question he asked yesterday, which seemed to me very cogent—

"and the date of such bond, deed, note, bill, or other evidence of indebtedness shall not be evidence that it has or has not, since its date, been issued, transferred, or used in aid of the rebellion."

So that the bona fide holder of a bond issued by the State of Georgia long anterior to the rebellion, or the holder of any other speciality good for twenty years by the former statute of limitations of the State of Georgia must show affirmatively as a part of his case in chief where that bond has been ever since the rebellion broke out; and the defendant may sit by and fold his arms without offering any evidence whatever of its being tainted, and he never can be called upon to make his proof until the other party has shown negatively the absence of all these bad qualities.

What will the Senator from Oregon say to this in the face of the decisions that the laws as they stood affecting the enforcement, the discharge, the remedies applicable to contracts, all enter into and form a part of the contract, so that displacing them does violate the sanctity of the contract? What will he say in view of these decisions of a provision such as I have read? But look a step further in this constitution:

"It shall be in the power of the General Assembly to assess and collect upon all debts, judgments, or causes of action when due, founded on any contract made or implied before the 1st day of June, 1865, in the hands of any one in his own right, or as trustee, agent, or attorney of another, on or after the 1st day of January, 1868, a tax of not exceeding twenty-five per cent., to be paid by the creditor on pain of the forfeiture of the debt, but chargeable by him as to one half thereof against the debtor, and collectable with the debt."

Did any man ever hear in a land of written law of a provision like that? Here is a man in the State of Georgia who, when the rebellion broke out, owed a firm in the city of New York $50,000 for merchandise furnished—and it is not barred by the statute of limitations, let me remind the honorable Senator from Ohio, as he suggested yesterday—for although seven years have run, and six is the customary duration of the statute in the States, Congress passed an act which, by the by, was unnecessary, providing that during the pendency of the rebellion no statute of limitations should run. The Supreme Court of the United States at its last term decided that with or without that act (because they said the law had been so in the absence of it) the statute was arrested by the rebellion and did not run against any of these debts. Therefore, to pursue my illustration, a firm or an individual in the State of Georgia owes a creditor in the city of New York, for goods furnished, $50,000, and although the debt was contracted seven years ago it is as fresh for all purposes as if it were contracted yesterday. This creditor having been kept for seven years from the pursuit of his remedy goes to the State of Georgia and commences his suit. The first thing that happens to him is to fall under the sweep and besom of this provision, which compels him to advance twenty-five per cent. of the entire amount as a tax, half of which he is to be allowed to charge over to the debtor and collect it from him.

Will any Senator say, will the honorable Senator from Oregon say, that intelligent men can differ upon the question whether such a provision as that affects and impairs the loss as they stood covering and guarding the enforcement and validity of that contract at the time it was made? I apprehend not, sir. On the contrary, we must all admit that this is rank repudiation, covered with a gauze so thin as hardly to be respectable even as a disguise. It means nothing but that; and the only thing in it that I see to be defended in morals or in ethics is that part of the provision which denounced debts made in aid of the rebellion and debts with regard to slaves. The latter is excepted by the proposition in the bill as it stands; and the portion relative to debts contracted in aid of the rebellion, as I said once before, and as we ought none of us to forget, is abundantly disposed of by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which is to take effect as soon as this takes effect, because here are States enough to consummate it, and its consummation by them is a condition precedent to admission.

Therefore, Mr. President, it seemed to me clear that here was a case of an attempt by a State to invade the principles of commercial honor and of public morals, and at the same time to invade a clear provision of the Constitution of the United States; and I thought the committee did well to stand first upon the invitation which the State of Georgia had given Congress to qualify this constitution in its acceptance, and I think they would have done well, had it not been there, to stand on the broad ground assumed in the Missouri case, that States are to come in no more than the equals of prior States, and that a provision like this, peculiar and obnoxious, is not to be tolerated upon the general grounds.

Mr. President, while speaking of this I wish to call attention to a provision of the constitution of the State of Alabama, which by a very close vote has been included in this bill, and I ask to bring it to the attention of the Senate because a memorial has been sent here signed by many constituents of mine and other persons, representing the estates of deceased persons, representing widows and minor children. The twenty-sixth section of article one of the constitution of Alabama contains a provision which in principle, it seems to me, cannot be distinguished from this which we have been discussing. I will read the whole of the section, as it is very brief:

"That all navigable waters shall remain forever public highways, free to the citizens of the State and of the United States, without tax, impost, or toll imposed; and that no tax, toll, impost, or wharfage shall be demanded or received from the owner of any merchandise or commodity for the use of the shores or any wharf erected on the shores or in or over the waters of any navigable stream, unless the same be expressly authorized by the General Assembly."

Mr. HOWARD. What article is that?

Mr. CONKLING. It is the twenty-sixth section of article one of the constitution of Alabama. I beg to inquire of Senators what is the distinction in principle between that provision and a provision declaring that no rent should be collected for farms or the occupation of land in the State of Alabama, except by express permission of the General Assembly of that State? No man is to be allowed to receive for the use of any wharf erected on the shores of a stream or erected over any stream. What does that mean? A warehouse, in common language. No man is to be allowed to receive for the use of a wharf, a warehouse, or the shores of a stream any toll, tax, or compensation for its occupation. Riparian owners are to be divested of the use and occupation, the rents, issues, and profits of their land. I see no principle upon which this can be defended; and here are memorialists who recite that in the city of Mobile they have become the owners of considerable water fronts, which they have improved at a large expense, in respect of which attempts have been made repeatedly to invade their rights; that there are now pending litigations involving their rights, and that they are met by a proposition in this constitution to strike them down and obliterate them at one stroke.

It seems to me, Mr. President, (because the subject is properly here now, if Alabama is to go into this bill,) that the same condition which we are proposing in the case of Georgia ought to be extended to this case; because, although the operation of it may be less general, although the hardship of it in the actual realization may be less in this case than in the other, the distinction between the two cases in principle I am unable to see.

Now, Mr. President, while I am up, I wish to set a matter right with my honorable friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON.] We had some discussion the other day as to the vote given by him in reference to the provision as it stands now in the reconstruction law requiring a majority of all registered voters to participate in the elections. Since that time the honorable Senator and myself have explored the record to see how it stands, and it shows that the honorable Senator did vote for the provision as it is in the law requiring a majority to participate in the election to decide the question whether a convention should be held and who should compose that convention, but that he spoke against and voted against the provision in reference to the other election. It shows that he voted for the provision requiring a majority of all the registered voters to take part in the election ratifying the constitution only as that provision stood as a part of the bill, and that he did not vote for it as it stood separately. That is as my honorable friend understands the record, taking the Globe and Journal both together. It is a record not very easy to be understood, as we both found; and the occasion of the mistake did not occur to either of us until after we had looked at it very fully; but we were both satisfied it was a misleading record as it appeared in the Globe, and the whole thing taken together showed his position as I now take great pleasure in stating it to be.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I am inclined to vote for the amendment now pending, and it has been attacked so vigorously and so gravely that I feel called upon to apologize for, if I cannot justify, the vote I am about to give.

When any measure I espouse or any vote I propose to give is advertised as a sanction of repudiation, it is calculated to startle me, because I am not on that platform, as a general thing. I am rather in favor of the payment of debts, all debts except my own, [laughter;] but, sir, I am not so clear that everything which is called a debt ought to be paid. One of the first efforts to which this Government directed its attention upon the close of hostilities was to prevent the payment of a certain class of contracts which were entitled debts. The Government felt it to be one of the first duties incumbent upon them to relieve the people of each one of these States which plunged into the rebellion from the obligation of paying each and all the debts which were contracted in aid of that rebellion, and that for a double reason: because the obligation was stained with the guilt of the rebellion itself, and because it was known that many of those debts had been contracted in defiance of the will of those people from whose pockets must be wrenched the means to pay the debts. That effort we hope will be finally successful.

The clauses in the constitution of Georgia which are brought to the attention of the Senate by the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio are another effort to afford relief similar to that, as it seems to me, to which I have just alluded.

Sir, two events have transpired to that community in Georgia which seem to me to make this measure proper, just, and equitable, if the measure itself can be defended upon constitutional grounds. I assume that the purpose of this clause in the constitution of Georgia is not to cancel the obligation of any indebtedness existing prior to the war, and that it will not have that effect. I assume that the only purpose of it is to prevent citizens of Georgia from being harassed upon contracts entered into during the war. And now two events have transpired which seem to me to justify an effort to relieve that people from those embarrassments if it can be done. One of those events is this: when these contracts were made the people of Georgia held one class of personal property denominated slaves, amounting to many hundred millions of dollars, which to-day, and all days hereafter, when these contracts are to be performed, if they are to be performed at all, are not worth a dime; and that, too, through the direct interference and agency of the Government, of law. It is because of a change in the laws that that class of property, worth so many millions then, is worth nothing now, in the sense in which it was then valued.

But another event has taken place. When these debts were contracted a dollar meant a very different thing from what it means to-day and must mean hereafter when these debts are to be enforced. When in 1863 and 1864 contracts were made for the payment of $100 or $1,000 those people were subjected to laws under the operation of which $100 or $1,000 was as but a song in comparison with $100 or $1,000 to-day. If the courts are to be opened to the enforcement of these obligations, it must be remembered that the term "dollar" will enter into the judgment just as it did into the contract; but although the judgment may be but for $100, and the contract on which that judgment is obtained was for the precise sum of $100, the $100 with which the judgment will be paid will be from four to fifty fold as much as the $100 which were named in the contract.

Mr. HOWARD. Suppose the contract was payable in confederate money.

Mr. HOWE. As the contract was payable.

Mr. JOHNSON. A dollar is worth more than it was then.

Mr. HOWE. So it seems to me, that a dollar is worth more now than it was then.

Mr. JOHNSON. You pay it in greenbacks now.

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir; it is paid in greenbacks, and when the contract was made it was made payable in confederate money. It is all the difference between greenbacks and confederate money. So it seems to me very proper to relieve the people against these evils if it can be done.

But it is said it cannot be done because of a plain and palpable prohibition in the Constitution of the United States. It is said that this clause of the constitution of Georgia does impair the obligation of a contract, and that that is forbidden by the Constitution of the United States. I am not going to detain the Senate at any length with an argument upon that constitutional question. It would be profitless to do so. The dispute as to what laws do or do not impair the obligation of a contract has been an active and lively one ever since that clause was put into the Constitution of the United States, and I think is no nearer settlement to-day than it was when the dispute first commenced. The authorities upon it are endless, as I remember to have known once, though it is some years since I have taken the trouble to look at any of them.

I do not think it worth while, for another reason, to detain the Senate with an argument upon this point, for I am entirely satisfied that if this clause does in effect impair the obligation of a contract it will destroy the Constitution of the United States. I think the Constitution of the United States will abide, and I think the only effect will be that this clause will be just what the pending bill says it will be, null and void; but that declaration will come from the judicial authorities of the country instead of coming from the legislative authority; and I should prefer to see that judgment pronounced by the courts rather than see it pronounced by the Legislature for two reasons: first, because when it is pronounced by the judicial authority there will be an end of the question, which will not happen if this Senate or this Congress shall so declare; and secondly, because it is possible the courts will not make such a decision, and I believe, as I have already said, it would be expedient to afford this relief if it is in the power of legislation to afford it.

Just what is the obligation of a contract, I think it is very difficult to say, in the light of adjudications. Recollect the language employed in the constitution of Georgia does not propose to touch the obligation of a contract. All the courts have said, as I remember, that although under that prohibition the legislation of a State cannot touch, cannot impair, cannot lessen the obligation of a contract, yet the courts have uniformly said that the States have full power, full control over remedies upon contracts. This provision simply undertakes to touch the remedy, to withhold the remedy upon the contract. That is what it proposes to do. What the obligation of the contract may be worth in dollars and cents after the legal remedy is taken away I shall not stop to consider. We cannot settle that.

Mr. MORTON. I wish to ask the Senator from Wisconsin one question. I ask him if the remedy to enforce a contract is not of the essence of the contract itself; and if the courts have not decided that in taking away the remedy, the means of enforcing a contract, the contract itself is thereby impaired; if that is not the uniform current of decisions on that question?

Mr. HOWE. No, Mr. President, I cannot admit that it is the uniform current of decision; and yet such language has been held by courts frequently. There is, in point of fact, but very little language on this subject which the courts have not employed at different times and in different cases. But I am not prepared to admit that a plain and adequate remedy upon a contract is of the essence of the contract itself or any part of the obligation. When I give you my note, sir, to pay you $100 I do not think it is any part of the obligation of that contract that I should furnish you a court in which to sue upon the note or obtain judgment upon the note any more than it is a part of the obligation of that contract that I will furnish you an attorney to prosecute your suit in case I do not pay. Plainly there is an obligation resting upon me to pay that $100. It is a moral obligation. The State may add legal penalties and sanctions to that obligation if it chooses. But, sir, may not the State withhold those legal sanctions if it chooses? What is there in the Constitution of the United States which compels the State to furnish judicial tribunals in which to enforce such contracts and to maintain suits upon them? Is it true, Mr. President, that, because I give a note for money, I impose upon the State in which I live a constitutional obligation to furnish judicial tribunals with which to collect that note? For if this declaration in the constitution of Georgia, which closes their courts against suits upon such notes or such obligations, is a violation of the Constitution of the United States, it seems to me that the constitution of Georgia would be a plain infraction of the Constitution of the United States if it did not provide any judicial tribunals at all, or if it confined their jurisdiction to cases of tort as distinguished from cases of contract.

If this be so, if this reasoning be correct, then the obligation which devolves upon a State to establish a judicial department in its government, to create judicial tribunals, arises, not from any command in the Constitution of the United States, for there is no such command, but it springs from the accident that some one or more of the citizens of the State have made a contract and created a necessity for some such judicial department. The first man who makes a bargain and does not execute it right off devolves the necessity upon the State. The man who goes into a hotel and takes his dinner and does not pay for it at the bar, but has it charged up, as Mr. Nasby has his grog, imposes upon the State an obligation to create a judicial department of the government that that dinner may be sued for and collected. That is the result of the argument. I do not think myself that this is any part of the obligation of a contract. I think it belongs to the remedy, only the remedy. But if I did not think so, if I were not decidedly of that opinion, if I thought the question was doubtful, if the inclination of my own mind was rather the other way, since it is not settled to be an infraction of this clause of the Federal Constitution, I should still agree to let that clause stand in the constitution of Georgia for the judicial tribunals of the land to interpret and to annul or sustain as they see fit.

Some of the exceptions taken to this provision urged by the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] as I understood him, are exceptions resting upon the second subdivision of the seventeenth section of the fifth article, which the bill reported from the Judiciary Committee sustains, and does not propose to strike out, and which the pending amendment therefore does not affect. I understand the committee propose to annul only the first and third subdivisions of the seventeenth section.

Mr. CONKLING. They propose to annul everything in relation to contracts, except as to contracts in regard to slaves.

Mr. HOWE. No, sir; only the first and third subdivisions of that section. That was my understanding of the matter. The bill reads:

"And the State of Georgia shall only be entitled and admitted to representation upon this further fundamental condition that the first and third subdivisions of section seventeen of the fifth article of the constitution of said State, except the proviso to the first subdivision, shall be null and void, and that the General Assembly of said State by solemn public act shall declare the assent of the State to the foregoing fundamental condition."

If there is any portion of these provisions which is clearly and palpably unjust, it is a portion of that very proviso which the Judiciary Committee propose to retain, for that proviso prevents the Legislature from empowering their courts to take jurisdiction of suits brought either to recover the value of slaves, or to recover the value of the labor of slaves. There is clearly a good, sound, equitable reason why the courts should not be open to enforce suits to recover the value of slaves. That palpable reason is, that slaves have no longer any value; that although the purchaser bought them in good faith, promised to pay for them in good faith, they turned to ashes on his hands, and by the intervention of the Government itself. But when he has not bought, but hired simply, he has derived all the benefit that he could possibly derive from the labor of the slave. There is no reason in the world for refusing the hirer the privilege of collecting pay for the labor of his slave, that there is not for refusing the right to collect pay for his own labor. It is a day's work, or a month's work, or a year's work, and the borrower has got the full benefit of it in either case. The committee propose to retain that provision. That seems to me as clearly unjust as any portion of this section.

But there is one feature in this section to which I have not alluded, and to which I have heard no illusion made during the debate, and that is to the first clause of the seventeenth section. Among the exceptions to the section are all cases which shall be excepted by the Legislature at any time. In spite of the prohibition in this clause, the Legislature may give jurisdiction to the courts to recover upon all these contracts except those for the hire or price of slaves, so, in the light of that exception, this prohibition amounts to nothing more than this, that the courts of Georgia shall not have jurisdiction in cases of contract any further than the Legislature shall provide; that its jurisdiction in cases of contract made prior to June 1, 1865, shall be such as the Legislature of Georgia shall prescribe. That is what it is. That is the way I read it. My friend from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] thinks I have misread it. Very likely. He will have the opportunity to point it out; but I do understand that to be the whole meaning of the provision; and, I take it, thus interpreted, no one will seriously urge that that is an infraction of the Constitution of the United States.

I have felt called upon to say so much, Mr. President, in explanation of the vote I am about to give. I think this only a reasonable protection to afford to these people. If it seems like repudiation, it is in fact only the repudiation of contracts which, as it strikes me, cannot be enforced to-day without doing great injustice to the people between whom and among whom these contracts sprang into existence. Their circumstances are so much altered, things are so vitally and radically changed, that to enforce these contracts seems to me likely to do much more injustice than justice.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I must say that I have been somewhat surprised by this discussion and by the positions that have been taken in defense of this article in the constitution of Georgia. We have heard from the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] yesterday from the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] and just now from the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOWE,] that this provision was necessary for the protection of the people of Georgia, and to enable them once more to recover their position. Why is it more necessary in Georgia than in any other of the rebel States? In point of fact Georgia suffered less from the rebellion than almost any other State that was engaged in it. It was exempted from the actual presence of contending forces almost entirely until Sherman made his march to the sea. That part of the State of Georgia that he traversed of course suffered severely. But, sir, take it altogether, there is less excuse for a provision of this kind in the State of Georgia than in any one of the rebel States. There is Alabama right alongside, and North Carolina, and then there is South Carolina and other rebel States that have not made provisions of this kind. No other State has done so. It has remained for Georgia to do it, with less excuse and with less cause than any of these States.

The Senator from Wisconsin assumed that this applied only to debts contracted during the war, and which were to be paid in confederate money. The Senator from Wisconsin is mistaken. It applies to debts contracted before the 1st day of June, 1865, not the debt contracted during the war only, but all debts contracted before the 1st of June, 1865.

Mr. HOWE. I do not know but that I was misunderstood. I do not know that I said precisely what I meant to say. I certainly did not mean to say that the language of the clause in the constitution of Georgia did not include debts made prior to the war. Indeed, I think I admitted that it did; but I assumed and asserted merely that it was the purpose of the clause to relieve only debts made during the war, and that under the legislation of Georgia such would be the practical effect.

Mr. MORTON. I think I did not misunderstand the Senator, and in fact his explanation harmonizes with my understanding of what he said. He said he did not see that this provision in language was confined to debts contracted during the war; but he said it was intended to meet the case of debts contracted during the war and to be paid in confederate money. Sir, it meets the case of all debts contracted before the war. It meets the case of debts owing by southern men to northern men, and to citizens among themselves contracted before the war. If it was intended to apply simply to debts contracted during the war and to be paid in confederate money, it would have said so; but it does not say so. It is broad and sweeping in its provisions.

Now, sir, debts contracted in Georgia during the war in the ordinary course of business, unless they declared upon their face that they were to be paid in confederate money, are just as valid as debts contracted before the war, if they had no connection with the rebellion. Why should those debts not be paid? If a man during the war contracted a debt to his groceryman or to his physician or his lawyer, or his farmer for his meat, having no connection with the rebellion, and not specifying upon its face that it was to be paid in confederate money, it is a valid obligation, and should be paid just as much as though it had been contracted before the war or since the war.

Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Wisconsin to argue distinctly that by taking away the remedy, or the means of collecting a debt, you do not thereby impair the obligation of the contract. Why, sir, what is the contract worth in a legal point of view if there are no means of enforcing it? It is worth nothing. The Senator says the moral obligation is still there. Certainly that may be there; but the constitution is not talking about the moral obligation of a contract. A State cannot impair the moral obligation of a contract by any law it may make. A State can only impair the legal obligation, and it is of the legal obligation that the Constitution is talking, and not of the moral obligation, because that cannot be effected by any act of legislation. It is the legal obligation; and when you take away the means of enforcing a contract, you have rendered it worthless; you have most essentially impaired its obligation.

I ask the Senator if it was not the uniform current of decisions that whatever interfered materially with the collection of a debt was held to impair the obligation of the contract?

Mr. JOHNSON. That has been decided half a dozen times.

Mr. MORTON. That has been decided half a dozen times in the courts of the United States, and perhaps in almost every State in the Union in the State courts. Why, sir, in the little digest that I have here before me there are a number of authorities referred to. I read from Paschal's Annotated Constitution, page 155:

"The laws which exist at the time and place of the making of the contract enter into and form a part of it; and they embrace alike those which affect its validity, construction, discharge, and enforcement."

And a number of authorities are referred to in the Supreme Court of the United States. Then again:

"As, if the acts so change the remedies as materially to impair the rights and interests of the owner, they are just as much a violation of the compact as if they overthrown his rights and interests."

Mr. JOHNSON. What is the case given?

Mr. MORTON. There are a number of cases—the cases of Van Hoffman vs. City of Quincy, 4 Wallace, 552; another in 1 Howard, 297; Sturges vs. Crowninshield, 4 Wheaton, 122, and a number of others. Then the author goes on to say:

"The ideas of validity"— that is of obligation—
"and remedy are inseparable."

I know that nobody comprehends clearer than the Senator from Wisconsin, that if you take away the remedy, there is no validity to the contract in a legal point of view. But enough upon that point.

I understood the Senator from Oregon to argue that we have nothing to do with a State constitution except so far as to see that it is republican in form; that although it may contain provisions that are inimical to and in direct conflict with the Constitution of the United States, we have nothing to do with it except to see that it is republican in form.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not exactly say that, but I said that it was inexpedient. I know that a constitution might contain provisions that we should be bound to reject; but I said that it was not expedient for us to revise a State constitution where it protected the political and civil rights of the State.

Mr. MORTON. I think I understood the Senator's position, and I do not think that his explanation changes it from my version of his opinion. Sir, if a State constitution contains a provision in palpable violation of the constitution of the United States, it is clearly inexpedient for us to give our sanction to it. It is never expedient for the Congress of the United States, in accepting a State constitution, to accept it with provisions that are in direct hostility to that constitution under which we are authorized to act, the constitution that creates this Government. We cannot sanction receiving a State constitution with provisions directly in conflict with the Constitution of the United States. This provision in the constitution of Georgia is in direct conflict with the Constitution of the United States, and it is inexpedient for us to recognize it as being valid; to receive a State into the Union, to institute a new State government and permit it to go into operation upon provisions of a State constitution that are in direct violation of the Constitution of the United States; and such has been the practice of the Government of the United States. I believe where State constitutions have been presented, from time to time, that have contained provisions regarded as hostile to the Constitution of the United States, they have always been required to change them.

The Senator from Oregon says it has been approved by the people of Georgia, and what difference does it make to us whether it is impairing the obligations of a contract or not if the people of Georgia are agreed to it? Sir, they are part of the Republic, and they have no higher or greater rights than the people of Indiana have. But this provision does not confine itself to contracts between citizens of Georgia. If a debt owing to a citizen of the State of Indiana be cut off by this provision. Therefore, it is our business out of Georgia as well as in Georgia. If a citizen of Indiana has a debt owing to him by a citizen of Georgia he is cut off absolutely from the collection of that debt, unless it is for a sum of $500, and he can then go into the circuit court of the United States. But if he is a poor man, if the debt is less than $500, he is to lose it. It is only the large creditors and those who live in other States that have a remedy left to them, while the small creditor, the small dealer, has his debt absolutely cut off.

Mr. President, I saw a citizen of Georgia the other day, and he was the man who first called my attention to this provision. He came to see me and talk to me about it. He was an acknowledged Union man, and had been throughout the war. He had lost a large property by means of the confederate government; it had been confiscated. He said that the adoption of this provision would utterly ruin him and leave him penniless. What he had left was in the form of debts. He living in Georgia and his debtors living in Georgia he cannot go into the courts of the United States; he must sue in the State courts; and if that right be taken away he is totally ruined. He is a Union man, one whom I had known to be a Union man throughout the war. Can we indorse a constitutional provision that robs a man of his rights, of all the fortune left to him in direct violation of the Constitution of the United States?

The Senator from Oregon spoke about the bankrupt law. He inquired if it was competent for Congress to pass a bankrupt law by which hundreds of millions of debt in the aggregate are canceled, is it not competent for Georgia to cut off, by a constitutional provision, the collection of all debts created before a certain time? I answer no; there is no parallel whatever between the cases. What is a bankrupt law? It is certain provisions supposed to be equitable by which the debtor upon the surrender of all his property, except that which the law may give him to prevent his family from being beggared, is finally, on compliance with certain conditions, released from his debts. It applies to cases of bankruptcy where men are unable to pay their debts, where they surrender their property fairly and fully to their creditors. But this provision does not apply to bankrupts. It applies to the wealthy as well as to the poor. It cuts off the collection of all debts.

The Constitution of the United States expressly provides that Congress may pass a general bankrupt law. That is one of the powers expressly conferred upon the Government of the United States; and the same instrument says that no State shall pass a law impairing the obligation of a contract. There is no provision in the Constitution of the United States saying that Congress may not pass a law impairing the obligation of a contract. That prohibition is confined to the States. I believe Congress has uniformly refrained from passing such laws, although there may be no constitutional provision prohibiting them. This prohibition is directed expressly to the States; but no act can be referred to on the part of Congress looking in that direction, except the bankrupt law, which is entirely different in its character from the act here referred to.

My friend from Oregon says that some philosophers and publicists have discussed the question of abolishing all laws for the collection of debts, leaving all debts to be paid simply upon honor. I have read some essays on that subject, but they were always to take effect in the future. They provided that some period should be fixed, and after that period there should be no laws for the collection of debts, the effect of which would be to make men careful in contracting debts or in giving credit, giving credit only to persons of good character, who they believed would pay their debts honestly and honorably. I never even heard that question discussed as being made applicable to debts already contracted; but the theory was put out with reference to a future time, after which there should be no collection of debts by law.

Now, in regard to the collection of debts for slave property, this bill provides that there shall be no debts collected for slave property. We accept that. What is the reason of it? It stands upon the general principle that has been recognized by the laws of the United States, that slavery does not exist by virtue of national law, but only by virtue of positive law, and that slaves are no consideration for a contract except by virtue of positive law; and that when that positive law is withdrawn the consideration falls to the ground. The whole policy of this Government has been changed in the last five years. Slavery has been abolished, and we now recognize the doctrine that slavery is immoral, and that slaves are an immoral consideration for a contract, and that it cannot stand. I know there are those who still insist that a debt contracted for slaves ought to be collectable. I will not stop to argue that question, but I will say that there is a broad distinction between debts contracted for slave property and debts contracted for other property that is recognized by the law of nations and the natural law.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask my friend a question, with his permission.

Mr. MORTON. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does not that proviso impair the obligation of a contract? If the contract was legal and valid at the time it was made, and the proviso undertakes to abolish the contract, does it not impair its obligation?

Mr. MORTON. I am not disposed to argue the question in regard to slave property. It may, in one sense, impair the obligation. I mean to say, however, that contracts of that kind are held, by what is now the settled policy of this country, and by what ought to have been its policy always, to stand upon a different obligation, a different footing morally, and perhaps legally, from contracts of any other kind. Slave property was swept away; those owning slaves lost them; and it was perhaps just as proper that those owning choses in action, debts, promissory notes, and bills of exchange given for slaves should lose them, also.

Mr. FOWLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Indiana this question: whether a contract for slaves made before the proclamation of January, 1863, is not obligatory in law; whether it could be avoided at all by any legal means? I agree with him entirely in his views of the morality of the subject, and I have done so for many years; but nevertheless I hold that such a contract is legal and binding, and could be enforced.

Mr. MORTON. I must answer that question as I did the question asked by the Senator from Oregon. If John Brown just before the emancipation proclamation sold a slave to John Doe, and the proclamation and the thirteenth article of the Constitution came in afterward and took away the slave from John Doe without compensation, would it not be just as fair that John Brown should lose his note?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think my friend from Indiana has fallen into a grievous error. John Doe never dealt in anything but real estate, and John Brown never dealt in slaves, [laughter;] so I think he ought to take a better illustration.

Mr. MORTON. That is all very well, except that my friend is not well informed. He supposes that there was never but one John Brown who was hung over here in Charlestown, Virginia.

Mr. SHERMAN. The only one I know.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator's acquaintance is somewhat contracted. [Laughter.] So far as John Doe is concerned, he will serve just as well for an illustration here as he does in a fictitious case for the recovery of property in an action of ejectment. That does not affect the character of the illustration. I say, if it was right and proper for us to take the slave from the purchaser without compensation, it was just as proper that the man who sold him and held the note for him, should fail to collect the note. Will the Senator tell me the distinction between the two cases?

Mr. HENDRICKS. May I ask my colleague one question?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Suppose that A should sell to B a horse, and the officers of the Army, three or four days afterward, should come along and find it absolutely necessary to take that horse, and that without compensation; would it lie in the mouth of the vendee to say that he lost his property, and therefore as between him and the vendor the consideration fell?

Mr. MORTON. I do not think that is a very hard question. If the officers found it a military necessity—which you know covers a great many things—to take the horse, the Government is still bound to pay for the horse whenever it becomes able to do so. The obligation exists on the part of the Government to pay for the horse; so that the case of the horse is essentially different from that of the slave. I think my colleague fell into an error as grievous as that with which the Senator from Ohio charged me, because he had never heard of any John Brown except the one who died at Charlestown.

I do not feel disposed to argue this question in regard to slave property or notes given for slave property. I assume, and I think it has been the general sentiment of the country, that old debts created for slave-property should not be enforced. I think that that position is consistent with the moral sentiment of the country, is consistent with the act of emancipation itself; but whether I am right or wrong about that, it furnishes no sort of argument for the general act of repudiation contained in the constitution of Georgia.

Mr. FOWLER. I wish to make a few remarks in reference to this subject. In relation to the first section of the fifth article of which the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORRIS] has spoken, I agree with him cordially, that it does necessarily impair the obligation of contracts, and ought not to be sanctioned by the Congress of the United States. I do not see how we can do it. I shall not attempt to discuss it. I think the argument of the Senator from Indiana perfectly sound and logical on that point. But I cannot concur with the principle that he has enunciated, that because slavery was an immorality and is regarded as an immorality at the present time, therefore a contract which was made for the purchase of slaves is necessarily immoral. That does not follow at all. By law, by authority of law, slavery is not only held to be illegal, but immoral; but no law in any State, and no decision of any court in any State, has ever supported or even hinted at the idea that a contract which was legal before the abolition of slavery, is not so now because it is immoral or wrong. I know of no decision in any place in the United States that has been made on such a principle as that; and I was astonished to-day to hear it asserted by any person that such a contract is illegal, and cannot be enforced in law. So far as the immorality of the question is concerned, I held the same opinion twenty years ago that I do now, at a time when scarcely any person else did. No court held to any such doctrine as that, nor do they hold to any such doctrine yet. I think a contract for slaves made prior to the abolition of slavery, or to the emancipation proclamation, is perfectly legal and would be held to be legal in every State of the United States. I do not know of a solitary decision to the contrary.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I have listened to this debate with some interest, and the only argument, the only plausible apology that I have heard for the introduction of this provision in the constitution of Georgia was that advanced by the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOWE,] that it was hard to compel persons who made contracts, payable in so many dollars, which really was intended to be confederate money, to answer a judgment for a like number of dollars, which, perhaps, would be one hundred times the value. That is the only plausible apology that I have heard for this provision in the constitution of Georgia. But to attain that end we are not at liberty to violate the plain provisions of the Constitution of the United States and to give our sanction to the impairing of contracts by a State. To reach that end we are not at liberty to violate all contracts between the South and the North and all contracts which have not the peculiar feature to which the Senator alludes; and it seems to me perfectly easy to remedy the evil to which the Senator from Wisconsin thinks this provision is directed without any such provision in the Constitution. What is easier than that the Legislature of Georgia, as soon as they convene, should pass a statute enacting that all contracts made in view of being paid in confederate money shall be satisfied by a payment in money of the United States to an amount equal to the value of the money at that time, and let a jury find the amount. It is not necessary to attain the only possible good that has been suggested to grow out of this provision for us to ignore the Constitution of the United States and to violate hundreds of contracts which have not the feature to which the Senator alludes.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I do not rise for the purpose of discussing the merits of the bill before the Senate, nor even of the amendment proposed by the honorable Senator from Ohio; but merely to assign the reasons why I shall not vote either for or against that amendment.

In my judgment, the so-called reconstruction laws of Congress are utterly in excess of the legislative power; and in my judgment the constituencies that Congress was pleased to organize under a usurpation of power in the several States which are said to be restored under this bill, are not constituencies known to the laws and the constitutions of those States. Nor do I believe any constitution they may have adopted can be worth more than the paper on which it is written, subject to a single exception. Believing this, of course I do not mean to deal with an instrument in any way by way of amendment which I think has no legal existence. But there lies beyond it the question of what may be the determination of the people of the United States on your reconstruction laws. They have not been, since the first one was passed, before the people of those States which are represented in Congress, either for approval or condemnation. They soon will be. If they approve your action and sustain those laws, whatever may be their ultimate consequences, I admit they must be submitted to. But if they reverse your action you might well pause before attempting to carry into effect legislation adverse to the sentiments of the people of the country. My hope rests there.

I have great confidence in the practical capacity of the American people; and I do not believe in the omnipotence of the Congress of the United States. I believe that in a struggle between that Congress and the sentiment of the people Congress will have to give way. Do not misunderstand me. I do not speak of the people of the ten States that are being reconstructed. Within a constitutional sense you have left no people there now. Their laws you have abrogated; their constitutions you have put an end to; under military power you have organized a constituency consisting of an inferior race, who are the mere agents and tools of the Congress of the United States. Sir, the question must come this fall before the people, and you cannot avoid it, whether they will recognize the right of Congress to impose through the Federal Government a domination over them through a constituency which they have repudiated and rejected in their own individual States. My hope rests there. Should they decide to sustain your measures, As I said, come weal, come woe, they must be submitted to; but you have to meet that issue, and it is the great issue before the country. My hope rests in the intelligence of the people that, lost as our liberties have been, that intelligence will be sufficient to recover them, will be sufficient to reestablish the Constitution of the United States, sufficient to restore to us a government of laws, not a government founded on the mere will of bodies which have limited legislative powers, and yet have not only transcended those powers, but have actually abrogated the executive and almost nullified the judicial department of the Government.

Under these circumstances, Mr. President, I consider it quite immaterial what may be the decision of Congress as to whether the amendment of the honorable Senator from Ohio shall obtain or not. I do not mean to meddle with a paper which I do not recognize as constitutional. The people are to pass upon your action yet; and if they mean to preserve their own liberties I cannot doubt the result. Perhaps at a future time, when I have more strength and the Senate more leisure, I may endeavor to point out in what respects I consider your reconstruction laws as not only utterly destructive of the Constitution of the United States, but as utterly subversive of the semblance of free government, as necessarily ending in one of those two alternatives—either a concentrated, consolidated bureaucratic despotism or anarchy. Now, I will not detain the Senate further than this statement of my general views. I will not vote upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio to the amendment of the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. WILSON called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I am opposed, as I have already stated to the Senate, to the imposition of any fundamental condition to the admission of these States into the Union; but being perfectly satisfied that the provision in the constitution of Georgia to which the particular amendment refers is of itself unconstitutional, I could not vote for the admission of the State with that clause, and I shall therefore be compelled to vote against the amendment proposed by the honorable member from Ohio.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I have experienced somewhat the same embarrassment in my reflections on this subject that has been expressed by the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD.] I do not think that we have any right to add one or two or take one word from the constitution of any State. And yet, sir, it is so palpable to my mind that this proposition of repudiation in the Georgia constitution is in violation of the Constitution of the United States that I shall vote against the proposition to strike out that clause of the bill which declares that that cannot be a part of the constitution. I do not feel that in casting this vote I am adding to or taking from a constitution; I feel that I am simply declaring that a provision of that constitution is no part of it, as a legal doctrine, but that it is an effort on the part of the people of Georgia—if it may be said that the people of Georgia have done this at all—to violate the Constitution of the United States, and we merely express our dissent.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, my position differs a little from that of the honorable Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS.] If the question of this constitution was legitimately before the Senate of the United States, I would accord with his position; I would say that if a new State was about to be admitted into the Union, and the constitution of that new State was under consideration, and there was a provision in it at war with the Constitution of the United States, as in the case of the State of Missouri, that provision of the constitution of the proposed new State which was in conflict with the Constitution of the United States would be void. I believe that position sound and legitimate. But, Mr. President, I hold that we have no more right as the Senate of the Congress of the United States to act upon the measure that is now before us than has the Legislature of any State. In other words, I hold that we have no jurisdiction over this subject. Some of these States were original members of the United States; others have been constitutionally and legitimately admitted as members of the United States, as States in the Union. When those new States were admitted into the Union, I hold that all power of Congress over the subject of those States in regard to their admission or readmission or exclusion was exhausted; that when a State is once in the Union as a State, she is in the Union constitutionally and legitimately forever, and she never can be taken out of the Union except by successful revolution.

I hold that these States were States in the Union constitutionally and de jure during the whole of the rebellion; and whenever the rebellion was put down, all that remained to do was that their existence and their governments and laws, just as they existed at the time rebellion was commenced, should be reacknowledged by the Government of the United States.

Now, Mr. President, I will make one remark in relation to the position assumed by the honorable Senator from West Virginia [Mr. WILLEY] yesterday. I expect to-morrow to give my views more at length on this subject. It is not everything that was done by the governments of the States in rebellion during the rebellion that can be repudiated. It is only such acts as they did which were incompatible with their relations as members of the United States to the General Government. Everything that those States did or attempted to do as States of another confederation was void, absolutely void; but in the administration of justice between citizen and citizen, in the passage of laws that did not affect their relations to the Union, that were not promotive of rebellion and secession, and all the acts of their government or any of its departments which were entirely compatible with their relations as members of the United States will stand and ought to be recognized, in my judgment.

I will illustrate this by a single position. Those States held courts, State courts. Those State courts had their jurisdiction. They decided rights and titles to property. If land titles were decided and properly decided by those courts while the States were in rebellion there is no power, in my judgment, that can legitimately unsettle and reverse the judgments of those State courts in relation to land titles within their borders.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question here?

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly.

Mr. HOWARD. I will ask the Senator whether a judgment rendered by a confederate court, not a State court, but a confederate court, in an ordinary suit between individuals respecting land or any other matter, would be or should be held to be valid by us or by any party?

Mr. DAVIS. I will answer that question, Mr. President. There was no such thing as a confederation legally and constitutionally. It did not exist legally and constitutionally at all.

Mr. HOWARD. In fact.

Mr. DAVIS. It was a nonentity, though, legally and constitutionally. The whole confederation was a myth; it was a usurpation; it was an unauthorized creation of usurped power and is so to be treated. I say that a judgment in the State of Virginia settling land titles, during the pendency of the rebellion, if it was not in conflict with the Constitution and laws of the United States, has as binding and as permanent obligation and force as though it had been settled in any State that adhered to the Union.

Mr. HOWARD. Suppose the judgment was rendered by a confederate court in Virginia.

Mr. DAVIS. You may call it what you please. There was no confederate court there; there was no such legitimate and constitutional idea as a southern confederacy. My position is simply that where these States continued their governments and their courts, and they, by their different departments, acted in harmony with the Constitution and Government of the United States, and not in conflict with them, the judgments of those courts ought to stand and will stand.

Mr. HOWARD. Why not, then, the judgment of a confederate court?

Mr. DAVIS. There is no such thing as a confederate court.

Mr. HOWARD. There was in fact.

Mr. DAVIS. You might have set up a court yourself; a county in the State of Michigan might have set up a court of itself and have proceeded to adjudicate cases, and it would have been just as legitimate and constitutional a court as the courts set up in the States as confederate courts.

But this is the principle I am contending for: these States were States in the Union before they seceded; their secession did not remove them from the Union constitutionally or legitimately or de jure; they were still in the Union; and so far as these States did any acts by their departments which were not in conflict with the jurisdiction of the United States and the Government of the United States, and which were compatible with their previous constitutions and laws, those acts are valid. I will elaborate that position at some other time more at length. The whole power of the Government of the United States over the subject was simply to suppress the insurrection. According to national law and according to the principles of our Constitution, when insurrection was suppressed de jure the condition of things that existed before it commenced was revived in all their relations, in all their fullness, in all their obligation, both upon the State governments and the Federal Government.

Sir, after the armies of the confederacy, as it was termed, surrendered; after the insurrection or the rebellion was suppressed; when the people of the rebel States all submitted to the jurisdiction and authority of the United States and of the United States Government, the work was fully accomplished; there was nothing more to do; the power of Congress over the subject was exhausted, and not a vestige of it remained afterward. It was the duty of Congress, of the President, of the Judiciary, of the Government of the United States, in all of its departments, simply to acknowledge that the insurrection was suppressed and to reinstate things precisely as they existed before the insurrection commenced.

All these States submitted to the suppression of the insurrection. They all conceded that that had been a crime, a rebellion, and a wrong on their part against the people of the United States and the Government of the United States. They undid everything they had done or attempted to do as separate States, and as a separate, independent, hostile confederation; they retraced their steps of wrong and rebellion and war as far as they could; they came back and acknowledged obedience to the United States, to its Constitution, and its Government; and those conditions that had been suggested to them by members of Congress and by the Executive, that they should by their own constitutions and laws abolish forever slavery, that they should repudiate the rebel debt, that they should repudiate the principle of secession, were yielded to by the people of the several States, and therefore they are bound by them now and forever. They never can reinstate slavery. A freeman, or a man once made free by the laws of a State, could never be enslaved in the United States again, even before the rebellion.

Mr. HOWARD. Were they not sold?

Mr. DAVIS. They were sold for crime. If the question had been made, the courts would have settled it, I think, on the principle I have just stated.

But, Mr. President, I was remarking that these States came back to the Union; they acknowledged the insurrection in them suppressed; they conceded that they had committed the crime of treason against the United States; they made their submission; they asked for readmission to the practical and friendly relations with the United States and with the Government of the United States which had formerly subsisted, and by all the principles of the Constitution, and by every principle of national law, so far as national law can be made applicable to our case, they had a right to take that position, and when they took it the old state of things between them and the other States and the United States and the Government of the United States, was de jure restored. After they had thus made their submission they rehabilitated their State governments, they elected Senators to the Senate of the United States and Representatives to the House of Representatives, and those Senators and those Representatives ought to have been admitted, and were by the Constitution entitled to admission the moment they presented themselves at the doors of the two Houses of Congress for admission. Sir, the most preposterous and unauthorized exercise of power that I have ever known to be attempted was by the Congress of the United States attempting to abrogate those States and their State governments and to declare that they had no legitimate governments. There is but one power on earth that can create a State government, and that is the people of the State itself. The only condition that Congress can impose upon the exercise of that power is that the government they create shall be of a republican form, that is of such form as the governments of the States which existed at the time the Constitution was adopted. There was not a single State government in all the ten States that was not more democratic, more republican in its form, when they elected their Representatives and Senators, and sent them to the two Houses of Congress after the insurrection had been suppressed and they had made their submission, than any State government in existence when the Federal Constitution was formed.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I understand the Senator to say that the power and rights of the Government were exhausted when the rebellion was crushed. Now, I wish to know if the call of conventions in the southern States by the President to frame constitutions, and the conditions which he pressed upon those conventions, were acts done in the exercise of legitimate authority?

Mr. DAVIS. I will answer that question. He had no more right to act in those premises than I had.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. Then I wish to know if the governments which grew out of the call of those conventions were legitimate governments, inasmuch as they displaced the old governments.

Mr. DAVIS. I will answer that question. They were, because the people assented to them.

Several SENATORS. The constitutions were not submitted to the people.

Mr. DAVIS. If they were not submitted to the people the people acquiesced in them. Who made the government of California? It was your General Halleck who made it principally. He submitted it to the people with the sanction of their convention, and the people ratified it. The people alone can make a government, and they can make it by acquiescence as well as by positive vote, as almost all the governments of the world have been, by acquiescence rather than by positive vote.

Mr. President, when this became the condition of things that I have just recounted it was as competent and constitutional for the Congress of the United States to impose another government upon the State of Indiana or Ohio or Massachusetts as upon the lately revolted States.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I wish to ask another question. I understand the Senator now to say that these constitutions and the governments founded upon them were legitimate inasmuch as the people acquiesced in them. They were never submitted to the people, except in one State, and in that State they rejected it, did not acquiesce in it. I wish to know how it was in that State.

Mr. DAVIS. I will answer the honorable Senator thus: if they rejected all their governments, that did not vest Congress with any power to make governments for them. Neither the President nor Congress had any power to make governments for the people of those States. You speak of the congressional policy and the presidential policy; but there is but one policy, and that is the policy of the Constitution. The President and Congress had the right, if they pleased, to make suggestions to the people in relation to their governments. It was the right, it was the perfect freedom of the people of those States constitutionally to accept or to reject those suggestions, either of the President or of Congress. They did accept the suggestions of the President, and having accepted these suggestions and adopted them in their constitutions, they became the valid and constitutional law of each State.

Mr. President, I was coming to this position—

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the Senator expects to pursue his remarks, perhaps he will yield to a motion to adjourn, or to go into executive session?

Mr. DAVIS. I would rather do so. I would rather take up my subject in extenso to-morrow, when I will give the Senator from New Hampshire the benefit of all the light I can shed on the subject.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It is very evident that the bill cannot be completed to-night. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope not. I hope we shall stay here and finish this bill to-night. We were very near finishing it on Saturday last.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I understand that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. YATES] expects to speak.

Mr. DAVIS. If it is to be the pleasure of the Senate to go on everybody must submit, of course. This is a very imperial body, though not as much so, I believe, as the other House. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is not debatable. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield the floor to the Senator from Indiana for a motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business?

Mr. DAVIS. I do.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I rose to state my dissent from the position of the Senator from Indiana on this amendment. He said that in the proposed constitution of one of the States there was a provision incompatible with the Constitution of the United States; and in that opinion I concur fully; and, as I stated, if this was a legitimate, regular, constitutional proceeding in relation to the constitution of that State, I would not hesitate to vote in accordance with that conviction of my mind and in accordance with the sentiment announced by the honorable Senator; but, in my judgment, there never was a work of more superfluity than the action of Congress upon the constitutions of these ten States. They have not a particle, they have not a color, of constitutional power to act upon the subject according to my judgment. They have no right to be entertaining a proposition that these States shall have representation in the two Houses of Congress upon this or that constitution. They have no more right to revise and change these constitutions than any number of private citizens have. The whole business is coram non judice. They have no jurisdiction over the matter any more than Congress would have over a constitution that was brought up in the same way from the State of Indiana. Suppose a constitution were presented from the State of Indiana, and Congress was to take it up and be considering it and debating it, as the Senate is the constitutions from these several States, would it not be a burlesque except for the mischief that it might introduce? Would it not be ludicrous and ridiculous in the highest degree that the Congress of the United States should be debating such a constitution from the State of Indiana? Indiana has been a loyal State, one of the most loyal; but the matter of loyalty or disloyalty in the present condition of things does not affect the question. According to my opinion, the power of Congress would be exactly the same in relation to both cases. For that reason, as the proposition now is to amend or modify or reject a portion of a constitution over which, in my judgment, Congress has no cognizance, I vote against it, and against all propositions to amend or to modify; and I will then vote against all these constitutions in whatever form they may come.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Will the Senator from Kentucky allow me to ask him a question as a practical matter? Suppose I concede that Congress has no power over this whole subject, still here is the document that we are acting upon, and one proposition is to strike out that which is clearly offensive, and the other proposition is to retain it. Now, although we have not any right to have anything to do with the whole subject, yet we have to decide whether we shall vote to strike that out or leave it in, and inasmuch as it is more offensive than anything else I think it best to strike it out.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not dissent from the soundness and practical good sense of the honorable Senator's position, but my position is that we have nothing to do with the subject, either to make it worse or better, and in my action I follow that conviction. Sir, so far as one of the humblest members of the Senate, and one of the humblest citizens of the United States is concerned, I never intend to acquiesce in any decision which Congress may make in relation to these constitutions or these States. As long as I have a voice that can be heard in utterances here or elsewhere it shall always be in favor of the original constitutional rights of these people, and never will I consent to any other than a peaceable submission when all the authorities of the Government, backed by the people of the United States, after years and years and years of struggle to overthrow these monstrous usurpations, shall have proved ineffectual. I declare war against the whole system as far as I am concerned, and that war I will make with every energy and every faculty with which it has pleased my Creator to endow me; and I will live and breathe in the hope that the free people of the United States will guaranty to the people of every State in the Union the sole and sovereign right to make their own constitutions and forms of government, will come to their rescue, and will finally vindicate these great principles of the Constitution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] to the amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 8, nays 35; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cameron, Ferry, Howe, Ramsey, Sherman, Thayer, Williams, and Wilson—8.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Connors, Corbett, Cragin, Davis, Drake, Edmunds, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Hendricks, Howard, Johnson, McCreery, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Ross, Saulsbury, Sumner, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Vickers, Wade, Willey, and Yates—35.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Cattell, Dixon, Doolittle, Fowler, Grimes, Henderson, Norton, Pomeroy, Sprague, and Stewart—11.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, I move to amend the first section of the bill by striking out all after the word "condition" in line fourteen, and inserting:

That so much of the seventeenth section of the fifth article of the constitution of the State of Georgia as suspends the collection of debts contracted prior to the 1st day of June, 1865, shall be void as against all persons who were loyal during the late rebellion, and who, during that time, supported the Union.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I submit as a question of order whether that motion is not the same that has just been voted on—the motion to strike out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The other motion was to strike out. This motion is to strike out and insert, and it is in order.

Mr. CONKLING. If I comprehend this proposition aright, it is proposed that in the same breath we shall affirm that this clause in the Georgia constitution is unconstitutional, and is void, and is repudiation in character, and yet that we shall affirm it as valid as to a certain portion of creditors whom the amendment designates for that purpose. I do not think that is quite proper.

Mr. MORTON. I beg leave to suggest that this is a motion of an entirely different character. It is not to strike out of the constitution of Georgia a certain provision, as we have a right to do as a condition of acceptance to any State, but it is to insert another provision in that constitution which they have not done for themselves. It is to make substantially a new provision, not simply to strike out and get clear of one that we regard as a violation of the Constitution of the United States, but it is to strike out part of it, and then make a new one for them.

Mr. CONKLING. Or, if my friend will allow me a moment, it is to say that this provision is half good and half bad; that it is valid so far as relates to everybody except loyal men, and that as to those, it is not; that is to say, for a certain purpose it is effectual, and for everything beyond that it is ineffectual and void.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, Mr. President, the learned and distinguished Senator from New York may begin now to see that there is no distinction between loyal and disloyal men in the South; but he has not been looking, I judge, in that direction for the last three or four years. I am very much mistaken, or considerable of the legislation of Congress for the last three or four years has been based upon the assumption that there was a difference between loyal and disloyal men in the southern States; and our statute-books are full of provisions that a man shall not go into a court, shall not go into the Court of Claims and many other of the courts of this country, unless he can go there in the first place and affirm upon the threshold that he is a loyal man. Disloyal men are not allowed to come into our courts with their claims in many instances, and the law from the beginning of the rebellion down to the present time has recognized that distinction. And it has been claimed here—whether with good foundation or not, perhaps I ought not to say—that those men who did array themselves against this Government not only forfeited their right to enforce a contract, but their property, their political rights, and, if prosecuted, their lives.

Now the Senators seem to be astonished that there should be any proposition made here to make a distinction between these two classes of persons. We do not propose to put a new provision into their constitution; but the bill provides that that section of the constitution of the State of Georgia shall be void as to all persons, and this amendment provides that it shall only be void as to a certain class of persons, a class of persons who have by reason of their crime, their violation of law, and their hostility to the Government of the Union, forfeited their right to enforce these contracts. I do not care to argue the question; I simply submit the amendment.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I ask the Senator if he has reflected that under his amendment, debts due to foreigners will be repudiated, debts contracted before the war with persons not citizens of the United States? They would be left subject to the constitution.

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly they would. The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary as amended.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There is a slight amendment which I wish to move to the second section, to insert the word "first" after the word "the," so as to read: "that if the day fixed for the first meeting of the Legislature," &c. I think it means that now; but some persons suppose it may not.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Now, in the third line of the second section, after the word "constitution," I move to insert the words "or ordinance;" so as to read: "that if the day fixed for the first meeting of the Legislature of either of said States by the constitution or ordinance thereof shall have passed," &c.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move now to strike out in the sixth line the words, "time fixed by the constitution of such State," and insert the words, "the period fixed;" so that it will read: "if there shall not be time for the Legislature to assemble at the period fixed, such Legislature shall convene at the end of twenty days," &c.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move to amend by inserting after the word "same," in the ninth line of the third section, these words:

And thereupon the officers of each State duly elected and qualified under the constitution thereof shall be inaugurated without delay; but no person prohibited from holding office under the United States, or under any State, by section three of the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States, known as article fourteen, shall be deemed eligible to any office in either of said States.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not know that I understand the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon. I wish to inquire whether this is a proposition to declare certain persons ineligible who are eligible under the constitution as sent to us.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have the question divided on this amendment. I have no objection to the first part of it, which provides for inaugurating the State officers, which would follow as a matter of course; but to undertake to make a disqualification in this bill for officers holding under the State, after they are inaugurated as State officers, or on the occasion of the inauguration after the conditions of admission are complied with, it seems to me would be going too far, especially when the constitutional amendment, if adopted by the particular State, when it shall be adopted must be the exclusive test. While I am in favor, as it now strikes me, of the first branch of the amendment, the second, it appears to me, would not be right or wise. So I ask that it may be divided.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The first section of the bill as reported by the committee provides that the States named there shall be entitled to representation when the respective State Legislatures ratify the constitutional amendment, and in the case of Georgia when its Legislature in addition accedes to the fundamental condition prescribed. Section two provides for the time when the Legislatures shall meet for the purpose of passing upon the constitutional amendment. Section three provides that the first section of the act shall take effect, as to each State, when the constitutional amendment is duly ratified by that State; but there is no provision in the bill, as it now stands, as to the time when the State officers, the Governor and others, shall be inaugurated. I know that it may be inferred that they are to be inaugurated when the Legislature of the State ratifies the constitutional amendment; but it is desirable, and telegrams have been received here within a few minutes showing it to be very desirable, that all parties concerned should know the exact time, so that there will be no chance for any controversy on that subject. I am sure there can be no objection to fixing a time by express provision, which is fixed by implication of law.

As to the other provision, the adoption of the constitutional amendment by the Legislature of a State does not necessarily put the constitutional amendment in force, and by virtue of that constitutional amendment certain persons are made ineligible to any office under the Government of the United States, or under any State government. Certain persons who have held offices under the Government of the United States, taken an oath to support the Constitution, and have afterward gone into the rebellion are disqualified under that constitutional amendment from holding any office under the Federal Government or under any State government unless Congress shall relieve them. There is a question in the country as to whether or not that amendment is now a part of the Constitution of the United States; but in any event, no matter what may be the view taken of that question, when these States ratify the constitutional amendment, and when it becomes a part of the Constitution, which it is supposed will be the necessary effect of their action, let their offices be subject to that amendment. If persons who will be ineligible under the constitutional amendment when it takes effect are now permitted to go into office the offices will be vacated by the adoption of that constitutional amendment. Why not provide at once that no such men shall be inaugurated?

There is no hardship whatever in this provision of law, because we intended, when we passed the constitutional amendment and submitted it to the States, that the persons therein described should be disqualified from holding office in the States lately in rebellion. That was our purpose in passing that constitutional amendment; that was our purpose in requiring it to be ratified by the requisite number of States. If it be true that twenty-three States, being more than three-fourths of the loyal States of the Union, having ratified the constitutional amendment, it is now a part of the Constitution, then this clause is perfectly constitutional and perfectly proper; but there is doubt upon that question; people do differ as to whether or not that has taken effect. The object of this provision is not to allow persons to go into possession of office in the southern States who are made ineligible by that fourteenth amendment to the Constitution, for if they are allowed to take possession of the offices now, when the States ratify the constitutional amendment, when twenty-eight shall have given their assent to it, then these persons in office must necessarily vacate and there will be no provision for filling the offices.

Mr. President, are we afraid to stand upon our platform? Are we beginning to crawl out of this business at this time? After we have passed a constitutional amendment by two thirds majority of both Houses with a view of disqualifying these very persons and keeping them out of office in the South, and after twenty-three States have ratified that constitutional amendment, and after we require it as a condition of the admission of these States into the Union that they shall ratify the constitutional amendment, are we now afraid to apply it? Shall we say that it is not advisable to apply it to the southern States? We want to keep the rebels out of office, do we not? Is not that our purpose?

Mr. CONKLING. Does the fourteenth amendment keep them out?

Mr. WILLIAMS. It does when in force.

Mr. CONKLING. Not one of these States is to come in until it ratifies, and all the rest come in at the same time and ratify, so that it will be a part of the Constitution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I beg the Senator's pardon; one State may ratify the constitutional amendment at one time and another State at another time; one State will ratify in two weeks from this time, another in a month, another in two months; they are not expected to ratify the constitutional amendment on the same day, and whenever each State does ratify it the persons who are eligible under the constitutional amendment are to come into possession of the State offices, and those who have been rebels, or those who are disqualified by the constitutional amendment, are to be excluded. It seems to me that is reasonable and just. It will prevent confusion and disorder in the southern States if we now provide for putting the State governments there in the hands of loyal men. It is to avoid confusion and disorder and distraction that I insist that this amendment ought to be adopted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, we are to put these State governments, as soon as we make them State governments, into the hands of themselves, if I understand the theory of setting up States. When we have set up a State and declared by this bill that on agreeing to the constitutional amendment it shall become once more a State to all intents and purposes, it appears to me rather singular for us to declare by act of Congress what sort of persons shall hold offices under that State constitution. It is a thing that cannot be done. We may provide by constitutional amendment, when a sufficient number of States shall have agreed to it, that certain persons shall be disqualified. That we have provided; and we provided it by constitutional amendment, because we knew and everybody else knew, that it could not otherwise be done. An act of Congress would be perfectly inefficacious to declare what sort of persons should hold office in Vermont or in Oregon. It is totally beyond our power. Now we cannot play fast and loose about this business.

The whole object of this act is to set up a State government. We have selected by our previous laws the class of persons who were to set this government up. We have permitted them to select their State officers and form their State constitution. Now we say when they have complied with certain conditions that we impose they shall become a State government and shall be remitted to themselves. My friend from Oregon proposes that, having done that, we shall declare in the same breath that certain persons whom they have elected to State offices shall not be qualified to hold office under that State government. Who, then, is to exercise the functions of those particular offices? It has already become a State when these things shall have been done. My friend may say the existing person, the appointee of Mr. Johnson, or the person elected by his constituencies, which were exclusively rebel, or some military officer who has succeeded to those appointees, shall take the place. That would present what my friend would call rather a craw-fish anomaly, I should think, in government—a State government set up, having all the rights of a State, one half of whose officers should have been elected by its people, and the other half should be the military officers of the United States! That would be a singular state of things.

Take North Carolina. I believe it is understood that Governor Holden is the elected man as Governor of that State. It is understood that he is amenable to the constitutional amendment; that he is a person who cannot act under the fourteenth article unless Congress shall relieve the disability. The people have elected him to office. Now we put the State of North Carolina on its feet, and we say, "Go on; you become a State," and at the same time we say "the Governor that you have elected shall not exercise the functions of the office to which you have elected him, but the present military governor, whoever he may be, after you have become a State, shall exercise the functions of Governor there." It is totally inadmissible.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I do not understand that we say anything of that kind.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is the necessary consequence.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Not at all the necessary consequence. When this State government is inaugurated it supplants the provisional government there and all the officers of that provisional government, and the only effect of this provision would be to vacate the offices and leave them vacant until others are elected to fill their places. That would be the necessary effect of this provision. It does not continue the provisional government or any part of the provisional government in force. As to Governor Holden, it may be that he is subject to disqualification under this provision; but Congress has the power, and, I believe, Congress contemplates relieving him from that disability; but there are a large number of persons who have been elected in open defiance of our laws, with the express purpose of defying the power of Congress, who were rebels during the war, and who knew at the time they were elected that they would be disqualified under the constitutional amendment; and it is for the purpose of excluding such persons from office that I offer this provision. If we had adhered to the reconstruction law this would be wholly unnecessary, because that law provided that before any one of those States should be admitted the fourteenth amendment should have become a part of the constitution; but we have determined to abandon that part of the reconstruction law and allow each State to come in at any time whenever it may ratify the constitutional amendment, whether that amendment is a part of the constitution or not. So to carry out the purpose of the constitutional amendment, to carry out the purpose we had at the time, it is necessary that we should adopt this provision to prevent rebels from coming into office.

Mr. MORTON. I think this amendment is perfectly proper, and in fact necessary. I offered one to the same effect the day before yesterday, but gave way to one offered by the Senator from Oregon. It simply provides, and that is the whole of it, that the same rule as to eligibility shall be applied to officers inaugurated before the fourteenth article becomes a part of the Constitution, which will exist after it does become a part of the Constitution, and the disability in either case is to be removed in the same way by a simple act of Congress. Otherwise it may happen, as the Senator from Oregon says, that persons may be inaugurated as State officers who will become disqualified the moment the fourteenth article becomes a part of the Constitution, and whom Congress, perhaps, may choose never to relieve; but if we now vote to apply the same rule to officers that will be applied by the fourteenth article when it becomes ratified, then we shall have no contention about it, and the act of Congress relieving the particular person will be equally applicable in either case.

Mr. TRUMBULL. My recollection is that the reconstruction act itself provides that no person shall be elected to any office during this provisional existence of the governments who is not qualified in accordance with the Constitution, or who could not take the test oath.

Mr. MORTON. That renders it necessary for the fourteenth article to be part of the Constitution. There is just the difficulty.

Mr. TRUMBULL. This amendment only applies to the provisional officers. Nobody proposes, I take it, to pass a law that is to operate after the State becomes a State, but it is only in the inauguration, to get a State. That is as I understand it.

Mr. MORTON. So that no officer shall be inaugurated who will be disqualified when the fourteenth article comes to operate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Does not the reconstruction act, as it exists, prevent any such person from qualifying?

Mr. MORTON. No, it does not refer to the fourteenth article, but to the Constitution itself, so that the fourteenth amendment would have to be a part of it to take effect.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am sorry to occupy time, but it seems to me we should present a very singular spectacle to the country if we take the last part of this amendment. What my friend from Indiana proposed yesterday was that these elected officers who were not disqualified by the fourteenth article should be at once inaugurated, but he immediately proceeded to provide that this inauguration should be deemed provisional only, keeping them still under the controlling authority of the United States until the first section of the act, that is to say the fundamental condition about the fourteenth article, should be complied with. That would do, because so long as these governments are provisional, that is to say governments under our law instead of governments under the will of the people of these States, we have a perfect right to declare who shall hold office and who shall not; and we did in the reconstruction acts provide for these provisional governments that only a certain class of persons should either hold office or vote for officers. That was perfectly right; but now Senators will not forget that we have refused to make these governments provisional until the fourteenth article actually becomes a part of the Constitution of the United States, and we have declared, on the contrary, that on the passage of this act and on the adoption by each Legislature of the fourteenth article that shall at once be a State in the Union to all intents and purposes. I think we have made a great mistake, and I have said that before, but I shall not argue it over again. That is what this bill proposes to do. It is not setting up a provisional government in North Carolina or South Carolina, or any other of these States; it is readmitting them or restoring them to their original relations to the Union. Now, what my friend from Oregon proposes is, that in making that restoration and at the very time when that restoration becomes complete, we shall say to the people of these States, "Here are a certain class of your citizens whom you have elected to office who we declare shall not exercise office under your State government that is complete and full."

I say we have no right to say that. We have a right to say it by constitutional amendment, but we cannot pass a constitutional amendment in a bill. We have no power whatever in point of law—and that point was evaded by both my friends in answering what I said before—we have no power whatever by an act of Congress to declare that certain persons shall or shall not hold office in a State. We have a right to declare that they shall or shall not hold office so long as they are to hold or exercise functions under our law in a government which is provisional, but the whole object of this bill, as I have said, is to make the provisional government cease, and to set up State government complete and entire. My friend from Oregon answers as to the inconvenience, that he does not propose to have the military governors continue to exercise the functions, but to leave the State offices vacant. What kind of a State government would you have if the very moment that you declare it a State government you declare that it shall not have any Governor, for illustration? And then his amendment provides for an absolute disqualification. However, I do not wish to occupy time. I believe I am understood.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It seems to be very clear that we do not have any right—at least I do not see on what ground we have the right—to fix by enactment here the qualifications of the officers of a State after it is a State; but I understood the Senator from Vermont to suggest some way in which it should be considered provisional.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; I said, in answer to the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] that the difference between what he now maintains and what he offered yesterday was that while he provided for the same fact yesterday he provided that so long as that fact continued the government should be provisional and the State should not be set up. There is no way that I know of to do what the Senator from New Jersey suggests.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Indiana, in his amendment, provided exactly what I have provided. I have taken my amendment from his amendment; but he did also provide that the person having the next highest number of votes should fill the office. That has been omitted, and it has been left for the Legislature to provide by law for an election. This will not probably affect any considerable number of offices in the southern States; but there are members elected to the Legislatures and persons elected to other offices there who are wholly disqualified under the constitutional amendment. As to our right to do this, I am astonished to hear gentlemen affirm here that we, who have passed the reconstruction acts, have no right to say by legislation that no rebel shall take office under these State governments. Suppose we have provided in the act of March 2, 1867, that no rebel should be inaugurated under any of these State governments, should we not have had a perfect right to pass such a law as that? Where is the constitutional provision that prevents it? Sir, any constitutional provision that would prevent any enactment of that kind would prevent the enactment of the entire reconstruction system, for when you assume jurisdiction over these States so as to provide for the reconstruction of their governments then you assume a jurisdiction that entitles you to provide that they shall be reconstructed as you prescribe in every respect, and it is upon that ground that I contend we have this right.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I thought I had understood the theory of this reconstruction somewhat as held by the majority; but I guess now I did not. I thought it was this, that you held that there were no governments down there that had legal validity, and that, therefore, Congress might govern them until the State governments could be reestablished; and that when, in any State, the State government should be reestablished, then it was a State government with all the powers possessed by any other State government. If I am mistaken in that theory of the majority in this business, I do not understand the subject at all.

Mr. WILLIAMS. You are not mistaken.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then it is a State for all the purposes and with all the powers that a State may exist; and certainly one of the powers of a State government is to say who shall be qualified and who disqualified to hold office, to execute the laws, to make the laws of such a State. When is this to become a State? That is the only question; for when it does become a State, and becomes clothed with all the powers of a State, clearly according to your own theory, as always declared, Congress has no power to control the eligibility to office. You concede, then, as soon as it becomes a State government, with the powers of a State government, all power over that subject is with the State.

Then I understand under this bill that at a certain time they are to be State governments clothed with all the powers of State. That time is when the Legislature shall meet, not then a State—a curious thing, not exactly a provision—provisional, not exactly a State, but in a queer condition. When that Legislature shall meet, not the Legislature of a State, but the Legislature of a provisional government, and after that Legislature in that character, in that position, shall pass an ordinance ratifying the constitutional amendment, it is to become a State; then it is completely clothed with the powers of a State. Before it can be so completely clothed it must do the most solemn act that under the Constitution of the United States a State Legislature is ever called upon to do—amend the Constitution of the United States. But, passing over all that difficulty, which of course I cannot comprehend, a difficulty according to your theory, when the Legislature shall agree to the constitutional amendment, it is a State; and right then you say that before the constitutional amendment is adopted that regulates this subject, when it is completely clothed as a State, Congress by law may declare who may hold office and who shall not hold office. Is that your theory? If so, it is a very singular theory.

Mr. MORTON. I should like to answer before the Senator takes his seat. The State is not complete and is not a State at the time of the inauguration of State officers. That is a preliminary step to the final organization of the State. Then, at the time of the inauguration of the State officers it is clearly under the control of Congress as much so as it is now. These are steps to the final consummation; and the character of the State is not put on until all of the conditions have been complied with, the last one of which is the ratification of the fourteenth article of amendment. It is clearly within the control of Congress up to that time, and then when the fourteenth article becomes a part of the Constitution the thing is taken from the control of the State as well as from Congress, so far as the provisions of that article are concerned. It is a part, then, of the supreme law of the land that these parties shall not be qualified.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Now, Mr. President, I think I understand it. It is admirable! Suppose that on Monday the Legislature meets; on Monday the officers are inaugurated. Well, it is queer; I do not know what they are officers of. I expect they are officers of Congress, because it is not a State yet. But the Governor is not eligible under the fourteenth article of the Constitution, and therefore he is not inaugurated, and the thing swings along without a Governor. On Tuesday that Legislature ratifies the constitutional amendment. It is then a complete State, and has the control of this subject. On Tuesday evening that Governor is inaugurated, because the constitutional amendment not being adopted and the law of Congress having gone right up to that time and then ceased to be a law on this subject, he is inaugurated. It is a complete State then, and has a Governor who is inaugurated because, as a State, the State controls the subject. Then you may go on a few days more, and the constitutional amendment being ratified by enough States that man goes out.

Mr. MORTON. That is the difficulty we intend to prevent.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I guess we have the history of it now. But there is a time when he will come in and be inaugurated.

Mr. MORTON. If we relieve him, he will.

Mr. HENDRICKS. He will be inaugurated whether you relieve him or not. That relieving business is going to be a very beautiful one. I should not like to be a part of the majority to be connected with any such transaction, that men whose hands, as you have said here so often, are dripping with the blood of northern people, whose skirts are stained with northern blood, are to be restored to political rights because of their party affiliations. I hope that the Democratic party, of which I am proud to be a member, will never be brought to the test of any such work. Let men be restored to their citizenship, if restoration be necessary, because as citizens they are worthy, not because they worship at a particular party altar, but because they are true to the country as shown by their conduct.

But I do not intend to go off and discuss that matter. I am merely getting at the particular time when a man shall be put into office, and then when he shall be put out. According to the Senator from Oregon he shall not be inaugurated on Monday; but if that Legislature on Tuesday shall ratify the constitutional amendment he shall be inaugurated on Tuesday.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is not my position at all.

Mr. HENDRICKS. No; it is my colleague's position. The Senator from Oregon, I believe, asks, who is afraid? It is very clear he is not afraid. That has been demonstrated by two or three years' experience. I do not believe that even the thunders that come over the Rocky mountains produce any consternation in his mind on this subject—not the slightest. I will tell you just where I am afraid. When I come to a point where I cannot go any further without violating the Constitution of the United States, I acknowledge my fear, and it is no impeachment of my manhood to acknowledge it. When a State government is organized, I do not believe any act of Congress can control the eligibility of its officers. I do not believe that under the Constitution that can be done. Therefore, I do not believe in your provision, and shall not vote for it. There is a day or two just before the constitutional amendment shall be ratified by the Legislature, that the theory of reconstruction will allow this measure; but just as soon as the Legislature ratifies the constitutional amendment your theory defeats it. Your theory is, that then it is a State to regulate the subject of eligibility according to its own pleasure, for that time and this, until the constitutional amendment is ratified by twenty-seven States; that the whole subject is regulated by the constitution of the particular State, and not at all by an act of Congress.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I have not the slightest difficulty on this subject. I do not see any difficulty in it. We have undertaken to reorganize these States, so as to bring them in harmony with the Government of the United States upon the theory that they and their people were at war with the United States and have been subdued. We have endeavored to select such people as would act in harmony with the Government of the United States. If we are right in that, and to this point I call the attention of my friend from Vermont—

Mr. HENDRICKS. Come here, and I will give you mine.

Mr. STEWART. That is valuable, but it may not be as sharp. I want the attention of my friend from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You shall have it.

Mr. STEWART. I say, as I understand the matter, we undertook to reorganize these State governments because they had been destroyed by rebels, and because we assumed the right to reorganize them, not because the States had gone out of the Union. We have not been discussing the technical question whether the States were out or in. We found them disorganized; and now it becomes necessary to determine what is meant by reorganizing a State that has been destroyed. The State organization has been destroyed; but the people are there; the territory is there; several elements of a State are there; but organization is wanting. We undertook to do it on a loyal basis. It requires several steps to accomplish that. It seems to me that that organization will not be complete, although you may say it is a State at this time, until you have installed all the State officers necessary to carry on the organization. If that be true, and it is necessary to prevent A or B, because he is a public enemy, from participating in that organization preliminarily until we get the State organized, I do not see why we have not the same right to do that that we had to do any of the other acts that we have performed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let me ask my friend a question.

Mr. STEWART. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. All that is perfectly true, or part of it at least; but I will ask my friend whether he thinks that anything less than a State in the Union can effectually adopt the fourteenth article of amendment to the Constitution? Must it not be a State to agree to the fourteenth article?

Mr. STEWART. It must be a State either at the time, or to become one on doing something afterward. I suppose we can accept their action on the principle on which we accept Senators elected from communities organized as States and subsequently admitted. Nothing but a State would have the right to elect Senators; but still, before they are admitted into the Union, before they can perform the functions of a State, we have accepted Senators from them.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That being so, will my friend permit me to call his attention to what this section declares, just as the committee and majority are determined it shall be. "The first section of this act," which my friend knows provides for the complete rehabilitation of these States:

"The first section of this act shall take effect as to each State"—

I leave out Georgia now—

"when such State shall by its Legislature duly ratify article fourteen of the amendments to the Constitution."

Mr. STEWART. I do not know that the first section provides for their complete rehabilitation. It provides that they shall be entitled to representation in Congress, and entitled to be rehabilitated.

Mr. MORTON. It was drawn with a view to have a government that could call the Legislature together.

Mr. STEWART. We have undertaken to reorganize the State, because it was destroyed and its officers dispersed; but I do not think it has complete rehabilitation until we put in all of these officers. I do not think the work we have undertaken is done until that time. I think that is the criterion. The only reason why we have any right to do anything on this subject was because there were no loyal officers, no loyal organizations to carry on these governments, and until that organization is completed, if we had any right to touch it, in the preliminary steps, we have the right to complete it. There is no doubt about that.

I wish to make one remark to the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS.] He said that the majority here would be ashamed of the business of relieving those people from their disabilities. He said he would hate to be one of the majority and take the responsibility, because we will relieve Republicans, because we will relieve Union men; and that will be partisan, and we shall be ashamed of it. Now, I want to tell the Senator from Indiana that I am proud to remove the disabilities of Union men, loyal men who will cease their opposition to the Government.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the Senator will allow me, I did not say that. I was not talking about Union men. They do not need to be relieved. A man who stood by the Government during the war needs no relief. He stands in a more proud position than any of us perhaps, having resisted more. But the man whose hands are dripping with blood, whose skirts are stained all over with the blood of the sons of the North, and who now for political purposes comes in and joins a political party, is the man you propose to relieve—not one who is free from blood, but admitting the blood, admitting his rebellion, admitting his treason, you relieve him because he has joined your political party!

Mr. STEWART. I thank the Senator for the correction he has made. We do relieve them when they repent. We do hold to the possibility of repentance. We do say that when they will cease to war upon the Government, when they will come out as Longstreet and others in the South have done, and stand by the Union cause, and accept the verdict of the war, they ought to be relieved. But we say to those who join the Ku-Klux-Klan and commit assassinations, and defy the Government, and wait for a reaction, that they may dictate terms to loyalty and trample it in the dust, "You are still enemies of this Government." We say to those who are willing to accept the situation and acknowledge the verdict of the war, "We will relieve you." I think that is generous. I think that is enough. I think there is a distinction between the members of the Democratic party or the Ku-Klux organization and gentlemen who accept the situation. I would make a discrimination between them.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the honorable Senator allow me to ask him in what category he places that very distinguished member of the late Chicago convention, Governor Brown, of Georgia, who seized upon Fort Pulaski even before Georgia seceded? Is he now one of those "loyal" men who are to build up a great "loyal" community in Georgia? I presume he is perfectly "loyal."

Mr. STEWART. Governor Brown says that he accepts the situation, that he will support the flag of his country. He regards the course he has now taken as supporting this Government. He regards those whom he has left behind, those who are on the other side, as being engaged in the same cause in which they were heretofore engaged. He has come over to our side, the side of the Government. I think we have a right to be sufficiently partial to men who are in favor of this Government to make a distinction between the friends of the Government and the enemies of the Government; and if the friends of the Government happen to be friends of the Republican party I do not think there is much harm done. I believe that is generally true that the friends of the Government have been the friends of the Republican party, and I believe the Republican party comprised about all the friends the Government had during the war. On the other side we find all those who opposed the Government. We find the enemies of the Government against the Republican party. So I do not think there is any particular party question in this. If to be a party man is to be for the Government, if to be a Republican is to be in favor of the Government and in favor of law, then I think we may be charged as partisans for relieving from disabilities those who will favor the Government. If to be a Democrat is to belong to that party who say they will never submit to the authority of this Government, that they will dictate their own terms, although they are conquered, if they are the Democrats that we are called upon to relieve, then we will take the party responsibility of refusing to do it.

Mr. DRAKE. Will the honorable Senator from Nevada allow me to make a single suggestion to him?

Mr. STEWART. I am through.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wanted to ask the Senator from Nevada a question.

Mr. DRAKE. I will state that if the honorable Senator from Nevada, or any other Senator here, intends to allow the honorable Senator from Indiana to be poking him into a speech every five minutes in this debate, we shall not get rid of this bill in the next week. There is a most admirable faculty in the honorable Senator from Indiana of sticking pins into his political opponents and prolonging debate to an indefinite extent. I very respectfully suggest that while it is perfectly proper that we should be stuck with pins by the Senator from Indiana as to points that are pertinent to the debate, pertinent to the pending bill, it is not worth while that we should suffer ourselves to be run off upon points that do not belong to this bill. The question about relieving from disabilities belongs to other bills that are pending in the Senate now; and when the time comes to consider them, the honorable Senator from Indiana will probably find full use for all his pins, big and little. [Laughter.]

Now, I wish to reply, on a single point, to a suggestion which the Senator from Indiana made. [Laughter.] I am very glad, indeed, that gentlemen find amusement in it.

Mr. NYE. I call the Senator to order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What is the point of order?

Mr. NYE. The Senator from Missouri choked my colleague down for the purpose of getting the floor himself to make a long speech, which my colleague could have made, and I insist upon it that that is not fair. [Laughter.] The only difference, it seems to, between my colleague and the Senator from Indiana is this: my colleague thinks that the rebels need repentance and forgiveness; but the honorable Senator from Indiana does not think they need any; he thinks they have been right all the time.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not think the Senator from Nevada ought to take the floor from the Senator from Missouri to make a speech himself. [Laughter.]

Mr. NYE. I am through.

Mr. DRAKE. The only point on which I undertook to make a suggestion to the honorable Senator from Nevada who preceded me, [Mr. STEWART,] was that he should not allow the Senator from Indiana to provoke him into a speech upon other questions than those now before the Senate. There is a point made by the Senator from Indiana which has been discussed by others, and there is one remark to be made about it; and that is, that with regard to the installation of these officers in a rebel State, we are bound to see that the men who have been elected to office there under elections held by the authority of acts of Congress, and not under elections held by the authority of the States, shall be the right kind of men.

Whatever may be the position taken by the Senator from Indiana as to the right of a State to admit whom it will to office under future elections, there is an undoubted and undeniable responsibility resting upon us to see that no rebels go into office there by virtue of the elections held under our authority; and that seems to me to be an all-sufficient answer to the point made by the Senator from Indiana about the admission of these men.

Mr. SAULSBURY. That was a very unkind remark the Senator from Missouri made just as he sat down, that it was the duty of Congress to see that no rebels went into office in the State of Georgia. Why, Mr. President, he is stabbing the friends of his own household. What did we witness at Chicago? Delegations from those States, and their spokesman, Governor Brown, stating upon the floor of the convention that those delegations were mostly composed of original secessionists. The Senator's friends admitted those men into their national convention to help them nominate Grant and Colfax, although they proclaimed themselves to have been rebels; and yet now we are told by no less high an authority than the Senator from Missouri that it is the duty of this Congress, and especially, I suppose, of the Republican portion of this Congress, to see that they shall not be admitted to office in those States.

Mr. DRAKE. In answer to the remarks of the Senator from Delaware, I have simply this to say, that my opposition to the installation of rebels in office there extends to all of both parties, and not, as the honorable Senator from Indiana said, to those who are against me politically, to be laid aside in favor of those who are with me politically. I am against the whole gang of rebels, from the beginning to the end, being allowed to hold office until they are relieved by Congress of their disabilities. I am against every form of rebel domination, there or here, everywhere and at all times, whether they come as my political friends or political enemies. So that the honorable Senator from Indiana cannot put me in the category that he attempts to put others here on that point.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The question, Mr. President, is, whom is the Senator from Missouri in favor of relieving from the disabilities brought upon themselves by their treason, by their bloody hands? That is the question.

Mr. DRAKE. I do not intend that the Senator shall stick his pins in me in that way.

Mr. HENDRICKS. No; but still he will find himself in that question; he has got into it now; and he cannot go a little piece in and then back out. He says he is not in favor of letting them hold office until they are restored by act of Congress; but whom do you propose to restore? Do you intend to take that distinguished Governor of a southern State who first raised the flag of secession, and invited all the young men of his State to follow him and to follow what he proclaimed to be the "bright and promising banner," and after those young men followed him, and now that they are not willing to go with him into a political party, although they acknowledge that they were defeated in the war—does he intend to restore the leader because the leader becomes politically a brother of the Senator? Is that it?

Mr. DRAKE. It will be time enough to answer that when that question comes up.

Mr. NYE. If the Senator from Indiana will allow me—

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator will excuse me. I have just a word to say to his colleague, [Mr. STEWART.] His colleague has spoken about divisions, about parties, about Democrats, about Republicans. I should like to know to which of the classes the Senator from Nevada belonged just two years ago when he supported the policy of President Johnson. I supported that policy, and the records of the Senate show that it was supported also by the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. STEWART,] who now makes himself the leader of the majority in this body, who feels that he is called upon to answer every speech that is made. Nobody can say anything to the Senate in opposition to the views of the majority unless the Senator from Nevada takes it up. He makes himself the champion. He feels that he must answer; else no answer is made. Why this extraordinary zeal? The Senator two years ago said that we were right. Two years ago he said the governments established by Mr. Johnson ought not to be torn down, that they ought to be upheld. Now, a man is not to be restored to political rights if he holds to the same doctrine that the Senator from Nevada taught two years ago! I have found that those gentlemen are the most zealous and the most enterprising in political efforts who at one time occupied a different ground. The man who goes right along in his political belief is not apt to become extreme; but if a man changes, then he must show the sincerity of his change by the extraordinary zeal of his character. Is that the condition of the Senator from Nevada? I believe it is, myself.

Mr. DRAKE. Mr. President—

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator from Missouri allow me to say a word? [Laughter.]

Mr. DRAKE. Certainly; I will allow the Senator from Nevada whatever he desires in the way of speech, but I would not be stuck by such a small pin as that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri is not in order.

Mr. DRAKE. Why, sir, the Senator from Nevada appealed to me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He had no right to appeal to any one but the Chair.

Mr. STEWART. I am aware that if the Senator from Indiana can get any remarks of mine in favor of his side it will be very high authority; but he is very much mistaken in his statement of the extent to which I ever upheld the President's policy. It is true that I was opposed to the tearing down of those governments instituted in the South until some other policy could be substituted. He states it a little stronger than I ever did. I was in favor of inaugurating some effective policy. I was always in favor of protecting the loyal men of the South. I was always in favor of making loyalty honorable there and treason odious. I never was in favor of placing the southern country in the hands of rebels. I thought that tearing down those governments without proposing a plan to build others up was not right.

A little more examination of what I said on that occasion will show the Senator that he has done me great injustice upon this question of consistency toward rebels. Upon the question of consistency toward the rebels I claim as consistent a record as any other man; I believe I have been as consistent as any man in the Senate. I have been opposed on all occasions to rebel rule. I have been in favor of taking any and every means to avert it. I did think at one time that rebel rule might have been prevented by universal suffrage and universal amnesty. I believe it might have been prevented at that time by universal amnesty and universal suffrage.

I believe that we should have so divided the southern people then, by that policy, that we could have organized a loyal party there. That was not done; but we submitted to them a constitutional amendment. Then Mr. Johnson upon that inaugurated a new rebellion. He set the rebels against us. He told them to submit to nothing, and they refused to agree to that amendment. We found that the authority of this Government must be set up against the rebels, and we passed our reconstruction measures.

I have had in charge the bills for relieving men from disabilities. My criterion of examination in each case has been, was this man in favor of or against the Government; and I defy the Senator from Indiana or any one else to show wherein I have ever agreed to place the South under rebel rule or to let rebels acquire absolute control of the State governments so that they could exercise their rebel rule. I have always been in favor of holding complete control of that country until it could be restored to loyalty. As to the mode of accomplishing that result, we have all entertained different views at different times. There have been several experiments made by the majority. The tactics of the enemy have changed from time to time. They have been consistent in but one thing, and that is in defying the authority of this Government. No matter what generosity was extended to them, no matter what efforts were made to bring them back, the majority of the late rebels have continued to defy the Government. Some have yielded obedience to the Government. The latter class we are ready to take by the hand and welcome back; but to say that we are to relieve from disabilities defiant rebels, and place the loyal men of the South under rebel rule is new doctrine. It is a doctrine that I have never entertained for a single moment. I have never admitted it either here or elsewhere.

I admit that I had no idea of the extent of the malignity of those people. I had no idea that they would continue their assassinations. But the proof is becoming stronger and stronger daily. We see in a paper to-day a notice of the assassination of members of the Legislature in South Carolina; we saw accounts of assassinations but yesterday in Georgia; and what is worst of all, I see those assassinations justified in the rebel press or made light of. The poor men who fall victims to this malignant hate are ridiculed in their graves and ridiculed before they are sent to their graves. And yet are we to be told that we must continue to trust those men? Because a man attempts to protect the loyal people in the South from assassination and murder is he to be abused for inconsistency? Show me the loyal man in the North who has not been anxious to extend to them generous terms, and who has not found that those terms were rejected and spurned, and who has not learned that harsher measures were necessary.

From the beginning of the war until now the Union party has been compelled to resort to new measures to meet new treason. When the war began our generals returned negroes to their former masters to build fortifications for them, from which to deal death into the loyal ranks of the United States. You sent your sons South to be slaughtered by the works erected by the negroes whom you returned to rebel masters. That was the policy of the Government at one time, to maintain slavery and the Union. That was found impossible. It was found that the Union must be destroyed or slavery destroyed. Was it inconsistent in Mr. Lincoln to lay his hand upon slavery when it was between us and the Union? So it went on, and the emancipation proclamation came.

After they laid down their arms everybody felt generous toward them, and anxious that they should be restored on the basis of loyalty. Many expressions of kind feeling were made and great anxiety was felt for their restoration, until Andrew Johnson organized a new rebellion, until he organized a despotism there which was preying upon our friends, passing black codes, attempting to inaugurate slavery. When I saw that I was not inconsistent in attempting to save this country from rebel rule; and I am not now inconsistent in still advocating that policy. I am no new convert to the Union of these States; I am no new convert to liberty; I am no new convert to loyalty; I am no new convert to hatred of rebel rule. I would hate myself if from the beginning of this war until now I had not been the consistent advocate of every effort of this Government to maintain its own existence and to protect all men everywhere.

You talk of a consistent record, and you complain of southern men now because they do not preserve a consistent record of disloyalty. You complain of Governor Brown because he has yielded up his disloyalty and is willing to become an obedient subject of this Government. You sneer at that as inconsistent. I would rather have a little inconsistency, if that inconsistency be in the form of repentance, than to have the obstinate sinner who continues in wrong and who never, during his whole life, thinks of doing right—a consistent rebel from the beginning to the end, or one consistent in supporting it. That is a beautiful consistency.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, it must be a source of great gratification to the members of this body to hear that the distinguished Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] is opposed to assassination, is opposed to rebels being invested with power in their States, is opposed to rebels having any say whatever in the governments of the States in which they live. One would suppose that the honorable Senator had such a horror of all these things that he would not now especially give aid or countenance to the participation of such persons in the affairs of the Government; and yet what do we see? He is here advocating the admission of North Carolina to representation in Congress, and he is in favor of giving to the loyal people of North Carolina, as well as Georgia, and other States of the South representation here, and to give to those loyal people the control of the governments of the States in which they live. And who are some of these "loyal" persons who are held up as bright examples for the imitation of their neighbors and friends at home? I believe that the Governor-elect of North Carolina, a bright and shining loyal man in the present day under repentant influence, such as is described by the Senator from Nevada, is a certain Mr. Holden. I hold in my hand a paper containing extracts from some of the writings of this distinguished loyalist, one of which I will read. The holy horror of the Senator from Nevada at assassination has caused me to look it up, and I will present it to the Senate:

"Who will plot for the heads of Abe Lincoln and General Scott?"—William W. Holden, in the Raleigh Standard of June 5, 1861.

He is one of your "repentant rebels!" He is one of the men whom you welcome into your fold who are to make "loyalty honorable and treason odious!" You could execute Wilkes Booth for doing that which was suggested by the loyal Governor of North Carolina; you could hang Mrs. Surratt upon a suspicion that she wished Abraham Lincoln to be assassinated; but you take and make a loyal Governor over a loyal people of the man who first made the suggestion of the assassination of your late lamented chief.

I venture to say that in the long list of names which have been presented, both in the other House and in this Chamber, as proper subjects for pardon by congressional action, there is not one who has not been ascertained to be ready and willing to show true repentance in one way, and one way only, and that is by voting the Republican ticket. That is the test of loyalty. A man may have invited assassination and murder; he may have seized upon your forts before his State seceded; he may have carried on war against the Government until the cause became hopeless; he may have never surrendered until all hope of success was abandoned; he may have stood side by side with his neighbor and fought in the common cause for the destruction of the Federal Government; and you have but one test of repentance, one evidence of loyalty, and that is, that he is prepared not only to confess his sins and do works meet for repentance otherwise, but he must come and vote the Republican ticket. That is the sanctifying grace that elevates him to the state of conversion consequent upon genuine repentance, and makes him meet for the political church of glory of which my distinguished friend is such a bright saint. [Laughter.]

Now, I should like the distinguished Senator from Nevada to point out a single man in the whole southern States to whom he is willing to extend pardon and forgiveness who he is assured will not vote the Republican ticket. I ask the Senator where is the southern man, if he will only "cry aloud and spare not," if he will stand in the highways and byways and shout the praises of Grant and Colfax, that he is not perfectly willing to forgive; and where is the one whom, if he will not do that, the Senator would not keep deprived of all political privileges and call a rebel?

Mr. President, my honorable friend would not deceive the people if he could, and let me tell him he could not deceive them if he would. This thing is all plain. The people of this country see it all, and will see it all. This giving "relief to loyal men in the South" means giving relief to such as you can buy to vote your ticket. You buy them with a pardon, and it would be much more honorable to buy them with money; for the man who went before his neighbors and friends proclaiming that he was acting in a just cause, and invoking their cooperation and leading them into the ranks of rebellion and civil war, and who then, with a dastardly spirit, after proclaiming that he was right, comes and asks for pardon on condition of voting the Republican ticket, is a meaner man than the man who would sell his vote for money. This pardon brokerage that has been set up by Congress with which to buy votes in the southern States is seen by the people of the United States. They perfectly understand it, and it is not in the power of my distinguished friend, who heralds and champions the cause of Republicanism, to shut the eyes of the American people to it.

Mr. WILSON. I hope we shall now take a vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont calls for a division of the question on the amendment to the amendment. The question, therefore, is on the first clause of the amendment to the amendment, which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The first clause of the proposed amendment is to insert after the word "same," in line nine of section three of the amendment of the committee, the following words:

And thereupon the officers of each State duly elected and qualified under the constitution thereof shall be inaugurated without delay.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It seems to me that there is no sort of necessity for that portion of the amendment. As a matter of course, when the State organization is recognized and the State is recognized as entitled to representation in Congress, the officers will be inaugurated at once. I see no occasion for it, and I hope it will not be adopted.

Mr. DRAKE. I suggest to the honorable Senator from Oregon, in order to avoid any possibility of question about the matter, that it would be well, perhaps, to put in that clause of the amendment after the words "constitution thereof" the words previously used in the act "herein recognized."

Mr. EDMUNDS. They are not previously used in the act.

Mr. DRAKE. They are somewhere used in it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There can be no question about that, I suppose. There is only one constitution of a State.

Mr. DRAKE. They claim to be acting under another constitution now, or to have another constitution there. I suggest the modification simply for the consideration of the mover of the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the first clause of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 23, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cameron, Chandler, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Drake, Edmunds, Howard, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Wade, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Buckalew, Cole, Conkling, Davis, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Hendricks, McCreery, Morgan, Patterson of Tennessee, Ross, Saulsbury, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Vickers, and Wiley—18.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Dixon, Doolittle, Ferry, Fessenden, Grimes, Henderson, Howe, Johnson, Norton, Sherman, and Sprague—13.

So the first clause of the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on agreeing to the next clause of the amendment, which will be reported if it is called for.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays on that question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CONNESS and Mr. COLE. Let the amendment be reported.

The Chief Clerk read the second clause of the amendment to the amendment, which was to insert after the words just adopted the following:

But no person prohibited from holding office under the United States or under any State by section three of the proposed amendment of the Constitution of the United States known as article fourteen, shall be deemed eligible to any office in either of said States.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 26, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cameron, Chandler, Cole, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Drake, Harlan, Howard, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Van Winkle, Wade, Wiley, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Buckalew, Conkling, Davis, Edmunds, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, McCreery, Morgan, Patterson of Tennessee, Ross, Saulsbury, Trumbull, and Vickers—15.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Dixon, Doolittle, Ferry, Fessenden, Grimes, Henderson, Howe, Johnson, Norton, Sherman, and Sprague—13.

So the second clause of the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DRAKE. I now move to amend the amendment of the committee in the first section, by striking out all after the word "that," in the ninth line, down to the word "and," in the twelfth line, in the following words:

There shall never be in such State any denial or abridgment of the elective franchise to any person by reason or on account of race or color, excepting Indians not taxed.

And inserting in lieu of those words:

The constitution of neither of said States shall ever be so amended or changed as to deprive any citizen or class of citizens of the United States of the right to vote in said State, who are entitled to vote by the constitution thereof herein recognized, except as a punishment for such crimes as are now felonies at common law, whereof they shall have been duly convicted under laws equally applicable to all the inhabitants of said State: Provided, That any alteration of said constitution may be made with regard to the time and place of residence of voters.

I offer this amendment in order that the fundamental condition imposed upon all these States may be the same.

Mr. WILSON. This is the same as the Arkansas provision.

Mr. DRAKE. This is the same as the committee of conference agreed upon in the case of Arkansas, and I think it is proper that they should all be made exactly alike in regard to the fundamental conditions.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now recurs on the amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, as amended. The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. DRAKE. There is an amendment in the preamble reported by the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. We have not come to that yet. That is the last thing.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on concurring in the Senate with the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Now, I desire to have a separate vote on inserting Alabama.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You must move to strike it out; that is the only form in which you can reach it. There is only one amendment made in committee.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Must that motion be made before the Senate concur in the amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. You can now move to strike it out.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then I move to strike out Alabama.

Mr. WILSON. I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, as I was not present when this Alabama discussion terminated the other day, and therefore did not have an opportunity to say what I wished to say, I want to say it now. I am very sorry, indeed, that the Senate has thought fit in committee to insist upon inserting this State in this bill. Every Senator who hears me knows that each one of these States, properly considered, stands on its own footing, and that this is the first instance in the history of the country where we have undertaken to deal with more than one State at a time in admitting them into the Union. At least, if there is any exception, it is not within my knowledge. And it is right and proper that they should be dealt with separately, because circumstances, laws, institutions, everything that relates to the propriety of admitting one State, may have nothing whatever to do with the propriety of admitting some other State. Therefore, as a matter of justice and expediency, there is no more propriety in grouping all these States in one bill than there would be in grouping all the bills that are before any of the committees of this body into one and putting them through.

But my objection, Mr. President, does not depend simply upon the intrinsic propriety of this. It depends upon specific objections, which are controlling upon my mind, to the admission of Alabama as a full State at this time. While I am willing to yield to that sense of political expediency—and I do not use the word "political" in a party sense—which my associates have acted upon as to these other States, although it disagrees with my own opinion as to what we ought to do, as Senators know, and therefore I go for this bill to admit these other States, I cannot perceive how, conscientiously, in the discharge of my own duty, I can bring myself to vote for this bill with Alabama in it, because the case as to that State stands upon an entirely different footing from that of the other States. The principle upon which we have attempted to proceed in organizing these States has been that we would, in the first place, set up over this territory where the rebellion had been crushed, a military government for the mere preservation of order until some legal steps could be taken for a complete and peaceful restoration of self-government to those communities. Then what did we undertake to do?

Mr. TIPTON. Will the Senator give way to a motion to adjourn?

Mr. EDMUNDS. If it is the pleasure of the Senate; but I would just as leave talk now as at any other time.

Mr. CONNESS. It is the pleasure of the Senate to vote.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But before the vote is taken on this bill I wish to state the reasons why I shall vote against it; not for the particular benefit of Senators, but for the benefit of myself and my constituents.

Mr. TIPTON. I desire to follow the example of the Senator, and to give my reasons also for voting for the proposition.

Mr. CONKLING and others. Let us finish the bill to-night.

Mr. HENDRICKS and others. Let us adjourn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not intend to occupy the time of the Senate either against its pleasure or with its pleasure, because what I have to say will not be long; but before the vote is taken on this proposition I intend to give the reasons which make me desirous that the Senate should leave Alabama to be considered by itself, and I was proceeding to state those reasons.

I had said, Mr. President, that we had established a military government as the first step. As the next step, and not at all connected with military government except as incidental, was the provision that we made for restoring to these people self-government. The first step in that provision was to select from the population in those States a defined and described class of persons as the persons to whom we would commit the first faculties of self-government, of electing conventions and framing constitutions, and to whom, in accordance with all our republican notions so far, those constitutions were to be submitted for adoption or rejection.

We had thus first established order. We had then selected a class of constituents into whose hands we would put the government of those States by a distinct classification and definition of the faculties and qualities that they should possess and exercise in performing those functions. We said to that people—speaking now particularly of Alabama, although it applies to all the rest—"inasmuch as it is known to the whole country that there is only a small proportion of white men in that State who are loyal to the Government, inasmuch as it is known to the whole country that the large mass of the people who can exercise these faculties in that State are persons who have never exercised them before, and who are just now, for the first time, elevated into the scale of social and political freedom, before this constitution shall be inaugurated, before even a convention shall be called to frame it, a majority of all the classes to whom the right to vote is given shall participate in selecting the agents to whom that work is committed." That was thought to be wise and republican. It underwent debate in this body, and this body declared as its judgment, and it so stood in the law, that a majority of the whole number should act upon the question of framing their local State government.

When the bill passed the House of Representatives, if I rightly recollect it, they even went further than that, and required that a majority of the whole number registered should vote for a convention and for the constitution; but as we left the law we required that a majority of the whole voting body should act upon the question; and the only object we had in that, the great object I had in doing the little that I could and did to further that project, was to induce those people who were entitled to register and who had yet been hostile to the Government and who were hostile to giving suffrage to the blacks to come forward and participate in the formation of governments, to give them, if they were opposed to negro suffrage, the opportunity of registering and putting themselves on record as a body of men who were willing to act in the reorganization of the State, even if they acted in opposition to the views which the majority here entertained of referring suffrage to the blacks; because it was perfectly well understood—at least I believed—that if we left it in any other wise this great mass of people would hang back and would take no participation at all in the formation of these governments, and then we should be told all over the North, and with great force and plausibility, that we had remitted these governments to the blacks solely, and that none but the blacks had participated in the formation of them; and the object of that would have been to produce a political revolution in the North which would restore the Democratic party to power, who would then recognize nobody but these rebels who had refused to take part in forming these governments, and our emancipated blacks would have had a very poor chance of voting after that.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Will the Senator yield to a motion to adjourn?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I beg that my friend from Indiana will excuse me, because my own political friends insist upon going on.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I was going to suggest that evidently Senators of the majority are not giving the closest attention to the debate, and it is utterly impossible for any gentleman to discuss this question satisfactorily as the Senate is now organized in its present fatigued condition. Therefore, if the Senator will allow me, I will move an adjournment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am much obliged to my friend. I know that he and his colleagues pay attention always, particularly to doctrines that they do not like, [laughter;] but inasmuch as my friends on this side like the doctrines I preach, I do not ask them to pay attention if they will only not make so much noise as to prevent my hearing myself. As I stated before, what I am saying is in self-defense, and not in the expectation, I am sorry to say, of convincing a single Senator on this side of the Chamber of the propriety of my views; and as what I am saying is in self-defense, I do not ask anybody to listen to me.

Mr. President, this was the object, so far as it influenced my action, for which this provision was inserted in the law that authorized the people of Alabama to form a State government. It had precisely the effect that I, for one, expected and intended that it should have, and that was to bring to the registry, and thus to induce them to take the first step in reorganizing the State government, the whole body of the people of that State, white as well as black, those who had been engaged in the rebellion as well as those who had suffered for their patriotic adherence to the right side. There was one step. They were committed. The southern Democrats—and I use the term in no offensive sense—who had been, every man of them almost, rebels, were committed to the policy of taking a step under this authority of Congress in the great work of restoration and reconstruction, a step from which they could not recede. They had chosen voluntarily to register, and we all know that it was after great hesitation and with much fear and trembling that they did it. One half of their papers in the first place, at the outset, endeavored to prevent their doing it, for the very reason I have now suggested; but it was done. Then a convention was called, a constitution was framed, and the same law which declared that they should act so far still declared that a majority of the whole body must participate in order to give any vitality at all to that constitution. We all know that so far as the record goes, so far as we have the official returns upon which we are acting, that majority did not participate.

To be sure I know it is said that this is excused by the fact that some were prevented from going to the polls who would otherwise have gone; that in some places there were no elections held; and therefore a reasonable horoscope is cast of some supposed future to show that there would be a majority acting if circumstances had been more favorable. Mr. President, that is a singular argument to address to a body of men as showing that a law is complied with, or substantially complied with, because it is pure speculation and nothing else. We sometimes oust a man from an office to which he was elected by fraud, because there the fraud is an affirmative act, and once investigated it turns out that he has no title to the office; but where did you ever hear of a man being installed into office on the ground that his election was prevented by fraud when he did not get any votes at all? That is practically this question; because, although it was not a question of an election between two different, distinct sets of men, the law said that there must be a majority of the votes cast, and now it happens that by some popular tumult or other cause a majority of votes was not cast at all. You do not know, except by mere speculation, which way they would have been cast if the whole number had voted. So, acting upon that mere speculation, assuming that if a majority of votes had been cast there would have been a majority for your side, you undertake to say that that has been done which the proof shows has not been done.

Mr. President, is that right; I am not now arguing the propriety of the original proposition itself as it affects the final question; but I am saying this: when you lay down to the people a ground or principle upon which they should be entitled to form a government for themselves, and they do not act upon that ground or principle, can you say that the government is nevertheless formed when it is to be a government of that people, when they are the persons to whom you have remitted, and to whom you must remit if you believe in republicanism at all, the right of declaring whether they will have that constitution or not. You point out to them the method by which their will shall be ascertained, and then when you apply the test of that method you find that by their will, as you have prescribed their taking the evidence of it, it has not been adopted, are you to turn around, acting upon republican principles, and say that that which has not been done according to your own formula shall nevertheless be treated as done, and impose a constitution, if it be as perfect as the sermon on the mount, upon a community much less than one half of whom have, so far as the record goes, voted for it or upon it at all? That is certainly not republican.

If we were establishing a mere territorial government in that place, we should not need to consult the will of that people, because the people of a Territory, or of a conquered State, are so far at the will of the ruling power; but Senators seem to forget that this act which is now to be done, must of necessity be the act of that people, and it must be the act of that people derived from the affirmative action of the voters going to the polls and putting in their ballots, which is the only evidence recognized so far of giving any validity or vitality to a man's vote. I never heard in any contested election between man and man of a person's vote being counted for one candidate or another unless he went to the polls. No man was ever ousted from any office, or from any place to which he had been elected, on account of the fact that somebody was prevented from voting for the other man who would have a right.

Mr. MORTON. Are you not acting on that very principle?

Mr. EDMUNDS. How?

Mr. MORTON. By proposing that every man who did not go to the polls from any cause should be counted as voting against the constitution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, sir; we are not acting on that principle. We did not declare that every man who did not go to the polls from any cause should be counted as voting against the constitution.

Mr. MORTON. That is the effect.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There being one hundred and fifty thousand men in the State who are entitled of right to exercise the faculty of deciding whether they will have a constitution or not, we declare that there must be at least a majority of those men who shall be willing to say one way or the other before it becomes the constitution of the whole. But, as I said, Mr. President, I am not defending at this moment, and I do not want to take time to defend it, the intrinsic propriety of that provision, except so far as I have already spoken of it as a necessary inducement, a coercive inducement almost, I may say, morally so, to the persons who had been rebels in these States, to come forward and register. I am speaking of the fact as it is, that this became a part of the law, which could not be misunderstood by anybody, upon solemn debate in the two Houses of Congress. As such it was sent to these people, and as such a majority of that people did that which was equivalent to complying with the law in such way that, by force of that law, the constitution was not adopted. That is the proposition.

Mr. President, that being the law—and, as I have said, I do not want to take time to discuss whether it is right or not in any other sense than that in which I have now spoken of it—the question is whether we can, consistently with our duty to our principles of republican faith, undertake to say that a constitution which we have submitted to a people, and which has by that people been rejected, shall nevertheless be imposed upon that people, and the government organized by it be inaugurated under it, and men put into the possession of offices of all kinds, ministerial, executive, judicial, military, who are to govern that people, when that election was nothing but straw, from the fact that the very constitution under which the election was held never received any validity or vitality at all, that it receives its first validity and vitality from this enactment that you are about to pass. That is what gives it vitality and validity, not the consent of a majority of that people ascertained in the only way you can ascertain the consent of a majority of that people, according to the previously provided and arranged method of ascertaining it, but according to your own speculative will now; and you therefore set up a State by the sheer force of your legislative will now, and by that same will put every department of its government into the hands of persons who, for aught we know, would not one of them have been selected to fulfill these functions by that people if your law had been so arranged as to require every man, in order to have his wishes known, come out and vote. How do we have a right to know that any one of these officers would have been elected if the majority who stayed at home, and who, therefore, knew the constitution could not be adopted, had by your law been called upon to come out and vote, and who might possibly have voted for somebody else?

I know it is a very easy answer to make to this to say that it is altogether probable that the thing would have come out just as it did. That is setting up States upon the basis of merely an imaginary republicanism. We might say at any time that possibly the people of the State of Vermont or of Oregon would prefer some constitution that we should impose upon them and some Governors that we should send there much better than those they would elect. There might be a faction there who would make us believe that, and therefore the argument would be "let us impose it upon them, they will be satisfied with it; a majority are probably for it." The trouble is, Mr. President, that under a republican form of government, the only method of knowing whether a majority is for or against a thing is by trying the question, and letting the majority say through the ballot-box whether they are for it or against it. We have undertaken to do that, and we have found, according to the very method we have prescribed, that a majority were against this constitution, and not for it; and judging from some of the provisions there are in it, I do not blame them at all. I should have voted against it myself. I think every honest man—and I know my friend from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] is one—on looking at one of its provisions to which my friend from New York [Mr. CONKLING] called attention to-day, would have been obliged to vote against it. I refer to the provision which was nothing but a sheer and barefaced attempt to wrest private property from its owners wherever that property was on the shore of a navigable stream. I do not know that this had any influence; I do not know what sort of constituencies there are in Alabama; but I have a right to presume that a provision in a constitution which is repugnant to our sense of justice, which shocks all the notions we have of government and of right, ought to be distasteful to the people of Alabama. And yet this constitution, not having been examined by the committee who reported this bill, because the committee thought it was unwise to clog and endanger the admission of these other States by this different and separate question, it is, with all its faults and frailties, and with the officers elected under it, to be set up by force of this bill over that people, without even an examination.

Mr. CONNESS. Does the Senator undertake to tell us that the Judiciary Committee, of which he is a member, to whom the bill was referred containing Alabama, struck Alabama out, and recommended the Senate to adopt their report without having examined the case of Alabama at all, thus denying to us the right to the knowledge we sought on that question by referring it to them?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not say any such thing, Mr. President. If my friend paid attention to what I said he would have known that I did not say any such thing; and if he did not pay attention, he has misrepresented what I said. I said that this constitution was not examined by the committee with a view to acting upon it as a constitution, for the reason that the committee were of opinion that, on account of the peculiar difference between the case of this State and of the others, it ought not to be in the bill; and having determined that it ought, for those reasons, not to be in the bill, we did not think it necessary to undertake to provide fundamental conditions in regard to the constitution of a State which was not going into the bill. That is what I said; and I think there is some reason in that. We should have presented a very extraordinary spectacle to this body if we had reported in favor of striking out Alabama on the ground I have stated, and also provided that there should be certain fundamental conditions in her case after she was struck out, which would be the effect of such a course as my friend from California refers to. I have stated my position, and I trust my friend now does not misunderstand me.

Mr. CONNESS. I do not think I misunderstand the Senator, and I am perfectly willing to let the matter stand as it does in the report.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now, Mr. President, the question is whether it is wise and right for a majority of this body to insist upon grouping with the case of the States which we are all willing should pass in the way they are now left a State which stands upon an entirely different principle, let it be right or wrong, one which has merits or demerits of its own that are not applicable to the others, and which ought, therefore, in all justice and fairness, to be considered by itself, so that every gentleman can give an intelligent vote on each branch of the proposition.

If my friend from California and my friend from Connecticut believed that the case of Florida was one which, under the peculiar circumstances of that case, ought not to go there, why ought they to be compelled to vote to carry that through against their consciences in order to carry through the other five that they did believe in? And why ought I to be compelled, if it were possible to compel me, to vote to put Alabama through the approval of this body because I believe that the case of Georgia and the case of Louisiana and the case of the other States is one upon which I may well act with my party and political friends? That is the question. In bills which relate to one subject an amendment may be proper that concerns one item of that subject; and if there was any necessary relation between the case of Alabama and the other States, there would be some sense in having them all in the same bill; but we all know, as I said before, that this is the first instance in the history of the country where the case of one State has been entangled or connected with the case of another; where the constitution of one State, good or bad, has been attempted to be carried through upon the strong back of some other constitution that has been clearly adopted on the principles laid down by your organic law. There would be just as much propriety in adding Colorado to this bill; and I am almost astonished that some of my friends have not proposed that, and thus ride that through, although it has been once rejected in this body. I am not now speaking of its merits; but I say there would be just as much propriety in putting Colorado upon this bill as there is in putting Alabama upon it. Then it would be said to every friend of Colorado, "Colorado is a clear case; never mind about your doubts and difficulties as to any other States; never mind what their constitutions are; you have one good provision in the bill, and therefore put it through with all the others." That is unjust, Mr. President; it is wrong; it is a dangerous precedent in legislation; and the time may come within the lives and the official presence of some of us here when we shall be exceedingly sorry that we had any hand in setting a precedent of this description.

Mr. President, I promised not to occupy more time than was sufficient to state my own position in self-defense. I have now stated the reasons why I am so desirous that the Senate should leave Alabama out of this bill and leave her to be considered by herself. The Judiciary Committee are not blind to the necessities of that people. They are desirous that they shall be provided for immediately. There is no want of harmony or concert in the committee on that subject. We are only waiting to have this bill disposed of to bring forward a bill which the Senate, if they then think upon the merits of Alabama alone, should admit her as a full State at once, will permit them to do it; or if they think it better, as my friend from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] did the other day when he introduced a bill for that purpose, to set them up as a provisional State until, according to republican principles, their constitution can again be submitted to the people, and as the House of Representatives have thought by passing such a bill as to Alabama, then to do that instead of loading this bill with this extraneous difficulty which does not belong to it.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, I will not occupy time. The proposition of the Senator which he undertook to sustain I undertake to say is totally untenable. He insists that he has the right here, and that I and others have the right, to have separate propositions to vote upon. What is legislation, sir, but a compromise of opinions? I desire to present a bill here on a given subject. I give it mature consideration. I prepare it to fit that subject exactly according to my mind and its best reflections. I introduce that bill. It is referred to a committee; it is there changed by the stamp of other minds. It is then brought into the Senate; it is here again changed by the stamp of other minds; and finally I vote for it though it be different entirely from the form in which I prepared it according to my best judgment. And, sir, if you wait until you get a proposition of any kind to fit the mind and judgment of every Senator, you would wait forever and there would be no legislation.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, every Senator concedes that according to the law the constitution of Alabama was rejected by the people; that the effect of the vote of the people under the law was to reject it. Now, the proposition is to admit the State, that rejection to the contrary notwithstanding. It is the simple naked proposition that the law on that subject was no law and that it does not bind the judgment or the conscience of the Senate. I think this is a very singular position for the Senate to assume first after the close of an impeachment trial when the President of the United States was called in question and put upon his trial upon the charge of disregarding law. Let me ask this question of Senators: suppose the reconstruction law had provided that upon the ratification of a constitution by the vote of the people according to the law the President should declare the State admitted; and suppose, according to the law, the vote as it stood rejected the constitution, and then the President had issued a proclamation declaring that the State was admitted, what would you say to the President? You would say to him, "This is the law; it was obligatory upon you; it bound you; we will prosecute you before the Senate and before the judgment of the country for proclaiming a constitution to have been agreed to by the people when it stood rejected according to law." And yet the Senate may disregard the law, plain and palpable, and it stands as the judgment of the Senate that that was no law, provided Alabama be now admitted.

I intended to say just this much. I do not intend to discuss the merits of Alabama or its demerits. There are features in its constitution that ought, perhaps, to be discussed. Those features that give representation in the Legislature in larger proportion to those parts of the State where the negro population is dense and in smaller proportion to those parts where the white population predominates ought to receive the attention of the Senate. The provisions that require a man to swear that he will not disturb by any action of his in the future the right of voting before he shall be allowed to vote himself; that the citizen, in regard to the institutions of his State, shall tie his hands first by oath before he is allowed to vote, in my opinion ought to be considered. But prominent and above all is the proposition that you admit the State with this constitution, notwithstanding her rejection of it, according to the law that you enacted, the declaration by Congress; that an act upon which the stamp of law was placed was really no law; and that not by a modification, not by a repeal, but by a disregard of it in regard to acts done while it was understood to be in force.

Mr. CRAGIN. Mr. President, I suppose it will be in order for those of us who have not said a word to make a few remarks. The speech of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr.

HENDRICKS,] as he started out, would give us to understand that Congress had no right to repeal or modify any of its laws.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I did not say that. I said expressly that this was not a repeal or modification; but a disregard of the law.

Mr. CRAGIN. I say that the Senator started out in the way I stated, but before he got through he made the suggestion that he now alludes to. It occurs to me that cases similar to this have happened repeatedly. Congress has often passed what are known as enabling acts, requiring Territories to do certain things in order that they might be admitted as States, and when they have come here presenting their constitutions frequently they have failed to comply entirely and specifically with the law, and yet Congress in its discretion has admitted those States, notwithstanding the law had not been complied with in every particular. We may now change our minds upon that subject; we may say that they have so nearly complied, and the circumstances are such that it is better that the State be received than that it be kept out. To my mind, if ten thousand men in Alabama had come to the polls and voted against this constitution, thereby complying with the law, making a majority of the registered votes, the constitution would not have come here with one particle more moral force or power than it now comes with, nor would that people be better prepared to assume the responsibilities of a State government and to carry it on than they are now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Suppose eighty thousand had gone and voted against it?

Mr. CRAGIN. That is not supposable. It is known in this case that the opponents of the constitution, the rebels as they are called, believed that they could more certainly defeat this constitution by staying away from the polls. They determined to do that themselves and also to keep away others, to keep away all that they could who would vote for it. That policy prevailed; and they did according to the law defeat the constitution. I admit it; but to my mind, under all the circumstances, it is better for Congress now to waive that part of the law and admit this State, when we all know that a very large percentage of the people have voted for the adoption of this constitution; and there is no Senator within the sound of my voice who does not believe that if this State had voted under the amended law under which all the other States have voted, by which a majority of those voting could control, this constitution would have been adopted by a large majority. There is no Senator on this floor who does not privately believe that the constitution would have been adopted if men had come up to the polls instead of staying away.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Permit me to make a remark to my friend?

Mr. CRAGIN. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ought to say, in reply to that very point, that I was myself in favor, early in January, of changing the law so as to allow a majority of those voting to decide, and I think some other members of the committee were also; but it was represented to some of us by influential friends in Alabama, some who had been elected to office, that it would not do to make that change, because the majority would be the wrong way. They thought it would be fairly produced, to be sure; but they were afraid that would be the result.

Mr. CRAGIN. The same thing was said in reference to the other States. It was said when the amendatory bill was passed that we should lose the constitution in every one of these States, but the demonstration is the other way—

Mr. EDMUNDS. I agree to that.

Mr. CRAGIN. The experiment has shown that every one of them that has acted has adopted the constitution. Alabama would have done the same thing by more than thirty thousand majority, I have not the least doubt, if the amendatory law had prevailed there.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I desire to make one remark, as the remarks of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CRAGIN] go upon the record of our proceedings, that his argument in the main particular is misconceived. He says, true, the law was as contended for by the Senator from Indiana: true, we now propose to disregard that law; but Congress unquestionably has a right, and a reasonable right, to dispense with a condition which it required. It is very true that a condition reserved in a former law on behalf of Congress itself, inuring to its advantage or in reservation of its power over a subject, may be dispensed with. I agree to all that; I assent to his argument thus far; but the Senator fails to perceive that what is now proposed is that this law shall be dispensed with and set aside against the interest and against the right of the people of Alabama. They were parties to this legislation; they were mainly interested in it; and when they acted under it, the good faith of this Government was pledged to them that that law should take effect precisely as it was drafted. You cannot repeal that law now. Why? Because it is executed; because proceedings have taken place under it. It is beyond the authority or power of Congress to undo what has been done. We cannot reverse history. All that we can do is to make provisions which will be prospective and take effect hereafter. But as to a law which has expended its force, as to a law under proceedings have taken place, it is impossible for us to change the law in regard to the past; we can only make a new provision which shall take effect in the future; and in the present case on what ground do we stand? In substance, when we get to the heart of this question, it is proposed by act of Congress to establish a constitution for the State of Alabama, and to impose it upon her people for all future time until they shall think proper to change it.

I say, then, that the condition we dispense with, that this setting aside of the law, that this waiver of a condition or of a provision of the law, is not a power which was reserved to Congress itself; it is not a waiver of our right, of our privilege, or of our power, but it is an attempt by us to waive rights under that law which vested in the people of Alabama, and which they only can surrender, which we cannot surrender for them or waive for them at all. You are attempting to set up by act of Congress a constitution for a State; it is imposed upon that people by your will; it has no other legal foundation and no other legal character.

But, sir, I do not care to go into this debate. I only rose, as the argument of the Senator from New Hampshire is going out in our published proceedings, to point out the fallacy, the absurdity of reasoning into which that Senator, usually so acute and so accurate in his logic, had fallen.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I rise, sir, to notice a remark of the Senator from Indiana, which is, that we are about to admit Alabama in violation of this law. If I thought so I should not vote for it; but as I do not think so, of course my vote will turn upon other considerations. It is a violation of this statute, according to the Senator's notions, because he says it is clear, conceded, that the constitution has not received a majority of the registered voters there. That is the proposition. If that were the only provision in the statute, and the whole subject were made to turn precisely on that proposition, then I should say that the statement of the honorable Senator was correct; but that is not the whole. There are five distinct propositions in this statute, every one of which must be made to appear to the satisfaction of Congress before the State is to be entitled to admission. The fundamental proposition in this section is not that a majority of the registered voters shall vote. That is not the idea which underlies the statute. This statute, together with the other statutes on the same subject, undertakes to provide for the formation of constitutions for those States; and upon what idea? After giving the terms and conditions on which they should proceed, it was that they should be adopted by "a majority of the qualified electors." That is the idea in this statute, and the fundamental idea. I will read its words: "and if the Congress shall be satisfied that such constitution meets the approval of a majority of all the qualified electors" in the States, then they are to be admitted; not if Congress is satisfied that it meets the approval of a majority of all the registered voters, but a majority of all the qualified voters.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What others are qualified besides the registered voters?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will come to that in a moment. I say that is the fundamental proposition in this act; whenever Congress is satisfied that a majority of the qualified voters approve of any one of the constitutions here formed, then it is the duty of Congress, I submit, to admit the State. The Senator from Indiana says that does not appear. Why does it not appear? Because he says it is clear that a majority of the registered voters have not voted. I submit to him that that is not a logical statement of the case, nor is that a logical deduction. If a majority of the registered voters had appeared, doubtless the Senator would have found satisfactory evidence that a majority of the qualified voters had approved the constitution; but I can conceive that a majority of the registered voters might have voted for this constitution and still a majority of the qualified voters not have approved it, and we should so find because it might have been done in fraud; it might have been done by menace and threat. So this provision for a majority of the registered voters is only a method after all. It was a method which Congress, through this statute, provided for ascertaining that a majority of the qualified electors approved it.

Now, I will ask my honorable friend from Indiana whether he would contend that if a majority of the registered voters had voted for this constitution Congress was committed on the subject so that we were then bound to receive this State; that there was no option; that it would have been in bad faith to refuse admission? If the returns showed that a majority of the registered voters had voted for this constitution, should we be estopped? The Senator will not contend for that. We should go still further, and consider whether they had voted fairly; that is, whether the election had been a fair one, whether they had voted under menace, whether they had been bribed, whether there had been any inducement which rendered that apparent expression an unfair expression, not a real expression of the qualified voters. Therefore I say it was only a method; we are not concluded by it; we would not have been concluded if the returns had shown that a majority of the registered voters had voted. Congress did not intend to be concluded; we intend to look further and see whether it was fairly done; and that is one of the propositions in the law. First, the returns shall show so and so; second, "and if it shall appear, moreover, that the election was one at which all the voters qualified had an opportunity to vote." Does anybody pretend that they had an opportunity? If they had not an opportunity, we surely are not concluded. Then comes in the third proposition, which I have dwelt upon, and which I say is the fundamental idea in this statute, that Congress, after all has been done, is to be satisfied that a majority of the qualified electors approved the constitution; and I submit that if Congress are satisfied of that, there is no violation of the act if the State is admitted.

One other word and I have done. I did not rise to discuss the question, and had not intended to say a word on the subject. It is certainly the great political necessity of this country, conceded to be so on all hands, that these States should be admitted to representation in the Congress of the United States. Our friends on this side of the Chamber who oppose the admission of these States to representation under these constitutions are just as strenuous as we are for their admission; but they would have admitted them upon other constitutions and upon other grounds. There is just one testimony here in this Senate everywhere that these States must be admitted to representation in the national Congress at the earliest practicable moment. That is our duty. That is the duty of the session. It is the grand political necessity of the country that these States should be admitted to representation here at the earliest practicable moment. I shall act therefore, sir, in the presence of that necessity in the vote I give.

I think Alabama deserves better than she has received at our hands. I think it does not become us to apply a different rule to Alabama from that which we apply to the other States. Alabama came here early. Alabama was the first to move in the work of reconstruction. She held out to us more encouragement of a disposition to adopt the legislation of Congress for her readmission than any of the other States. In this sense I think she fairly took the lead.

According to my recollection she came here very early, admonishing us that if we did not apply the rule which we have subsequently applied to the other States, she would certainly fail. I know my honorable friend from Vermont says he had some information on the subject which led him to believe that somebody, some portion of the people in Alabama, did not desire the change; but my information was at a pretty early period, through sources I thought entirely reliable, that the loyal people of that State believed it would be a failure if this rule so extraordinary in American politics, this rule a violation of the American principle in politics, was applied to her. She did not get relief, and the result has verified that her fears were well founded.

For these reasons, Mr. President, not to elaborate, I shall vote for Alabama in this bill.

Mr. TIPPON. When I said a few moments ago that I desired an opportunity of expressing my views on this subject, I intended to throw out a few propositions which I supposed were an analysis of the fifth section of the reconstruction act which has just been discussed by the Senator from Maine, and it has been done to my satisfaction so thoroughly that I shall not attempt a discussion of the section at all. I simply intended to draw from it this deduction in the language of the law: "If the Congress shall be satisfied that such constitution meets the approval of a majority of all the qualified voters in the State, then the same shall be admitted to representation;" and being satisfied that it does meet the approbation of a majority of all the qualified electors, I am ready to vote for it for that cause.

On the other point, I see no objection to grouping all these States together. I admit that heretofore we have generally, as to the Territories, put each one separately in an enabling act, and have admitted them as States separately; but all these States were grouped together, or their condition was grouped together in one common law, and if it was legitimate to make a proposition to them in general terms, I hold that it is legitimate to admit them in one common bill.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, one thing I think our friends who are satisfied ought to endeavor to do for the benefit of those who are not exactly satisfied, and that is to state to us the basis of their satisfaction. What is it that has appeared here before the Senate to give such plenary satisfaction to honorable Senators that a majority of the people of Alabama are in favor of this constitution? It is true they have sent up their voice to you; you have evidence that they rejected it by sixteen thousand majority, I think it was; that is, it failed to receive a majority of the votes of the qualified voters of Alabama by sixteen thousand; and yet there is some fountain of satisfaction opened up in this Chamber into which honorable Senators dive and come out clean, perfectly satisfied in their own minds, and yet they do not deign to tell us one simple circumstance which gives them the satisfaction. They point out no evidence to us. They are happy, perfectly happy; but where the grace comes from that electrifies their souls and sets them to shouting, nobody knows but themselves. It is a secret, magnetic influence—

Mr. MORTON. If the Senator will allow me, I will state one basis of the satisfaction that prevails in the Senate Chamber. It is that there were sixty-nine thousand six hundred votes cast in favor of the constitution in Alabama and only eleven hundred against it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Well, Mr. President, that may be perfectly satisfactory to the honorable Senator; but when we recollect that under the terms of the act a majority of all the votes was necessary to give validity to this constitution, and when it is apparent to everybody, and everybody knows from the newspapers and knows from mingling with the people of Alabama that those opposed to it adopted the policy of staying away so as to show their dissent, that that was the plan adopted by them to show that they did not favor the adoption of the constitution, I do not think the satisfaction of the honorable Senator from Indiana can be imparted to others. He says only one thousand voted against it. Logically, then, the honorable Senator would suppose that there are but one thousand persons in Alabama opposed to this constitution. While I will not disturb the satisfaction of honorable Senators, while I wish them to be happy, I beg to remind them that not only the eyes of Delaware, but the eyes of all the people of the United States are upon them, and they will try to discover the real sources of this satisfaction.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Illinois to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, which is to strike out "Alabama."

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 16, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Buckalew, Conkling, Davis, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Howe, McGreevy, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Patterson of Tennessee, Saulsbury, Trumbull, Vickers, and Yates—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Cameron, Chandler, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Drake, Ferry, Harlan, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Van Winkle, Wade, Wiley, Williams, and Wilson—24.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Cole, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Fowler, Grimes, Henderson, Howard, Johnson, Norton, Patterson of New Hampshire, and Sprague—14.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was concurred in.

It was to strike out all of the House bill after the enacting clause, and in lieu thereof to insert:

That each of the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, Alabama, and Florida shall be entitled and admitted to representation in Congress as a State of the Union when the Legislature of such State shall have duly ratified the amendment to the Constitution of the United States proposed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and known as article fourteen, upon the following fundamental condition: that the constitution of neither of said States shall ever be so amended or changed as to deprive any citizen, or class of citizens, of the United States of the right to vote in said State who are entitled to vote by the constitution thereof, herein recognized, except as a punishment for such crimes as are now felonies at common law, whereof they shall have been duly convicted under laws equally applicable to all the inhabitants of said State: Provided, That any alteration of said constitution may be made with regard to the time and place of residence of voters. And the State of Georgia shall only be entitled and admitted to representation upon this further fundamental condition: that the first and third subdivisions of section seventeen of the fifth article of the constitution of said State, except the proviso to the first subdivision, shall be null and void, and that the General Assembly of said State by solemn public act shall declare the assent of the State to the foregoing fundamental condition.

SEC. 2. And further enacted, That if the day fixed for the first meeting of the Legislature of either of said States by the constitution or ordinance thereof shall have passed or have so nearly arrived before the passage of this act that there shall not be time for the Legislature to assemble at the period fixed, such Legislature shall convene at the end of twenty days from the time this act takes effect unless the Governor-elect shall sooner convene the same.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the first section of this act shall take effect as to each State, except Georgia, when such State shall by its Legislature duly ratify article fourteen of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States, proposed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and as to the State of Georgia when it shall in addition give the assent of said State to the fundamental condition hereinbefore imposed upon the same; and thereupon the officers of each State elected and qualified under the constitution thereof shall be inaugurated without delay; but no person prohibited from holding office under the United States or under any State by section three of the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States known as article fourteen shall be deemed eligible to any office in either of said States unless relieved from disability as provided in said amendment; and it is hereby made the duty of the President within ten days after receiving official information of the ratification of said amendment by the Legislature of either of said States to issue a proclamation announcing that fact.

Mr. DRAKE. I suppose now is the time for amendments in the preamble.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is. The amendments reported by the Committee on the Judiciary to the preamble will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend the preamble by striking out "Alabama" in the second line and inserting "Florida," and by striking out the words "in form" after the word "republican" in the seventh line.

Mr. TRUMBULL. "Alabama" should not go out now.

Mr. DRAKE. And Florida should be inserted in the preamble. There are two amendments in the preamble. One is to insert the name of Florida there; and as it is now in the body of the bill, it should of course be inserted in the preamble. The other is to strike out the words "in form." Both of these amendments require the action of the Senate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think if the Chair will put the question separately on each proposition we shall get at it quicker. The first question is on striking "Alabama" from the preamble. Of course that will not be stricken out now after the vote of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposing to strike "Alabama" from the preamble.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment inserting Florida in the preamble.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next question is on the amendment to strike out the words "in form" after the word "republican" in the preamble.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DRAKE. I suggest that in engrossing the preamble the word "and" be transposed so as to put it in between Alabama and Florida.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be made as a matter of course, if there be no objection.

The preamble, as amended, reads as follows:

Whereas the people of North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, Alabama, and Florida have, in pursuance of the provisions of an act entitled "An act for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867, and the acts supplementary thereto, framed constitutions of State government which are republican, and have adopted said constitutions by large majorities of the votes cast at the elections held for the ratification or rejection of the same: Therefore,

Mr. CONKLING. The bill having been amended so as to include Alabama, I have an amendment to offer now to make it harmonious, and conform the case of Alabama to that of Georgia. I called attention earlier in the debate to the fact that there is in the constitution of Alabama a provision equivalent in principle to that which has been denounced in the case of Georgia. To meet that I offer, in the language already employed in the bill, this amendment:

And the State of Alabama shall be entitled and admitted to representation only upon this further fundamental condition: that section twenty-six of the first article of the constitution of said State, except so much thereof as makes navigable waters public highways, shall be null and void, and that the General Assembly of said State, by a solemn public act, shall declare the assent of the State to the foregoing fundamental condition.

Of course it will involve no additional time, as the action of the General Assembly is necessary. The clause of the Alabama constitution which I propose by the amendment to avoid is this:

"That all navigable waters shall remain forever public highways, free to the citizens of the State and of the United States, without tax, impost, or toll imposed; and that no tax, toll, impost, or wharfage shall be demanded or received from the owner of any merchandise or commodity for the use of the shores, or any wharf erected on the shores, or in or over the waters of any navigable stream, unless the same be expressly authorized by the General Assembly."

The Senate will see that it deprives riparian owners of the rents, issues, and profits of their lands, because the owners of merchandise may use wharves; and it is here provided that no wharfage, which means, of course, no compensation, is to be collected; and the same of warehouses. Some Senator has suggested to me in private conversation that these latter words, "unless the same be expressly authorized by the General Assembly," mean that if that has been done heretofore at any time the case would not be reached by this clause, and that such persons would be protected. It will be seen, however, that it is not so, but the provision exposes all riparian owners to the occupation of anybody who chooses to occupy, without the power to demand or receive compensation unless the General Assembly shall hereafter pass a law by which they may collect it. In connection with that, we have before us a memorial signed by the trustees of infants and widows, and estates of deceased persons, residing in Connecticut, New York, Michigan, and other States, showing us that at large expense they have made improvements in Mobile upon property the title to which goes back to the original acquisition of the territory, goes back to the very morning of the State and of the Territory, and that the intention of this provision of the constitution is to oust them altogether and to deprive them of their rights of property. Inasmuch as we have made the same provision I now offer as to Georgia in a like case, I think the bill should be made harmonious by inserting this amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I suppose it is not strictly in order to insert anything in the matter which has already been agreed to by the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not understand that to be so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will raise no such question.

Mr. CONKLING. The Chair may not understand exactly the form in which this comes up. I propose to add these words to the text of the bill as an amendment to come in at the end of the first section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As an addition?

Mr. CONKLING. As an addition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is in order.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the amendment is in order, because it is to add new matter which has not been passed upon; but it does seem to me that the Senator is making a great deal out of this more than is at all involved in it. This provision of the Alabama constitution does not affect contracts or property rights according to my judgment. It does not raise the question raised in the case of Georgia. I will read the clause and Senators will see the bearing of it according to the explanation made to me:

"That all navigable waters shall remain forever public highways free to the citizens of the State and of the United States, without tax, impost, or toll imposed; and that no tax, toll, impost, or wharfage shall be demanded or received from the owner of any merchandise or commodity for the use of the shores, or of any wharf erected on the shores or in or over the waters of any navigable stream, unless the same be expressly authorized by the General Assembly."

The purpose of this is to prevent the owner of land from levying on a steamboat that chooses to anchor by the shore, a tax or toll. There are navigable streams in this State of the highest importance. Obstructions might be made or improvements might be made on the banks of a river not authorized by the local law. Unquestionably the State of Alabama has supreme jurisdiction over the shores of navigable rivers within its limits. The State may not impede the navigation of a river; it cannot authorize an obstruction to a river; but it can legislate as to the banks of a river, and it may prevent wharves and buildings from being erected on the banks of a river except in pursuance of law. That is all that is required in this clause, that no citizen of Alabama shall levy a wharfage, toll, duty, or impost upon any citizen, at home or abroad, for any use of its lands, unless by authority of law.

The Senator confines the latter part of the clause to authority given hereafter by the General Assembly; but I submit that it does not bear that construction, and is not so intended. It says: "unless expressly authorized by the General Assembly." The word "authorized" includes the past as well as the future, the General Assembly of the past as well as the General Assembly of the future, and this is merely to prevent persons owning property on the banks of a navigable river from asserting exclusive rights which will interfere with the free navigation of the river and prevent steamboats landing where they choose, and to prevent them from assessing imposts, duties, and burdens of like character upon persons engaged in lawful commerce. If it means more than that, I have mistaken the clause.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If it means only that, there is no necessity for the provision, because, of course, individuals cannot get private rights as against the public right of navigation.

Mr. SHERMAN. But that is not the point. Suppose a person builds a wharf without authority of law against the policy of the State. Ought not the State to have the power to control the building of wharves and improvements along the banks of streams? This clause simply says that persons shall not do it except in pursuance of authority granted by the General Assembly.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not understand the provision to relate at all to the building of wharves, but to the collection of wharfage at wharves built.

Mr. SHERMAN. "Unless the same be expressly authorized by the General Assembly." It does seem to me that the General Assembly may, by general laws, pass rules and regulations, or even by special charters grant privileges to erect wharves along the banks of the rivers. Do you want to interfere with that right exercised by the State of Alabama? It seems to me to do that would be for Congress to supervise and control the local matters of the State of Alabama. All the objection I have to this proposition is that I do not think we ought to attach fundamental conditions to the admission of States which relate solely to unimportant matters of local legislation that may be fairly left to the General Assembly of the State.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I certainly think we ought not to interfere with the local legislation of Alabama; but if they send a constitution here which does, in direct terms, violate the Constitution of the United States, we cannot avoid interfering with it; and as I understand the provision brought to our notice by the Senator from New York, it prohibits the collection of wharfage on wharves and storehouses except as authorized by the Legislature. There may have been, and probably are, hundreds of wharves and erections over that water which have not been authorized by the Legislature, which have been erected there as a matter of common right by virtue of the right of property without any action of the Legislature on the subject; and this takes away from all these property-owners the value of their property, and prevents their collecting wharfage for it.

Besides, there is a conclusive argument against this provision of the constitution of Alabama. It is not a matter to be put into a constitution at all, but it is a matter of legislation. There is no more propriety in putting this provision in the constitution, if it is not intended to bind down the Legislature to interfering with contracts, than there is in putting the whole statute-book in the constitution.

Mr. SHERMAN. The objection now made by the Senator is extraordinary. Every constitution now contains a multitude of legislation, and the great objection to modern State constitutions is the multiplicity of legislation which they contain. That is the last objection I ever expected to hear from the Senator from New Jersey. Every provision of a constitution is a kind of legislation, and some provisions are rather minute, and almost all our modern constitutions are too minute. I never expected to hear an objection made to the admission of a State on the ground that the people of that State chose to put certain things in the form of constitutional legislation instead of the form of legal enactment.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. My friend will observe, however, that the argument is this: that it is subject to the objection that it is a violation of the Constitution of the United States, and at all events it is not necessary, because it would be equally effective in a statute if it is not in violation of the Constitution of the United States. That is my point.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not understand the Senator. I believe in leaving to the States the care of local legislation, and I am rather astonished that the Senator from New Jersey especially should make this objection, representing as he does a State that claims the power as a State to control the commerce of the United States, so that really we have not the power to pass enactments on that subject, so that no citizen of the United States can go through the State of New Jersey between the two great commercial cities of the Union without being affected by the local legislation of New Jersey. New Jersey claims the power of impeding all the commerce of the United States and doubling the expense of transportation. If New Jersey were to throw open her laws, the price of passing through New Jersey would be reduced one half.

This has been a matter of complaint for years; and the Senator from New Jersey now complains about conferring upon the people of Alabama the right to make laws in regard to the shores of their navigable rivers, to regulate the wharfage, the amount of tolls and assessments and wharf rents that their citizens shall pay.

I only desire to say that I am in favor of Congress exercising rather plenary powers; but when I commence I do not want to begin with the regulation of tolls and wharfage for wharfs on the banks of the streams in Alabama. I would rather commence with some great highway where the impediments thrown in the way of commerce are worthy of the attention of Congress. It does seem to me that we belittle the subject when we seek to attach to the admission of States fundamental conditions applicable to mere local matter, such as the rent of a wharf and the like. This provision of the constitution of Alabama may be wise or unwise; I do not know; but certainly it is a matter of local legislation in regard to the shores and the banks of their rivers with which we ought not to interfere, especially by an extraordinary provision of amendment to their constitution made by Congress now in the last stages of this debate.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I do not know that the character of New Jersey is at all involved in the discussion of a constitutional question; and I suppose the Senator from Ohio referred to New Jersey for the purpose of diverting the attention of the Senate from the subject, as he did not seem very well able to maintain the position that he had taken on the constitutional question. As to its belittling the subject, let me say, sir, that it is no little subject for the Senate of the United States to stand guardians over the constitution and say to every State that comes here with a constitution "You shall not impair the obligation of a contract;" and whether it is in a little matter or a great matter, the principle is the same. Nobody can read this provision of the constitution of Alabama without coming to the conclusion that they have undertaken to prohibit owners of wharves and other erections over navigable streams from collecting wharfage, which is directly impairing a contract.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to know what contract is involved? Who made a contract about the building of wharves in Alabama?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Nobody under the sun made a contract about building wharves, and there is nothing in the constitution about building wharves. It is about the collecting of wharfage for the use of wharves.

Mr. SHERMAN. But the Senator says the constitutional provision as to the inviolability of contracts is involved. I should like to know what contract is involved in this case. Was there a contract existing between the wharf-owners and anybody else that they should build wharves there? I am not aware of any. I suppose that they hold their wharves and other property subject to the local law of Alabama, and may be regulated and affected by the local law of Alabama. It is not a question of contract. If there is a contract, if the Senator from New Jersey will say there is a contract—

Mr. CONKLING. Most assuredly I say it.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator may say that there is an implied contract that every riparian owner may have a right to build anything he chooses on the banks of the river.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will say to the Senator that the question has been before the Supreme Court of the United States in a case coming up from the city of Mobile. When Alabama was admitted into the Union the waste lands, as they were called, were reserved to the United States, and the United States granted patents to these shore rights. The State of Alabama did the same thing, and the question arose under the conflicting patents as to who had the best title. The Supreme Court of the United States decided that Alabama had the title to these lands; that she could grant them to whomsoever she pleased, and that her patents were good. Therefore the persons who own these wharves hold under a title granted by the State of Alabama. Now, this law undertakes to say that a title granted by the State of Alabama shall be impaired, by declaring that there shall be no beneficial use or enjoyment of it. That the Supreme Court have frequently decided in other cases is a violation of the contract.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator does not go far enough. Does he show that the State of Alabama by her patent authorized them to build wharves, or is that necessarily implied from the patent?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is necessarily implied from the patent of the land down to the water, where the stream is navigable, to the shore line.

Mr. MORTON. I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont what decision the Supreme Court of the United States has ever made in regard to the right of Alabama to regulate the question of wharfage.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know that they have decided anything as to the right of Alabama to regulate the question of wharfage as to all persons. They have decided that the State of Alabama was the proprietor of these very lands, and that the State of Alabama had a right to grant them to the persons who were the subjects of these law-suits; and the Supreme Court therefore decided that the persons who owned these shore rights and had wharves upon them were lawfully entitled to hold them. Now, the State comes in by this constitution, and says that although they are lawfully entitled to hold them, and have held them for forty years, they shall not use them, but that everybody else may use them without paying for that use.

Mr. MORTON. My understanding is that the Supreme Court decided that the title to these waste or wet lands was in the State of Alabama under the act of Congress, and that the patent of Alabama was good against the title executed by anybody else, and that it goes no further than that. So far as the rights of riparian proprietors of navigable streams are concerned, those rights have always been held in part to be subject to the rights and interests of navigation.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Indiana if the State has ever claimed any other jurisdiction than that of running the boundary line between the waters navigable and the waters not navigable?

Mr. CONKLING. And removing obstructions.

Mr. HOWE. Preventing obstructions by the shore owner in that part of the stream which is navigable.

Mr. MORTON. I understand that the rights of navigation go much further than the definition given by the Senator from Wisconsin. If they go no further than that, it would be in the power of riparian owners virtually to destroy navigation, especially upon our small rivers in the interior. The subject of regulating wharfage to prevent extortion and so that the interests of commerce shall not be injured is peculiarly proper for State legislation, and I undertake to say is the subject of State legislation in almost every State where there is a navigable river.

Mr. BUCKALEW. The Senator will in a moment see that there is no question about the right of the State to regulate rights of wharfage, rights of landing, or any other rights; the question here arises upon the destruction of rights. There is the greatest possible distinction between the two things.

Mr. POMEROY. I think the framers of this constitution have put in it precisely the provision they wanted to put in, and the one that is adapted to the wants of the State of Alabama. It is known to me and I suppose to many Senators that there has been a long conflict at Mobile in regard to those rights, and that the attorney for the State is even now prosecuting the men who claim to have exclusive rights of wharfage; and the complaint grows out of the fact that they have been charging exorbitant rates and interfering with commerce, and have grown up into an immense monopoly. They claim that they are above the legislation of the State, that the Legislature cannot interfere with them, and it is a matter of grievance to the city. They have held heretofore that they got their title to this property in some way above the statute; and now the framers of this constitution have determined to bring their rights within the control of the Legislature of the State, and it ought to be there. A monopoly of this kind can so tax commerce as to almost destroy it; that is, they can put such a burden upon commerce as to become a grievous tax to the citizens of the whole State by imposing exorbitant wharfage. This monopoly has been complained of, and it is because of it that the people of Alabama have put this clause in their constitution, and we should not interfere with it. The effect of it is to put the matter into the control of the State, as it ought to be; and the people of the State of Alabama who framed this constitution will feel exceedingly grieved if we interfere, because it is relieving them of an enormous burden that they have been trying to throw off in the courts for years, and if the power is put in the hands of the Legislature of the State they can regulate it.

Mr. MORTON. It is admitted that a State has a right to regulate the question of wharfage; and if it has a right to do that, it has a right to provide that fees above a certain rate shall not be exacted; that would be a necessary part of the regulation. If it cannot make that a part of the regulation, the right to regulate amounts to nothing, as I think.

Mr. CONKLING. Allow me to ask a question for information. If this part of this constitution is stricken out, does it in the Senator's judgment at all impair in the slightest degree the right of the State to regulate the amount of wharfage, and all that?

Mr. MORTON. I suppose the fact is that the State of Alabama has not heretofore regulated that wharfage in the way it ought to have been. I have a letter in my desk complaining bitterly of the exactions that have been made at Mobile, especially on that part of the trade intended to go up the Alabama river, and saying that this clause in the constitution is necessary for the purpose of protecting commerce upon the Alabama river. It is simply a method, perhaps not a very good one, of providing that the question of wharfage shall be under the regulation of the Legislature.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I am able from information that I have received, to confirm what has been stated by the Senator from Kansas, and also the conclusions of the Senator from Indiana. I understand that there is at Mobile a margin of land between what we may call the main land and the water, which has been made. It is what we call made land; and it is on that land that the wharves are made, and from it they are run out into the water. The proprietors of that land undertake to lay exorbitant tolls, to make egregious exactions on a particular commerce, especially that, I understand, which comes from New Orleans.

Mr. MORTON. And Boston.

Mr. SUMNER. And perhaps Boston, though that is not mentioned to me by my informant; but I was told that the exactions bore particularly on ships coming from New Orleans. Whether the ships come from New Orleans or Boston is of no importance; it is enough that there are exactions made. I understand that sometimes fees amounting to several hundred dollars are demanded of ships when something very slight would have been all that was proper. The people there knowing this evil, desiring to remove it, have taken this way: they have in their constitution specifically declared that the Legislature of the State shall have jurisdiction of this matter; and now shall we undertake to interfere? Clearly not to my mind. There is an abuse, according to all the evidence, at Mobile. The question may arise, then, shall this rule be applicable to other places; why confine it to Mobile? The answer to that is that planters on the rivers may impose the same exactions; abutting, as some of their plantations may, on rivers, they may demand tolls or wharfage from steamers or vessels that stop.

Mr. CONKLING. Is it not true of other States, and why not have it in their constitutions?

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator asks me if it is not true of other States. We have no evidence that in any other State there has been an abuse. The facts show that in this State there is and has been an abuse, and here is an honest effort to meet it, and I think we ought not to interfere with the effort.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The statement made by the Senator from Kansas is quite sufficient to show that this provision ought to be stricken from this constitution. He says that tolls have been exacted at Mobile, and that the people for years have tried to get rid of those tolls by proceedings in courts, and have failed.

Mr. POMEROY. I did not mean to say that they have failed, because the matter is still in litigation. It is the exorbitant tolls they are complaining of; not any others.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I tried to state the Senator just as he stated himself; and if I did not state him correctly, of course he is understood now. Then there is a right that has been litigated in the courts of some sort, and the purpose of this constitutional provision is to strike that down. I submit to Senators, is that a proper mode of getting rid of a right thus supported in the courts? A constitutional convention is in session, and some parties that want to accomplish some dirty end perhaps go to that body when the owners of private property are not there, having no idea when a government is being established and the form of it fixed that their private rights are to be attacked in a thing of that sort, and the first they know of it they are stricken down. Now, how does this stand? It appears, according to the statement of facts, that the State of Alabama granted riparian rights, the right to the land adjoining the water. Does that give any right?

Mr. SHERMAN. Allow me to correct my friend as to that material fact, because I took pains to inquire as to the facts of a gentleman who lives in Alabama, and though he does not reside in Mobile is familiar with the facts. These wharves are built on the accretions of land outside of the land patented by the State of Alabama. They are held there on land which probably formerly was within the bounds of navigable rivers, but by the changes of time has become made land. It is covered probably by the general power of the United States; probably the title is in the United States. These wharves have been built there, and they are now levying at Mobile $600 on a vessel the wharfage of which at New Orleans would be sixty dollars. It is a source of dispute and controversy, and this provision was inserted merely to place the undoubted jurisdiction over these wharves in the Legislature of Alabama.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to ask the Senator exactly what he means. He says these wharves are on accretions. Does he mean made land or accretions?

Mr. SHERMAN. Made land outside of the old limit of the low-water mark.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the owner of the land has extended his land by filling it in, he has still that right. If it be an accretion, then it is a very clear thing that the accretion belongs to him. As rapidly as the accretions are formed the ownership goes with them.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Not necessarily.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Necessarily. I say that is the law without exception, that the man who owns the land owns the accretions.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator will allow me one moment, as he refers to the statement made by the Senator from Ohio, I will say that in the case reported in the Supreme Court in 8 Howard the court decided flatly the other way from that stated by the Senator from Ohio, that the title to the land was not in the United States, that the United States had nothing in the world to do with it, that it had been in the State of Alabama, and had passed by the grant of the State to its patentees. That was the point in judgment, and that was decided. The decision was as to the identical land we are now talking about.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then it stands adjudicated that these parties own this land. Now, I want to know of Senators if a man who has a ship on the sea has a right to load and unload upon my land without paying me anything for it. In the absence of legislation, have I not the legal right to demand of him for that use of my property a reasonable compensation?

Mr. SHERMAN. Can you obstruct navigation?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am not prepared to say whether I can entirely obstruct navigation; but it is very clear that where I own land, a man who wishes to unload his vessel on my land must pay for the use of it; and in the absence of legislative regulation of the subject I have the right to charge whatever I choose for that use, provided I charge what is reasonable. Whether in the absence of an express contract I can charge more than a quantum meruit I will not now undertake to discuss; but that I have the right to charge a man who loads and unloads his vessel on my property for that use of my property is not to be questioned. There is no doubt about that. In the absence of legislation I may make that charge; but in the interests of commerce I admit that it may be regulated by legislation, as the use of mill property may be regulated by legislation. I build my mill upon a stream that is entirely within my own lands; I back the water only to my upper line; but still the Legislature may regulate the tolls I may charge. In the absence of legislative regulation may I not charge a man that brings his grist to my mill whatever is right, and can a constitutional provision come in and say that I have no such right except as the Legislature confers it upon me? Here is the case precisely. Here are parties who own lands and have built wharves upon them. Their right to that property has been adjudicated by the Supreme Court. They have, by virtue of their ownership, and not because the Legislature has conferred it upon them, a right to charge reasonably for the use of their property. Here is a constitutional provision to strike off that right, to say that it is gone—a right that rests upon the grant of the State; for a deed is a contract, and all that follows that deed is secured by the contract. Whatever I may claim under my deed is secured by the contract. The State having granted it to these parties they have, under the contract, the right to charge reasonably for the use of their property. This constitutional provision undertakes to strike down that granted right, and to say that the right no longer shall rest upon the contract and upon the grant, but that it shall rest upon legislative will. I ask Senators if that can be done. I undertake to say that there is dirt inside of this effort with somebody. It may be that the proprietors have charged too much. That can be regulated any day by the Legislature. There is no difficulty in that; but to say by a constitutional provision that my right to charge, which rests in the grant, shall be stricken down, and it shall then rest only in legislative will, is a palpable violation of a contract.

Mr. MORTON. It is very obvious, from the reference made to the suits that have been instituted in regard to this matter, and from the complaints coming from Alabama, that there is some great grievance there to be remedied, and they have undertaken to do it in this constitution. Now, sir, the question of wharfage is a matter that is peculiarly within the control of the Legislature. I undertake to say that no riparian proprietor has any right, or can acquire any right that is inimical to the general commerce of the country. Therefore, inasmuch as there are conflicting rights and conflicting interests, while his interests are to be protected, there is the greater interest of the country and of commerce to be protected also. Therefore it is that the regulation of that may be placed properly in the Legislature; and that is all, substantially, that this provision attempts to do. It is not like the question of taking away the right to recover debts, the question of repudiation, in direct and palpable violation of the provision of the Constitution of the United States; but the most that can be claimed against it is, that it is a question of the violation of a private right; but a right so intimately connected with the public rights that you cannot distinguish between them without selecting some third party as the proper arbiter and disposer. It simply says that these wharf rates or tolls shall not be collected except upon arrangement or authority of the Legislature; in other words, the whole authority is devolved upon the Legislature, where it properly belongs; and it is not a matter of such magnitude, or a matter involving such a constitutional question, that we may take hold of it here.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, we seem to be lost here in a very strange confusion, on one side or the other, about this matter. The honorable Senator from Ohio tells us that there is no obligation of contract to be impaired here. I should have more faith in that declaration of his if he had not told us the same thing in regard to Georgia, and if the Senate had not by an overwhelming vote decided against him in regard to that.

Now, let us see, stripping this of everything except the admitted facts which we can comprehend in one moment, what this case is. Here are men in Mobile, the patentees, as we have the evidence before us, from the State of Alabama of these identical lands—not some others, but the very lands with regard to which the Senator from Kansas makes his statement. We have repeated decisions of the Supreme Court, and one which has been referred to here at length for another purpose, holding that the United States has no right of eminent domain or privilege of interference whatever with these lands; but that they fall exclusively within the municipal and State jurisdiction; and that the State of Alabama has divested herself absolutely of these lands by granting them to the patentees. Now, the Senator from Ohio asks, where is the contract in this transaction? Why, sir, has not the court decided frequently that every grant is a contract? And when these people received by grant the lands covered by the grant did they not take them exempt from every possible incumbrance excepting one? What incumbrance rested upon them except the common law concomitant, that every man must use his own so as not to injure another? Except as to that, they took them absolutely against all comers.

But, says the honorable Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORRIS] wharfage, being an appendage of commerce, is, as to regulation, within the power of the State. Yes, sir; and there, as the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] suggested, arises the double hardship in this case. If I am a mill owner I have a right to say to him, "I do not receive your grist; I do not treat you as one of my customers;" but if I am a riparian owner upon the banks of a public highway used as a navigable stream I am subject, without any provision of this sort, to regulations as to commerce and wharfage falling within the jurisdiction of the State; and therefore it is that I cannot fence against the incidents of commerce; therefore it is that my shores are liable to be used; and therefore is the monstrosity of this provision, not only as to wharves, but as to shores, that no man anywhere in the State of Alabama, a riparian owner, shall exact, nor shall it be lawful for him to receive, any compensation whatever for any use which may be made of the shores of that stream. And we are arguing here the question whether that invades the sanctity of a contract or not! To convey a man his farm and then put in the fundamental law that he shall be robbed at the pleasure of every passer-by of the rents, issues, and profits of it, and be without remedy! Why, sir, I say, with great deference to gentlemen, that it is monstrous, a thing the parallel of which cannot be found in the jurisprudence of any country that has written laws.

"The right to regulate wharfage!" Yes, sir; but has this provision anything to do with that? As the Senator from Pennsylvania well and unanswerably says, strike out this provision of the constitution and that whole power remains intact, the same power that the State of New York has and every other State, not one of them having a provision like this in its constitution. Does any one doubt that?

We are told that $600 are charged where something less should be charged. Why does not the Legislature regulate it? Obstructions to commerce, the Senator from Ohio says, may be interposed. Does this tend to remove them? Not in the slightest degree; but the shores—not made land, if there was any distinction there, which there is not—the shores of every stream in the State of Alabama shall be open without let or hindrance to every passer by, and no man can maintain his action quare clausum fregit. That is the proposition. I say it is monstrous, and I say with some zeal, speaking in the name of constituents of my own who are memorialists here, that it is doubly monstrous for another reason; and what is that? It is that the Senate has notice served upon it by these memorialists, respectfully, that there are rights in litigation, as the Senator from Kansas stated, that the courts have decided that the patentees are entitled; that an appeal has been taken to the national courts in a suit in which a perpetual injunction is prayed; that a fictitious title is set up here unfairly and in fraud of their rights, as they say; and that, pending that controversy, just there, when an appeal was to be taken to the Federal courts, unexpectedly and in a manner well warranting my friend from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] in saying that it is suspicious and suggestive of foul play, there is foisted into this constitution what the doctors would call a foreign substance, a thing which does not look like the fly in amber, although it is equally extraordinary that it should be here, but it looks far less interesting than that, and which I say is suggestive not only of bad faith, but, in my humble judgment, never could have been put here for any reason that the ingenuity of man can suggest, looking to the public interest or to any thing under heaven, except enabling some private party to snatch by illicit process from the courts the questions which properly pertain to them.

Mr. President, a friend, whom I do not see, a member of this body, said in joke a suggestive thing to me a few moments ago. He said, "We are going to examine the particulars of this bill when we get home." We are not doing it here, but we are going to examine it particularly when we get home before a different tribunal; and I think we may as well bear in mind that we ourselves, if nobody else, when this is all over, will look at this legislation, without regard to the fact that the hour of eight o'clock came before we went home to dinner; we shall look at it as it will stand; and I think there are risks enough involved necessarily in this legislation without carrying any more. And as I am upon that point I will say that I expect to vote for this bill, and I do it with great trepidation; I do it with great doubt whether it is not a mistake in the very best form in which we can put it.

But however that may be, I say again, do not let us put into it, unnecessarily, indefensible things. Here is a provision which stands out as clear as a sunbeam in violation of the Constitution of the United States; and the provision we have inserted with regard to Georgia is mere usurpation, as I understand the law, unless the right and the duty pertain to us to put the seal of condemnation upon this. It does not strike at personal property merely; it does not strike at debts merely; but it is just as vicious and just as wanting in the elements of constitutionality as if it said that no rent should hereafter be collected for any farm in the State of Alabama unless the Legislature by special grant conferred the right to do it. What, in the name of conscience, has the Legislature to do with this, I should like to know? The Legislature to confer upon me that right which makes my house my castle! The Legislature to give me as a donation, a benefaction, the right to hold and use and enjoy that which by the common law, and the civil law, older than that, and the jurisprudence of every civilized nation, pertains to me for reasons going behind all legislative action! Sir, unless we are going to run a plowshare over the foundations of government, unless we are going to obliterate all settled distinctions, and sow the place where they were with salt, that they need not spring again, let us come back, although it is the great subject of reconstruction in which we are engaged, to those homely doctrines, those practical matters of sense which have gone unchallenged thus far in the history of our country.

Now, Mr. President, I do not mean to be zealous or warm about this.

Mr. HOWE. I think you have been.

Mr. CONKLING. If I have been, I beg pardon of my friend from Wisconsin, who never allows himself to get unduly zealous.

Mr. HOWE. It is granted.

Mr. CONKLING. But this constitution, as was said by the Senator from Vermont, was made a part of what we are doing, unexpectedly to the Judiciary Committee. There has been a great deal to examine on these subjects, a great many constitutions to read; and although my diligence has been less than that of any other member of the committee, I presume, I have endeavored to understand as well as I could what there was in this subject. My attention was called to this particular matter after the prospect became imminent that Alabama would be included in the bill; and a variety of facts have been stated to me which I have not stated here, and which I do not propose to state, going to show the truth of the suspicion which strikes the minds of Senators on this point. There are many persons who signed this memorial, and other persons from whom I have received letters, who say that it is not only a hardship but a naked piece of piracy, a bold piece of theft, waged against the estates of dead men and the possessions of minor children and of widows. Therefore I think it contains all the elements which commended to our attention similar provisions in the constitution of Georgia, and moral ingredients besides, which call loudly upon the Senate to put upon it the seal of its disapprobation.

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. President, this provision in the constitution of Alabama seems to me to be a very remarkable one. In all my knowledge of commercial transactions I have never heard or seen such a preposterous proposition. Here were certain low lands granted to private individuals. Those lands, which were probably worthless originally, have been improved by those individuals. I presume cargoes could not have landed there without such improvements, and perhaps the grants were made with the understanding that those receiving them should make these wharves. Having invested their money and improved the city in such a manner that commerce can be accommodated, can it be possible that the Legislature can take away the privileges heretofore granted without restriction? If the Legislature of the State or the authorities of the city desire to impose a restriction, the time to have done that was when the lands were granted. If they have made a mistake in that respect, it seems to me their only remedy is in promoting competition in other portions of the city or in building up other portions of the city, where similar accommodations can be had.

Sir, I have heard a great deal of this cry about corporations and individuals that had extraordinary rights. When they have been successful, there are always plenty of people to cry them down and attempt to get possession of their property and vested rights. If the people of Alabama, by a constitutional provision, can disturb the rights that have been granted to these people for years, perhaps fifty years, if they can sweep away all those vested rights, and say that they shall be entirely done away with, and this wharf property shall belong to the State hereafter, and there shall be no tolls charged unless the State thinks proper to allow them, they can vest those rights, and give that property to the city, and allow them to charge just such prices as they choose.

If I had invested $100,000 in Mobile, Alabama, upon a wharf, without any restriction from the State or the government of the city, I should like to know whether the State would have the right to say that that property should be taken away from me, or that my vested rights should be done away without any compensation whatever. If the State has a right to fix the wharfage there, if it has a right to regulate it at all, it has a right to make it one cent a ton. If these persons have their rights without any conditions from the city I do not see any help for the people of that city. So far as the right to land goods upon the shores is concerned, every man has a right to low-water mark to the shore to his land, as I have always understood; and if a person desires to land goods upon it he must get permission, the right of way through the fields of that owner in order to convey those goods from the shore, or otherwise he has got to go to the nearest town or place where there is a landing, where there is a wharf, and haul his goods down there.

That is reasonable and right. I see no injustice in it. Otherwise, if a man has no control over his shore along the river to low-water mark, you might drive through his fields and destroy his crops; you could annoy him in many ways. As I have always understood, every man has control of his shores to the low-water mark. It seems to me that this provision in the constitution of Alabama is a monstrous proposition, as the Senator from New York states, and I certainly shall vote for his amendment. It seems to me right and proper.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask for the yeas and nays upon it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WILLIAMS rose.

Several SENATORS. Let us vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, certain Senators, after they have made speeches, are very impatient when another Senator proposes to speak upon the subject. I do not propose to tax the patience of the Senate; but I desire simply to remark that this question has been argued upon an assumed state of facts, for which there is no proof before the Senate. The persons who were elected to the constitutional convention of the State of Alabama may be supposed to be intelligent and honest men, and we have no right to conclude that they were dishonest and disposed to violate the Constitution of the United States, and that all virtue has come to be concentrated in this particular body of men. The men who represented the people of Alabama in that convention knew what the facts were in this case, and we do not. One man gets up here and makes a statement, and another man makes a contradictory statement, and we propose to strike down a provision of the constitution of Alabama that has been submitted to and approved by the people upon a supposed state of facts, of which every one of us is ignorant, proceeding upon mere surmises or mere conjectures that there may be something wrong about this section of the constitution.

Sir, it may be that there is a monopoly formed there in the city of Mobile or elsewhere in the State of Alabama that is crushing out by its exorbitant exactions the commerce of the State, and that Alabama is made, like Ireland, the victim of non-residents. It is not improbable, from what the honorable Senator from New York has said, that such is the fact; for he appears here, he says, in his zeal to strike out this section of the constitution, for citizens who live in the State of New York, persons who have no interest in Alabama but to impose exactions upon the people, and fleece them through monopolies and combinations without regard to their interests or their welfare. This is possible; I do not say it is the fact. But, sir, it is possible that this provision is right and just and necessary to protect the commerce of that State; and it only amounts in substance in giving to the Legislature the authority to regulate the subject.

Mr. President, we had a very elaborate argument the other day from the Senator from New York to show that Congress had no power to impose a fundamental condition upon the admission of a State, and now he proposes to impose a most extraordinary fundamental condition upon Alabama.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg the Senator's pardon. I would not interrupt him if he did not, unintentionally no doubt, misstate me. My argument the other day was, that Congress had power to impose conditions in those cases where the Constitution of the United States was violated; and I stated my reasons for it; but I argued against the ability to impose others. I only ask the Senator not to misstate my position.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not pay particular attention to the distinctions which the Senator made, but I know that his argument was very elaborate against the proposition then before the Senate, to attach a fundamental condition to the admission of the State of Arkansas. But assuming that such was his position, who is altogether certain that this particular section is in violation of the Constitution of the United States? What clause of the Constitution of the United States prohibits this section of the constitution of the State of Alabama? I know it is said that private property may not be taken for public use without just compensation; but that applies to Federal legislation, and not to State legislation. I am not advised that there is any one provision of the Constitution of the United States with which this section is in conflict, or so clearly in conflict as to make it altogether certain that a court would decide it to be unconstitutional. I say it is a doubtful question; and I am surprised to see Senators here who have been so long and so earnestly contending for the rights of the people, and denying to Congress the power to control the people in the formation of their constitutions and the establishment of their State governments, now taking the ground that Congress may go into a State constitution that has been formed by a convention and approved by the people and regulate its different provisions, as though Congress was making the constitution for the people, regulating the subject of wharfrage, regulating the subject of tolls, and doing it by putting into the act admitting the State a fundamental condition.

Sir, if this subject of fundamental conditions is to be made ridiculous in the eyes of the nation, do so by putting into a solemn act admitting a State an irrevocable condition, one that is to stand all through time and bind all generations, that the "sovereign State," as my friends on the other side delight to call the different States of the Union—the sovereign State of Alabama shall never control or regulate the wharves on its rivers or tolls upon its streams. But, sir, I do not wish to occupy time upon it.

Mr. HOWARD. I have but a word to say on this subject. I question very much the constitutionality of that particular clause in the Alabama constitution referred to by the Senator from New York; but I do not think that the Senate is very properly constituted to settle such a question as that in reference to the navigable streams of Alabama. I am not prepared to say whether it is or is not constitutional, nor am I prepared to say whether the State of Alabama, with all its sovereign power, is competent to impose regulations upon the owners of lands fronting on navigable streams. I very much doubt it, for the reasons stated by the honorable Senator from New York. But both these questions are really such as more properly become a court of justice to decide than the Senate of the United States. I hope, therefore, that we shall leave them to be settled by the courts where all parties in interest can be heard by their counsel, by their witnesses, and the matter properly and finally adjusted according to law.

There is another view, sir. Suppose we adopt the condition which is presented by the honorable Senator from New York. I fear when that question comes before the Legislature of Alabama it will be one that will attract the attention of that Legislature for a very considerable time. There has been a great deal of debate about it here, and I have no doubt there will be a great deal more in the Legislature of Alabama when it shall assemble, and that, instead of acting promptly upon the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution, which we want to secure above all things else, they will spend a fortnight or three weeks, or perhaps six weeks in discussing this wharfrage business and riparian rights; and thus the great end which I have in view, which is the adoption of the fourteenth amendment, will be defeated.

I hope, sir, that the amendment of the honorable Senator from New York will not be adopted for the reasons which I have given. It is a judicial question, to be heard and determined upon the evidence and upon the law before a court and jury regularly constituted, and I will not undertake to adjudicate it in this form here.

Mr. COLE. I do not think we can get much further along with this debate to-night, and I rose for the purpose of moving an adjournment. ["No!" "No!"]

Mr. SUMNER. Let us take the vote on the pending amendment, and then adjourn.

Several SENATORS. No, no; let us sit it out to-night.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New York, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 16, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Conkling, Corbett, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Howe, McCreery, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Nye, Patterson of Tennessee, Ross, and Vickers—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Chandler, Cole, Conness, Cragin, Drake, Ferry, Harlan, Howard, Morton, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Saulsbury, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Van Winkle, Wade, Wiley, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—23.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Cameron, Cattell, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Fowler, Grimes, Henderson, Johnson, Norton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Sprague, and Trumbull—15.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to make a slight addition to the amendment that I offered, and which was adopted in committee. I suppose there will be no objection to it. It is simply explanatory. I ask the Clerk to read it.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the amendment adopted on motion of Mr. WILLIAMS the following words, "unless relieved from disability as provided in said amendment," meaning the fourteenth article.

Several SENATORS. That is right.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time.

Mr. SUMNER. There are several Senators who wish to address the Senate on some of the general propositions involved in this important bill. It is now late. I think the Senate would not ask them to proceed to-night. I may mention that I am one. I have been in my seat since twelve o'clock, and I have not had a morsel of food since early morning. I am not, therefore, in a condition to enter into an extended discussion. My friend, the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. YATES,] I know, desires to address the Senate also, and I believe there are other Senators; and, under the circumstances, I think that I shall not make a mistake if I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before putting the question on that motion, the Chair will lay before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope that will not be done. The motion to adjourn is the only thing in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This communication ought to be laid before the Senate and referred to a committee.

Mr. CONNESS. What is the rule on the subject?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule is that the Chair may lay these things before the Senate when he pleases. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONNESS. I desire to be correct about this. Do I understand the Chair to say that the rule is that the Chair may lay these communications before the Senate when he pleases?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the rule laid down in the books. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONNESS. Very well, sir.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of War, communicating a letter from Major General Sheridan, recommending the insertion of a clause in the anticipated ratification of a treaty lately concluded with the Osage Indians requiring the Leavenworth, Lawrence, and Galveston Railroad Company, for reasons stated therein, to extend their road from Leavenworth City to the military post of Fort Leavenworth; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 1212) to relieve certain citizens of Arkansas of disabilities was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPRESENTATION OF SOUTHERN STATES.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1058) to admit the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, and Alabama to representation in Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. FERRY. I call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 19, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cole, Davis, Hendricks, Howard, McCreery, Morgan, Nye, Patterson of Tennessee, Ross, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sumner, Thayer, Vickers, Wade, Wilson, and Yates—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Chandler, Conkling, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Drake, Edmunds, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Howe, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Stewart, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wiley, and Williams—21.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Cameron, Cattell, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Fowler, Grimes, Henderson, Johnson, Morrill of Maine, Norton, Patterson of New Hampshire, and Sprague—14.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. YATES obtained the floor.

Mr. ANTHONY. With the permission of the Senator from Illinois, and with the unanimous consent of the Senate, I should like to make a suggestion. I think that if an agreement could be arrived at now that a vote shall be taken to-morrow at a certain hour fixed we might adjourn, very much to the convenience of the Senate, and without much interruption to the public business. If it shall be agreed that the vote shall be taken to-morrow at four o'clock it will give a chance to those who desire to speak to be heard.

Mr. TRUMBULL. How can you make such an agreement when so many speeches are to be made?

Mr. ANTHONY. We can make such an agreement, if it shall be unanimously assented to, with the understanding that the Senator who has charge of the bill shall have the closing speech. That has been done many times since I have been a member of the body; there has been an agreement arrived at that at a certain hour fixed the Senator having charge of the bill should take the floor and at the close of his speech the vote be taken. If that can be agreed upon now, it will give our friends who desire to speak an opportunity to be heard in a better part of the day.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think as we have stayed to this hour, we had better dispose of the bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will stay if the Senator who has charge of the bill says so.

Mr. CONNESS. I trust we shall go on with our business. The question has been submitted and decided.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. HENDRICKS and others called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. YATES. Mr. President, I shall not speak to-night. I have refrained from speaking for the last two days in order to expedite the bill, with the hope that I might have an opportunity to address the Senate on the question of its final passage. I might have spoken heretofore if I had desired to thrust myself on the Senate; but I preferred to expedite the bill, and hence I refrained from speaking until the bill should be on its passage.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I think we had better make an arrangement about this matter, and have it understood that the vote shall be taken to-morrow.

Mr. SUMNER and others. That is the best way.

Mr. WILSON. I understand that my colleague and the Senator from Illinois have carefully prepared remarks on this bill, and desire to speak. It may be that some one may wish to reply to them, and therefore I propose that we reach an understanding that the vote shall be taken to-morrow.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I beg to suggest that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. DAVIS] has given us notice that he wishes to be heard.

Mr. WILSON. Let it be understood that we give to-morrow to debate on this bill, and close the debate to-morrow.

Mr. ANTHONY. Unless there can be some hour fixed to-morrow when we shall take the vote, we may as well take it to-night at twelve o'clock as to-morrow night at twelve. If Senators will agree that the debate shall close at four o'clock to-morrow, and that at that time the Senator from Illinois, who has charge of the bill, [Mr. TRUMBULL,] shall be entitled to the floor, and that at the conclusion of his remarks the vote shall be taken, I think we may agree to oblige our friends, whom we all wish to oblige, and conduce to our own comfort. If, however, there is to be no hour fixed for taking the vote to-morrow, but we are to go on without any security that we shall not have to take it at one or two o'clock in the morning, we may as well take it to-night.

Mr. CONNESS. I simply wish to say that there will be abundant opportunity for Senators to make speeches when the veto to this bill comes in, which is morally certain. I hope that, since we have worked so long upon this bill to the exclusion of other business, Senators will consent to vote on it to-night. There will be abundant opportunity for discussion hereafter on the main proposition.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think it is very unreasonable that the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Massachusetts should not be allowed to be heard on this subject. I have not quite so much sympathy for the Senator from Massachusetts, inasmuch as I understood him to say some time ago that a lawyer ought to be able to commence speaking at ten o'clock in the morning and speak until six o'clock in the evening. [Laughter.]

Mr. SUMNER. It is past six now.

Mr. HENDRICKS. But inasmuch as he is connected with gentlemen who have not the same powers of endurance, I think it is but reasonable to adjourn; and I do not see why we cannot all agree to take the vote at four o'clock to-morrow. It is reasonable. We generally extend this sort of courtesy to one another, and I should dislike to see it refused to any Senator. I know I should expect it if I asked for it.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I have only to say, in the spirit in which the Senator from Rhode Island made his suggestion, that voting against this adjournment and insisting upon remaining here is one of the most unpleasant incidents which have occurred to me since I have been in the Senate. I have been appealed to quite strongly by one or two Senators who wish to speak, and who seem to misunderstand entirely my vote, and I beg to explain to them in the presence of the whole Senate why it is that I did not do what, with some feeling, one or two of them seem to think I should have done.

I agree with the Senator who has this bill in charge, and who has attempted in vain on two or three days to induce the Senate to remain here and dispose of it, to remain on this occasion to do it; and I beg to say to those Senators that I did it in ignorance of the fact that they wished to be heard upon the bill. I did know that they contemplated addressing the Senate, but I did not know that they contemplated doing it or attached importance to doing it upon this particular bill. I beg to say to them that I made the agreement I did in ignorance of their wishes; and that in voting as I did I stand by that understanding. At the same time I am very glad that the Senator from Rhode Island, with his usual good nature and politeness, is seeking to get some arrangement which will be satisfactory to everybody.

Mr. MORTON. If the Senate had been informed this afternoon, at the usual time of adjournment, that there were Senators desirous to make speeches which would occupy four or five hours, the Senate would have adjourned and we could have went home. I have stayed here until this hour with much physical difficulty and suffering for the purpose of taking a vote on this bill. Now, Mr. President, I shall be glad to hear the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Illinois. I know their ability, and I understand something about the subject on which they are going to speak; and I am not willing for one that any arrangement shall be made that the vote shall be taken at four o'clock or five o'clock to-morrow afternoon. From what I understand will be the course of discussion to be pursued by one or both of these distinguished Senators, there will be some here—and not a few I imagine—who will desire to reply to them. Their doctrines will not be allowed to pass the Senate unchallenged. I have no objection to adjourning now, but not with the understanding that certain speeches are to be delivered to-morrow, and that then the Senate is to adjourn or the vote to be taken, denying to others the privilege of replying if they should desire to do so.

Mr. FERRY. Mr. President, my anxiety to get to a vote upon this bill to-night grows out of the intelligence which every morning's mail brings me from these southern States. Not a mail comes, not a morning paper comes to my room that does not contain accounts of murders and outrages being perpetrated; and we of the Senate of the United States, ready to take a vote and ready to pass this bill, are asked to adjourn over for the purpose of hearing further speeches upon the side which is sure to prevail if a vote is taken to-night. I hope, for the sake of the suffering citizens of this country in the southern States, that we may take the vote to-night.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I do not think the passage of this bill will arrest any of the murders and violence that the honorable Senator from Connecticut mentions. On the contrary, if it has any effect in that direction, I believe it will increase them. But this is a very important measure, and it does not seem to me that an undue or an unseemly amount of time has been consumed upon it. A measure of more importance in its effects has not come up to be acted on by the Senate. If the Senate should take all day to-morrow, and until this time in the evening to-morrow, to dispose of this important measure, it would not be a waste of time. I think the Senate ought to adjourn to give the gentlemen who wish to debate the measure such further time to do so as they, in their discretion, may choose to use.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I suppose there is no difficulty in coming to an understanding that some time to-morrow or to-morrow evening we shall vote. Does any Senator object to that? With that sort of understanding I think we might well adjourn; and therefore I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. CONNESS. Upon that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FERRY. I suggest that there has been no business since the last vote on a motion to adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana that the Senate do now adjourn, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 16, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cole, Davis, Hendricks, Howard, McCreery, Morgan, Patterson of Tennessee, Ross, Saulsbury, Sumner, Thayer, Vickers, Wade, Wilson, and Yates—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Chandler, Conkling, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Drake, Edmunds, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Howe, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Stewart, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, and Williams—24.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Cameron, Cattell, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Fowler, Grimes, Henderson, Johnson, Norton, Patterson of New Hampshire, and Sprague—16.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass? and upon this question the Senator from Illinois [Mr. YATES] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. YATES. Mr. President, I do not feel inclined to speak to the Senate to-night. I could not, at this time, be heard with any pleasure by the members of the Senate or any satisfaction to myself. As I have before stated, I have purposely refrained from speaking heretofore in order to expedite the passage of this bill. I have refrained from speaking on the amendments with the expectation that I should be heard on the passage of the bill. Of course I shall not trespass on the time of the Senate at this hour.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the Senator will yield to me I will move that the Senate adjourn to meet at ten o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is not in order. The hour of adjournment is fixed by the rule, and cannot be changed by a simple motion in this way unless by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks the motion is in order. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana, that the Senate do now adjourn to meet at ten o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. SUMNER. What I have to say to-day will be confined to a single topic. I shall speak of the validity and necessity of fundamental conditions on the admission of States into the body of the Nation; passing in review objections founded on the asserted Equality of States and also founded on a misinterpretation of the power to determine the "qualifications" of electors, and that other power to make "regulations" for the election of certain officers. Here I shall encounter the familiar pretensions of another time, no longer put forth by defiant slave-masters, but retailed by conscientious Senators, who think they are supporting the Constitution, when they are only echoing the voice of slavery.

Fundamental conditions on the admission of States are older than our Constitution: for they appear in the Ordinance for the vast territory of the Northwest, adopted anterior to the Constitution itself. In that Ordinance there are various conditions, of perpetual obligation, as articles of compact. Among these is the famous prohibition of slavery. In the early days of our Nation, nobody thought of questioning the validity of these conditions. Scattered efforts were made to carry slavery into some portions of this region, and, unquestionably, there were sporadic cases, as in Massachusetts itself; but the Ordinance stood firm and unimpeached.

One assurance of its authority will be found in the historic fact that in 1820, on the admission of Missouri as a State of the Union, there was a further provision that in all territory of the United States north of 36° 30' north latitude, "Slavery and involuntary servitude, otherwise than in the punishment of crimes, whereof the parties shall have been duly convicted, shall be and hereby is FOREVER PROHIBITED." This was the famous Missouri compromise. Missouri was admitted as a State without any restriction of slavery, and all the outlying territory west and north was subjected to this condition forever. It will be observed that the condition was in no respect temporary; but that it was "forever," thus outlasting any territorial Government and constituting a fundamental law, irrevocable through all time. Surely this condition, perpetual in form, would not have been introduced had it been supposed to be inoperative—had it been regarded as a sham and not a reality. This statute, therefore, testifies to the judgment of Congress at that time.

It was only at a later day, and at the demand of slavery, that the validity of the great Ordinance of Freedom was called in question. Mr. Webster, in his memorable debate with Mr. Hayne in 1830, vindicated this measure in language worthy of the cause and of himself, giving to it a palm among the laws by which civilization has been advanced, and asserting its enduring character:

"We are accustomed, sir, to praise the lawgivers of antiquity; we help to perpetuate the fame of Solon and Lycurgus; but I doubt whether one single law of any lawgiver, ancient or modern, has produced effects of more distinct, marked, and lasting character than the ordinance of 1787. It fixed forever the character of the population in the vast regions north-west of the Ohio, by excluding from them involuntary servitude. It impressed on the soil itself, while it was yet a wilderness, an incapacity to sustain any other than freemen. It laid the interdiction against personal servitude, in original compact, not only deeper than all local laws, but deeper also than all local constitutions."—Webster's Works, vol. 3, p. 284.

Words of greater beauty and power cannot be found anywhere in the writings or speeches of this orator. It would be difficult to declare the perpetual character of this original interdiction more completely. The language is as picturesque as truthful. Deeper than all local law, deeper than all local constitutions, is this fundamental law; and such is its essential quality, that the soil which it protects cannot sustain any other than freemen. Of such a law the orator naturally proceeded to say:

"We see its consequences at this moment, and we shall never cease to see them, perhaps, while the Ohio shall flow."—Ibid.

In these last words the value of such a law is declared. It is for prevention, which is an essential object of all law. In this case it is the more important, as the evil to be prevented is the most comprehensive of all.

Therefore, on the authority of Mr. Webster, in harmony with reason also, do I say, that this original condition was not only perpetual in character, but beneficial also. It was beneficence in perpetuity.

Mr. Chase, in his admirable argument before the Supreme Court of the United States, in the Van Zandt case, is hardly behind Mr. Webster in homage to this Ordinance or in a sense of its binding character. In his opinion it is a compact of perpetual obligation:

"I know not that history records a sublimer act. The United American States, having just brought their perilous struggle for freedom and independence to a successful issue, proceeded to declare the terms and conditions on which their vacant territory might be settled and organized into States; and these terms were: not tribute, not render of service, not subordination of any kind; but the perpetual maintenance of the genuine principles of American liberty, declared to be incompatible with slavery; and that these principles might be inviolably maintained, they were made the articles of a solemn covenant between the original States, then the proprietors of the territory and responsible for its future destiny, and the people and the States who were to occupy it. Every settler within the territory, by the very act of settlement, became a party to this compact, bound by its perpetual obligations, and entitled to the full benefits of its excellent provisions for himself and his posterity. No subsequent act of the original States could affect it, without his consent. No act of his, nor of the people of the territory, nor of the States established within it, could affect it, without the consent of the original States."

According to these words, which I am sure would not be disowned by the present Chief Justice of the United States, the Ordinance is a sublime act, having for its object nothing less than the perpetual maintenance of the genuine principles of American liberty. In form it is a compact, unalterable except by the consent of the parties, and, therefore, forever.

If anything in our history was settled by original authority, supported by tradition and time, it was the binding character of the Ordinance for the government of the Northwest Territory. Nobody presumed to call it in question, until at last Slavery flung down its challenge to everything that was settled for Freedom. The great Ordinance, with its prohibition of slavery, was not left unassailed.

All this makes a strange eventful passage of history. The enlightened civilization of the age was beginning to be felt against slavery, when its representatives turned madly round to confront the angel of light. The madness showed itself by degrees. Point by point, it made itself manifest in Congress. The slave-masters forgot morals, history, and the Constitution. Their manifold pretensions resolved themselves into three, in which the others were absorbed; first, that slavery, instead of an evil to be removed, was a blessing to be preserved; secondly, that the right of petition could not be exercised against slavery; thirdly, that in all that concerns slavery State Rights were everything, while National Rights were nothing. These three pretensions entered into Congress, like so many devils, and possessed it. The first broke forth in eulogies of slavery and even in blandishments for the slave trade. The second broke forth in the "Atherton gag," under which the honest, earnest petitions, from the national heart, against slavery, even in the District of Columbia, were tabled without reference, and the great right of petition, promised by the Constitution, became a dead letter. The third, beginning with the denial of the power of the Nation to affix upon new States the perpetual condition of Human Rights, broke forth in the denial of the power of the Nation over slavery in the Territories or anywhere else, even within the national jurisdiction. These three pretensions all had a common origin, and one was as offensive and unreasonable as the other. The praise of slavery and the repudiation of the right of petition by the enraged slave-masters was not worse than the pretension of State Rights against the power of the Nation to prohibit slavery in the national jurisdiction, or to affix righteous conditions upon new States.

The first two pretensions have disappeared. These two devils have been cast out. Nobody dares to praise slavery; nobody dares to deny the right of petition. The third pretension has disappeared, only so far as it denied the power of the Nation over slavery in the Territories; and we are still doomed to hear, in the name of State Rights, the old cry against conditions upon new States. This devil is not yet entirely cast out. Pardon me if I insist upon putting the national rights over the Territories and the national rights over new States before their admission in the same category. These rights not only go together; but they are one and the same. They are not merely companion and cognate; but they are identical. The one is necessarily involved in the other. Prohibition in the Territories is prolonged in conditions upon new States. The Ordinance of 1787, which is the great example, asserts the perpetuity of all its prohibitions; and this is the rule alike of law and statesmanship. Vain were its prohibitions, if they fell dead in presence of the State government. The pretension is too irrational. The Missouri act takes up the rule asserted in the Ordinance, and declares that, in certain territories, slavery shall be prohibited forever. A territorial existence, terminating in a State government is a short-lived forever. Only by recognizing the power of the Nation over the States formed out of the Territory can this forever have a meaning above the prattle of childhood or the vaunt of Bombastes.

The whole pretension against the proposed condition is in the name of State Rights; but it cannot be doubted that it may be traced directly to slavery. Shall the pretension be allowed to prevail, now that slavery has disappeared? The principal has fallen; why preserve the incident? The wrong guarded by this pretension has yielded; why should not the pretension yield also? Asserting as I now do the validity and necessity of the proposed condition, I would not seem indifferent to the rights of the States in those proper spheres appointed for them. Unquestionably States have rights under the Constitution, which we are bound to respect; nay more, which are a source of strength and advantage. It is through the States that the people everywhere govern themselves, and our Nation is saved from a central domination. Here is the appointed function of the States. They supply the machinery of local self-government for the convenience of life, while they ward off the attempts of an absorbing imperialism. But there can be no State Rights against Human Rights. Because a State, constituting part of a Nation dedicated to Human Rights, may govern itself and supply the machinery of local self-government, it does not follow that such a State may deny Human Rights within its borders. State Rights, when properly understood, are entirely consistent with the maintenance of Human Rights by the Nation. The State is not humbled when it receives the mandate of the Nation to do no wrong; nor can the Nation err when it asserts everywhere within its borders the imperialism of Human Rights. Against this righteous supremacy all pretensions of States must disappear as darkness before the King of Day.

The song of State Rights has for its constant refrain the asserted Equality of the States. Is it not strange that words so constantly employed, as a cover for pretensions against Human Rights, cannot be found in the Constitution? It is true, that by the laws of nations, all sovereign States, great or small, are equal; but this principle has been extended without authority to States created by the Nation and made a part of itself. There is but one active provision in the Constitution which treats the States as equal, and this provision shows how this very Equality may be waived. Every State, large or small, has two Senators, and the Constitution places this Equality of States under its safeguard by providing that "no State without its consent shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate." But this very text contains what lawyers might call a "negative pregnant," being a negation of the right to change this rule, with an affirmation that it may be changed. The State with its consent may be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate. And this is the whole testimony of the Constitution to that Equality of States, which is now asserted in derogation of all compacts or conditions. It is startling to find how constantly the obvious conclusions from the text of the Constitution have been overlooked. Even in the contemplation of the Constitution itself, a State may waive its equal suffrage in the Senate, so as to be represented by a single Senator only. Of course, all this must depend on its own consent, in concurrence with the Nation. Nothing is said of the manner in which this consent may be given or accepted by the Nation. But if this important limitation can in any way be made the subject of agreement or compact, pray, sir, where will you stop? What other power or prerogative of the State may not be limited also, especially where there is nothing in the Constitution against any such limitation? All this I adduce, simply by way of illustration. There is no question now of any limitation in the just sense of this term. A condition in favor of Human Rights cannot be a limitation on a State or on a citizen.

If we look further and see how the senatorial equality of States obtained recognition in the Constitution, we shall find now occasion to admire that facility which has accorded to this concession so powerful an influence; and here the record is explicit. The National Convention had hardly assembled, when the small States came forward with their pretensions. Not content with suffrage in the Senate, they insisted upon equal suffrage in the House of Representatives. They had in their favor the rule of the Continental Congress and also of the Confederation, under which each State had one vote. Assuming to be independent sovereignties, they had also in their favor the rule of International Law. Against these pretensions the large States pleaded the simple rule of justice; and here the best minds concurred. On this head the debates of the Convention are interesting. At an early day, we find Mr. Madison moving that "the equality of suffrage established by the Confederation ought not to prevail in the National Legislature." This proposition, so consistent with reason, was seconded by Gouverneur Morris, and according to the report "being generally relished," was about being adopted, when Delaware, by one of her voices on the floor, protested, saying, that, in case it were adopted, "it might become the duty of her delegates to retire from the Convention." Such was the earliest cry of secession. Gouverneur Morris, while observing that the valuable assistance of these delegates could not be lost without real concern, gave his testimony, that "the change proposed was so fundamental an article in a National Government, that it could not be dispensed with." (Elliott; Debates, vol. 5, p. 135.) Mr. Madison followed by saying very justly that "whatever reason might have existed for the equality of suffrage when the Union was Federal among sovereign States, it must cease, when a National government should be put in its place." Franklin, in similar spirit, reminding the Convention that the equal suffrage of the States "was submitted to originally under a conviction of its impropriety, inequality, and injustice." (Ibid., p. 181.) This is strong language from the wise old man; but very true. Elbridge Gerry, after depicting the States as intoxicated with the idea of their sovereignty, said that "the injustice of allowing each an equal vote was long insisted on; that he voted for it; but that it was against his judgment and under the pressure of public danger and the obstinacy of the lesser States." (Ibid., p. 259.) Against these overwhelming words of Madison, Morris, Franklin, and Gerry, the delegates from Delaware pleaded nothing more than that without an equal suffrage, "Delaware would have about one ninetyth for its share in the general councils, while Pennsylvania and Virginia would possess one third of the whole;" and New Jersey, by her delegates, pleaded also that "it would not be safe for Delaware to allow Virginia sixteen times as many votes as herself." (Ibid., p. 211.) On the part of the small States, the effort was for power disproportioned to size. On the part of the large States there was a protest against the injustice and inequality of these pretensions, especially in a Government national in its character. The question was settled by the great compromise of the Constitution, according to which representation in the House of Representatives was proportioned to population, while each State was entitled to an equal suffrage in the Senate. To this extent the small States prevailed, and the Senate ever since has testified to the equality of States, or, rather, according to the language of the Federalist on this very point, it has been the "palladium to the residuary sovereignty of the States." (Federalist, No. 43.) Thus, by the pertinacity of the small States, was this concession extorted from the Convention, in defiance of every argument of justice and equity and contrary to the judgment of the best minds; and now it is exalted into a universal rule of constitutional law, before which justice and equity must hide their faces.

This protracted and recurring conflict in the Convention is compendiously set forth by our great authority, Judge Story, when he says, "it constituted one of the great struggles between the large and the small States, which was constantly renewed in the Convention and impeded it in every step of its progress in the formation of the Constitution. The struggle applied to the organization of each branch of the Legislature. The small States insisted upon an equality of vote and representation in each branch; and the large States upon a vote in proportion to their relative importance and population. The small States at length yielded the point, as to an equality of representation in the House; but they insisted upon an equality in the Senate. To this the large States were unwilling to assent; and for a time the States were on this point equally divided." (1 Story, Commentaries, Vol. 1 § 694.) This summary is in substantial harmony with my own abstract of the debates. I present it because I would not seem in any way to overstate the case. And here let me add most explicitly, that I lend no voice to any complaint against the small States; nor do I suggest any change in the original balances of our system, I insist only that the victory achieved in the Constitution by the small States shall not be made the apology for a pretension inconsistent with Human Rights. For the sake of a great cause the truth must be told.

It must not be disguised that this pretension has another origin outside the Constitution. This is in the Ordinance of 1787, where it is positively provided that any State, formed out of the Northwest Territory, "shall be admitted, by its delegates, into the Congress of the United States, on an equal footing with the original States in all respects." (Hickey's Constitution, p. 425.) Next after the equal suffrage in the Senate stands this provision with its talismanic phrase, equal footing. New States are to be admitted on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever. This language is strong; but nobody can doubt that it must be read in the light of the Ordinance where it appears. Read in this light its meaning cannot be questioned. By the Ordinance there are no less than six different articles of compact "forever unalterable unless by common consent," constituting so many perpetual safeguards; the first perpetuating religious liberty; the second perpetuating trial by jury, habeas corpus, and judicial proceedings, according to the course of the common law; the third perpetuating schools and the means of education; the fourth perpetuating the title of the United States in the soil without taxation, the freedom of the rivers as highways, and the liability of the people for a just proportion of the national debt; the fifth perpetuating the right of the States to be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the other States; and then, next in order, the sixth perpetuating freedom—being that immortal condition, which is the golden bough of this mighty oak, "that there shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude in the said territory." Now it is clear that subjection to these perpetual conditions was not considered in any respect inconsistent with that "equal footing" which was stipulated. Therefore, even assuming that States when admitted shall be on an "equal footing" with others, there can be no hindrance to any conditions by Congress kindred to those which were the glory of the Ordinance.

To all who, borrowing a catch-word from slavery, assert the Equality of States in derogation of fundamental conditions, I oppose the plain text of the Constitution, which contains no such rule, except in a single instance, and there the equality may be waived; and I oppose also the Ordinance of 1787, which, while requiring that new States shall be admitted on an "equal footing" with other States, teaches by its own great example, that this requirement is not inconsistent with conditions of all kinds and especially in favor of Human Rights. The Equality of States on the lips of slave-masters was natural, for it was a plausible defense against the approaches of Freedom; but this unauthorized phrase, which has deceived so many, must be rejected now, so far at least as it is employed against the Equal Rights of all. As one of the old garments of slavery, it must be handed to the flames.

From this review, it is easy to see that we approach the present question without any impediment or constraint in the Constitution. Not a provision, not a clause, not a sentence, not a phrase in the Constitution can be made an apology even for the present objection. Absolutely nothing; and here I challenge reply.

Without any support in the Constitution its partisans borrow one of the worst pretensions of slavery, and utter it now as it was uttered by slave-masters. Once more we hear the voice of slavery, crying out in familiar tones, that conditions cannot be imposed on new States. Alas! that slavery, which we thought had been slain, is not entirely dead. Again it stalks into this Chamber, like the majesty of buried Denmark—"In the same figure like the king that's dead"—and then, like this same ghost, it cries out "swear," and then again "swear;" and Senators pledged to freedom take up the old pretension, and swear it anew. For myself, I insist, not only, that slavery shall be buried out of sight, but that all its wretched pretensions hostile to Human Rights shall be buried with it.

The conditions upon new States are of two classes; first, those that may be required; secondly, those that must be required.

The first comprehends those conditions, which the Nation may consider it advisable to require, before admitting a new member into the partnership of government. The Constitution, in positive words, leaves to the Nation a discretion with regard to the admission of new States. The words are: "New States may be admitted into the Union," thus plainly recognizing a latitude under which any conditions not inconsistent with the Constitution may be required, as, by a firm on the admission of a new partner. All this is entirely reasonable; but I do not stop to dwell on it, for the condition which I have at heart does not come under this head.

A fundamental condition in favor of Human Rights is of that essential character, that it must be required. Not to require it is to abandon a plain duty; so it seems to me. I speak with all deference to others, but I cannot see it otherwise.

The Constitution declares, that "the United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government." These are grand words, perhaps the grandest in the Constitution, hardly excepting the Preamble, which is so full of majestic meaning and such a fountain of national life. Kindred to the Preamble is this supreme obligation imposed on the United States to guaranty a republican government. There it is. You cannot avoid this duty. Called to its performance, you must supply a practical definition of a republican government. This again you cannot avoid. By your oaths, by all the responsibilities of your position, you must say what in your judgment is a republican government, and you must so decide as not to discredit our fathers and not to give an unworthy example to mankind. Happily the definition is already of record in our history. Our fathers gave it to us, as amid the thunders of Sinai, when they put forth their Declaration of Independence. There it stands in the very front of our Great Charter, embodied in two simple self-evident truths, first, that all men are equal in rights, and secondly, that all just government is founded only on the consent of the governed—the two together making an axiomatic definition which proves itself. Its truth is like the sun; blind is he who cannot see it. And this is the definition bequeathed as a frechold by our fathers. Though often assailed, even by Senators, it is none the less true. So have I read of savages, who shot their arrows at the sun. Clearly, then, that is a republican government where all have equal rights and participate in the government. I know not if anything need be added; I am sure that nothing can be subtracted.

The Constitution itself sets the example of imposing conditions upon the States. Positively it says, no State shall enter into any treaty, alliance or confederation; no State shall grant letters of marque or reprisal; no State shall coin money; no State shall emit bills of credit. Again, it says, no State shall, without the consent of Congress, lay any duty of tonnage, or keep troops or ships of war in time of peace. All these are conditions in the text of the Constitution, so plain and intelligible as to require no further elucidation. To repeat them on the admission of a State would be superfluous. It is different, however, with that highest condition of all, that the State shall be republican. This requires repetition and elucidation, so as to remove all doubt of its application, and to vitalize it by declaring what is meant by a republican government.

Here I might close this argument; but there are two hostile pretensions which must be exposed; the first, founded on a false interpretation of "qualifications," being nothing less than the impossible assumption that because the States may determine the "qualifications" of electors, therefore they can make color a criterion of the electoral franchise; and the second, founded on a false interpretation of the asserted power of the States "to regulate suffrage," being nothing less than the impossible assumption that, under the power to regulate suffrage, the rights of a whole race may be annihilated. These two pretensions are, of course, derived from slavery. They are hatched from the eggs that the cuckoo bird has left behind. Strange that Senators will hatch them.

(1.) By the Constitution it is provided that "the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislatures." On this clause Senators build the impossible pretension that a State cannot be interrupted in its disfranchisement of a race. Here is the argument. Because a State may determine the qualifications of electors, therefore it may deprive a whole race of equal rights and of participation in the Government. Logically speaking, here are most narrow premises for the widest possible conclusion. On the mere statement, the absurdity is so unspeakable as to recall the kindred pretensions of slavery, that, because commerce is lawful, therefore commerce in human flesh is lawful also. If the consequences were not so offensive, this "argal" might be handed over to consort with that of the Shakespearean grave-digger. But the argument is not merely preposterous, it is insulting to the human understanding, and a blow at human nature itself. If I use strong language it is because such a proclamation of tyranny requires it. Admitting that the States may determine the "qualifications" of electors; what then? Obviously it must be according to the legitimate meaning of this word. And here, besides reason and humanity, two inexhaustible fountains, we have two other sources of authority; first, the Constitution in which the word appears, and secondly, the dictionaries of the English language, out of both of which we must condemn the intolerable pretension.

The Constitution, where we find this word, follows the Declaration of Independence and refuses to recognize any distinction of color. Search and you will confess, that there is no word of "color" in its text; nor is there anything there on which to found any disfranchisement of a race. The "qualifications" of different officers, as President, Vice President, Senators and Representatives are named; but "color" is not among these. The Constitution, like the Ten Commandments and the Beatitudes, embraces all alike within its mandates and all alike within its promises. There are none who must not obey it; there can be none who may not claim its advantages. By what title do you exclude a race? The Constitution gives no such title; you can only find it in yourselves. The fountain is pure; it is only out of yourselves that the waters of bitterness proceed.

The dictionaries of our language are in harmony with the Constitution. Look at "qualifications" in Webster or Worcester, the two best authorities of our time, and you will find that the word means "fitness"—"ability"—"accomplishment"—"the state of being qualified;" but it does not mean "color!" It embraces age, residence, character, education and the payment of taxes—in short, all those conditions which when honestly administered are in the nature of regulation, not of disfranchisement.

The English dictionaries, most used by the framers of the Constitution, were Bailey and Johnson. According to Bailey, who was the earliest, this important word is thus defined:

(1.) "That which fits any person or thing for any particular purpose."

(2.) "A particular faculty, or endowment, or accomplishment."

According to Johnson, who is the highest authority, it is thus defined:

(1.) "That which makes any person or thing fit."

Example.—"It is in the power of the prince to make piety and virtue become the fashion, if he would make them necessary qualifications for preferment."—Swift.

(2.) "Accomplishment."

Example.—"Good qualifications of mind enable a magistrate to perform his duty, and tend to create public esteem of him."—Atterbury.

By these definitions this word means "fitness," or "accomplishment," and, according to the well-chosen examples from Swift and Atterbury, it means qualities like "piety" and "virtue," or like "faculties of mind," all of which are more or less within the reach of every human being, but it is impossible to extend this list so as to make "color" a quality. Absolutely impossible. Color is a physical condition, affixed by the God of nature to a large portion of the human race, and insurmountable in its character. Age, education, residence, property, all these are subject to change; but the Ethiopian cannot change his skin. On this last distinctive circumstance I take my stand. An insurmountable condition is not a qualification but a disfranchisement. Admit that a State may determine the "qualifications" of electors, it cannot, under this authority, arbitrarily exclude a whole race.

Try this question by examples. Suppose South Carolina, where the blacks are numerous, should undertake to exclude the whites from the polls, on account of "color;" would you hesitate to arrest this injustice? You would insist that such a government sanctioning such a denial of rights, under whatever pretension, could not be republican. Suppose another State should gravely declare, that all with black eyes should be excluded from the polls; and still another should gravely declare that all with black hair should be excluded from the polls, I am sure that you would find it difficult to restrain the mingled derision and indignation which such a pretension must excite. But this fable pictures your conduct. All this is now gravely done by States; and Senators gravely insist that such exclusion is proper, in determining the "qualifications" of electors.

(2) Like unto the pretension founded on a misinterpretation of "qualifications" is that other founded on a misinterpretation of the asserted power of a State to make "regulations." Listen to this pretension. Assuming that a State may regulate the elections, without the intervention of Congress, it is insisted that it may disfranchise a race. Because a State may regulate the elective franchise, therefore it may destroy it. Surely it is one thing to regulate and quite another thing to destroy. The power to regulate cannot involve any such conclusion of tyranny. To any such wretched result however urged, there is one sufficient reply, non sequitur.

According to the Constitution, "the times, places and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed—each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may, at any time, by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators." Here is the text of this portentous power to blast a race. In these simple words no such power can be found, unless the seeker makes the Constitution a reflection of himself. The times, places and manner of holding elections are referred to the States; nothing more; and even these may be altered by Congress. Being matters of form and convenience only, in the nature of "police," they are justly included under the head of "regulations," like the sword and uniform of the Army. Do we not familiarly speak of a regulation sword and a regulation sash? Who will dare to say, that under this formal power of regulation a whole race may be despoiled of equal rights and of all participation in the Government? This very pretension was anticipated by Mr. Madison, and condemned in advance. Here are his decisive words in the Virginia Convention:

"Some States might regulate the elections on the principle of equality, and others might regulate them otherwise." * * * "Should the people of any State, by any means, be deprived of the right of suffrage, it was judged proper that it should be remedied by the General Government.—Elliot's Debate, vol. 3, p. 347.

Thus was it expressly understood, at the adoption of the Constitution, that Congress should have the power to prevent any State, under the pretense of regulating the suffrage, from depriving the people of this right or from interfering with the principle of Equality.

Kindred to this statement of Mr. Madison is that other contemporary testimony, which will be found in the Federalist, where the irrepealable rights of citizens are recognized without distinction of color. This explicit language cannot be too often quoted. Here it is:

"It is only under the pretext that the laws have transferred the negroes into subjects of property that a place is disputed them in the computation of numbers; and it is admitted that if the laws were to restore the rights which have been taken away the negroes could no longer be refused an equal share of representation with the other inhabitants.—The Federalist, No. 54.

This testimony is as decisive as it is authentic. Consider that it was given in explanation and vindication of the Constitution. Consider that the Constitution was commended for adoption by the assertion, that on the termination of slavery "the negro could no longer be refused an equal share of representation with the other inhabitants." In the face of this assurance, how can it be now insisted, that, under the simple power to regulate the suffrage, a State may deny to a whole race that "equal share of representation" which was promised? Thus from every quarter we are brought to the same inevitable conclusion.

Therefore, I dismiss the pretension founded on the power to make regulations, as I dismiss that other founded on the power to determine qualifications. Each proceeds on a radical misconception. Admit that a State may determine qualifications; admit that a State may make regulations, it cannot follow, by any rule of logic, or law, that, under these powers, either or both, it may disfranchise a race. The pretension is too lofty. No such enormous prerogative can be wrung out of any such moderate power. As well say, that, because a constable or policeman may keep order in a city, therefore he may inflict the penalty of death; or, because a father may impose proper restraint upon a child, therefore he may sell him into slavery. We have read of an effort to extract sunbeams out of cucumbers; but the present effort to extract a cruel prerogative out of the simple words of the Constitution is scarcely less absurd.

I conclude as I began, in favor of requiring conditions from States on their admission into the Nation, and I insist that it is our especial duty, in every possible way, by compact and by enactment, to assure among these conditions the equal rights of all and the participation of every citizen in the government over him, without which the State cannot be republican. For the present I confine myself to the question of conditions on the admission of States, without considering the broader obligation of Congress to make Equal Rights coextensive with the Nation, and thus to harmonize our institutions with the principles of the Declaration of Independence. That other question I leave to another occasion.

Meanwhile I protest against the false glosses originally fastened upon the Constitution by slavery, and, now continued, often in unconsciousness of their origin, perverting it to the vilest uses of tyranny. I protest against that exaggeration of pretension, which, out of a power to make "regulations" and to determine "qualifications," can derive an unrepugnant prerogative. I protest against that pretension, which would make the asserted Equality of States the cover for a denial of the Equality of Man. The one is an artificial rule, relating to artificial bodies; the other is a natural rule, relating to natural bodies. The one is little more than a legal fiction; the other is a truth of nature. Here is a distinction, which Alexander Hamilton recognized when, in the debates of the Convention, he nobly said:

"As States are a collection of individual men, which ought we to respect most, the rights of the people composing them or of the artificial beings resulting from the composition? Nothing could be more preposterous or absurd than to sacrifice the former to the latter."—Elliot's Debates, vol. 5, p. 258.

High above States, as high above men, are those commanding principles, which cannot be denied with impunity. They will be found in the Declaration of Independence expressed so clearly that all can read them. Though few, they are mighty. There is no humility in bending to their behests. As man rises in the scale of being while walking in obedience to the divine will, so is a State elevated by obedience to these everlasting truths. Nor can we look for harmony in our country until these principles bear unquestioned sway, without any interdict from the States. That unity for which the Nation longs, with peace and reconciliation in its train, can be assured only through the Equal Rights of All, proclaimed by the Nation everywhere within its limits, and maintained by the National arm. Then will the Constitution be filled and inspired by the Declaration of Independence, so that the two shall be one, with a common life, a common authority, and a common glory.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts, speaking at the end of a nine hours' session, when it was not likely that any other member of the Senate would occupy the floor by way of reply, characterizes the speeches that have been made by his fellow-members as the echo of slavery, as a retelling over of the former utterances of what he has so often described as a fell and diabolical spirit. I was not aware that the question of human servitude had entered into this debate in any of its stages, or that it was directly involved in any of the questions which have been undergoing debate. As, however, three fourths of the speaking upon this bill has been by gentlemen in political accord with himself, I suppose his criticisms are directed to his own side of the Chamber and to his own political associates rather than to this side of the Chamber and to those who agree with me in opinion. If his political associates are agreed that he shall lash them as the retailers of former slavery cries, certainly I am content; but I think it a grievance to all that we should have repeated over again arguments that are perfectly familiar not only to the Senate but to the people of the country, and arguments which, in my judgment, have been answered in the Senate and out of the Senate, and successfully answered, whenever they have been made.

I allude particularly to two points of the Senator's speech which, so far as I can discover, are the only ones that have a direct bearing upon the questions which have been discussed pending the consideration of this bill. First, he insists that the ordinance of 1787 is a precedent and an authority for imposing the fundamental conditions that have been placed in this bill, and for imposing any other fundamental conditions similar to them which we may choose to introduce into this or into any other bill, whether for the admission of a new State or for the readmission to representation of an old one. Mr. President, the ordinance of 1787 was made before our Government was created. It was made under political institutions which died out, under a form of government which was superseded by that under which we live, and its application to the Northwestern Territory, so far as the United States is concerned, was during the territorial condition and before the Territory was organized into States; and never, in the legislation of Congress, or in the practice of the country, or in the accepted opinions of our public men, was it proclaimed or understood that Congress could impose any condition whatever upon the several States which were carved out of that Northwestern Territory and which now constitute honored and powerful members of the American Union.

Mr. YATES. The Senator will remember that the ordinance of 1787 was reaffirmed by the First Congress after the adoption of the Constitution, and that afterward, when this Territory was formed into States, the States were admitted containing provisions in their constitutions saying that they were consistent with the ordinance of 1787.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Certainly it was competent for the people of the Northwestern Territory to put such provisions in their constitutions.

Mr. YATES. But I say the ordinance of 1787 was reaffirmed by the First Congress.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I am coming to that in a moment. Certainly it was competent for the people of the Northwestern Territory to insert such a condition in their fundamental law when they came to make it; and taking one view of congressional power with reference to the Territories, it was competent for the United States to impose, as a new proposition entirely, such a condition or such a law upon the people in their territorial condition. There is a distinction which is not sometimes drawn by gentlemen in considering this subject. There is a material difference between admitting a State upon a condition which expends itself at the time, which simply leads to the act of Congress, and imposing, or attempting to impose, a condition which shall bind the sovereignty of the State in future time; which shall tie up its hands, and prevent it from the performance of an act of sovereignty which is possessed and may be exercised by all the other States that constitute the American Union.

The objections to fundamental conditions are objections leveled at those of the latter character. As I stated the other day, I see no strong objection to admitting a State upon the condition that nothing in her constitution, nothing in her political institutions, shall contravene the Constitution of the United States. I see no objection when she is admitted to giving her notice that as to anything contained in her frame of government contrary to the letter or spirit of the Constitution of the United States, it shall be held void, it shall not be sustained or respected by the Government of the United States, either in its legislative or judicial departments, in all future time. Such was the nature of the condition imposed in the Missouri case, as I explained the other day.

But these modern fundamental conditions which are now creeping into our public statutes, and which will multiply in number, doubtless, in future, and be the subject, possibly, of much national disturbance and difficulty, are of a very different character. They are attempts to mold the political institutions of the States that are to apply for admission or for representation, according to the opinions, the passions, or the party interests of the hour. They are attempts to curb, to limit, to regulate, and to mold the sovereignty of particular States, and to place them in this Union upon grounds of inequality in comparison with all the other States which compose the Union.

I go back, sir, to the point with which I began, that the argument of the Senator from Massachusetts, based upon the ordinance of 1787, is entirely inapplicable to the case now before the Senate, the question of the renewed representation of the States of the South.

The Senator from Massachusetts, in the next place, repeats over again, for the twentieth time perhaps, his argument upon that clause of the Constitution which declares that the United States shall guaranty to every State in the Union a republican form of government. He insists again that under this provision of the Constitution any State which excludes a portion of its people from the right of suffrage does not possess a republican form; and hence, in certain cases at least, it is proper for Congress to interpose and to so control the State, to so shape her political institutions that suffrage shall be as extensive at least as the male adult population of the State. I need not stop to inquire whether he applies this principle properly. I need not stop to inquire whether in the votes he and others who think with him are giving upon the reorganization of these States, they are applying this principle in practice. Do they not know, and does not the country know, that while these warm words are upon their lips, while they are proclaiming the nature of this provision of the Constitution and insisting that it is without limitation, that it must command provisions including the whole male adult population, they are voting for bills, and by their votes passing bills to reorganize States with a disfranchisement of a quarter of a million of those who were formerly electors or qualified under former laws? Is not this an astonishing spectacle, a most surprising difference between argument and conduct, between the theories and reasonings upon which our action is invoked in favor of these bills and the character of the bills themselves?

But, sir, the whole argument is refuted by referring to a single authority. I suppose there is no authority known in our political history so commanding, so respectable, and so weighty as that of Mr. Madison. The Senator from Massachusetts himself has referred to that great character, and by citations from him has attempted to sustain some of his positions taken in the very elaborate essay that he has read to the Senate. Mr. Madison said that those words in the guarantee clause of the Constitution—securing to each State a republican form of government—were to be construed with reference to the forms of State government which existed when the Constitution was made; and how obvious that is when the proposition is stated. Words referring to forms of State government and guaranteeing their existence in all future time by the supreme power of the United States must attach themselves to forms which were then in existence, and under which the Constitution itself was made; and we know that at that time in every one, or in nearly every one, of the States which formed the Union and afterward composed it, there was this very disqualification of a portion of the population against which the Senator from Massachusetts now levels his argument, and against which he cites this very clause of the Constitution as furnishing a conclusive argument.

Isay to him, then, that in none of the frequent occasions on which I have listened to him upon this guarantee clause of the Constitution, has he suggested an answer to this conclusive argument made by Mr. Madison early in the history of the Government, and no man has heard from any other quarter an answer to it. It is absolutely conclusive unless you take some principle of progression into your minds and attempt to construe a Constitution adopted in 1787 according to new impressions and new ideas in 1868, and cause your fundamental law now to bear a meaning entirely different from that which it bore when it was first established.

As to the other parts of the Senator's speech reciting facts in the history of the Government, and particularly citations which have been introduced frequently before in debate, I shall say nothing.

We have come to the end of this debate, and I understand that this bill is to be passed, to be sanctioned, at least by a vote of the Senate, and to be sent to the House of Representatives for its concurrence in the amendments which we have adopted. Now, what is this bill? A few words upon that and I shall close. It is a bill to admit these States to renewed representation. We have already admitted two of the original eleven engaged in the rebellion. Tennessee was admitted soon after the termination of the great struggle, and recently we have passed a bill for the renewal of representation to Arkansas. Six are now to be added, and I believe there are three with reference to which no action has yet been taken in Congress, but in regard to which action may be expected hereafter.

What is this bill? It is to sanction a reorganization of the southern States, or of a majority of them, upon two principles: first, that the entire adult negro population shall vote not only at the first election which shall give the new political institutions of the State their form, but in all subsequent elections so long as the constitution of the State remains unchanged; and to render this principle permanent and to secure it against any change of public opinion you incorporate in your law what you call fundamental conditions. You are not content to exercise your powers for the present time alone. You now command the field of action. You hold a vote in the two Houses of Congress which renders you, so far as the enactment of laws in this Government is concerned, supreme. For the time being your will dictates law to the United States. But you are not satisfied with this. You propose to take from the men of future times the power and authority to change your work, at all events, in those States of the South which are concerned in your present legislation. You propose to reach out your hands from these Halls in which you sit as the Representatives of the people and of the States into the States of the South, and to stamp upon the constitutions of those States, upon their local frames of government, an impress of your will which shall remain unchangeable in all future time by any voluntary action of the political communities in which those constitutions are established. And why do you do this? You do this, sir, in order to secure to the colored adult men of the South not the right of suffrage for the moment, nor as an experiment of their capacity in free government, but to secure it to them against the shifting and changing opinions of future times, against the experience of future times, against any possibility that it shall be narrowed and made to conform to the experience and necessities of those States as they may be developed hereafter. This is very extraordinary legislation, the like of it unknown at least in our own history, and I do not know that any example to warrant it is known in the history of any free State.

But what else do you attempt to secure by this and other bills and by prior laws? Apparently apprehensive that your new political bodies so established in the southern States will receive direction, will be to a great extent controlled by the intelligent populations that are resident there of your own race, you have proceeded from time to time to disfranchise them to a great extent, and now by this bill make firm and effectual that disfranchisement which is most proscriptive and intolerant. Such is the character of this measure considered in connection with the measures which have preceded it, and of which it is the culmination.

Now, sir, can any one doubt your object? Perhaps you have not avowed it to yourselves. You may have shrunk back from the self-acknowledgment of the truth. But what is the truth? It is that to a great extent all this has been done and this crowning measure is to be passed, in order that you may retain that power in the Government of the United States which you now possess, in order that that which you have grasped by the consent of the people and under peculiar circumstances in our political history, you shall hold firm in the future; that your power shall not be torn from you by public disapprobation; that by majority votes in those States which you represent, you shall not be removed from that position of authority and of dominating influence which you hold in the Government of the United States. Is not that your purpose? Does it not inspire your conduct? Does it not lie behind all these your acts and speak them into being? Does it not infuse into your conduct that energy and zeal by which it is characterized? Does it not touch the tongue of the Senator from Massachusetts as with a coal of fire? Does it not keep us here at an untimely hour of the night to press through its last stages this bill?

I hold, and at least one half of the population of the States represented in Congress hold, that your body of reconstruction laws are invalid; that they are without warrant of authority in the fundamental law. You have taken from the Supreme Court the power to pass judgment upon them. You have withdrawn a case which would have elicited the opinion of that court suddenly from its jurisdiction, and prevented a decision upon the validity of your laws.

Mr. President, what are we to expect in the future? Will this work of yours stand? You say yourselves it will not stand investigation in court and a judicial judgment. You have said so by your conduct. You know that at least half the people represented in Congress are firmly and strongly against it, for they have said so within the last twelve months in most emphatic language. You cannot question the fact. How is your work to stand in the future, the work of which this bill is supposed to be the guarantee of security and endurance? I will tell you, Mr. President, how it may stand. I will state to you the foundation upon which alone it can stand. It is the acquiescence and acceptance of the people of the southern States. You may denounce them as rebels; you may paint in warm and glaring colors all of evil and of wrong that they have committed against you and against the Government of their country; you may speak of them as you please; this work of yours cannot and will not stand unless they accept it, unless they acquiesce in it, and agree to live under it and uphold it in the future. Humanity may be pressed down under the iron weight of political power; but there is in it a recuperative energy which will lift it superior to all the political bonds with which you may attempt to shackle it; and in our country there is yet enough left of republican forms, there is yet enough left of organized popular power, to peacefully break into pieces the bonds with which you would bind the people. It will not be necessary to resort to revolution, to appeal to force, in order to obtain political redress.

Sir, your work will have security and a guarantee of future existence when it is accepted, and accepted truly and heartily by the people of those States with which your legislation is concerned. That is the only true security, the only firm guarantee which you can possibly have.

Sir, what is the result? What are your elections worth if they are to be carried by this colored vote of the South counted fully while a quarter of a million of white voters are disfranchised and excluded from the right of suffrage? What is your election worth if it is to be carried by votes cast at elections under the control which is established by these reconstruction laws, elections which will be tainted, corrupted, and loaded down with fraud? These first ones are cursed and tainted by it largely; and when the political passions and corrupting influences of the present year come to hear fully upon those southern elections, it is quite likely that they will become one of the scandals of the earth. Will you be able to maintain an election carried by those votes? Sir, you will not.

Therefore, I repeat to you what I stated on a former occasion when debating another subject: you are to go to the people of the adhering States with your case, with this bill, and with the laws which have preceded it; you are to submit to them your policy, your statutes, your conduct. If they give you a quittance and uphold you, there will be complete acquiescence by your political opponents represented in Congress. But let me assure you, sir, that all those expectations which gentlemen indulge of ruling this country by colored suffrage will be utterly vain and fruitless. The States that stood by the Government of the United States when the war broke out, and stood by it through the war, and now hold power in the Congress of the United States have the moral as well as the legal right to determine the result of the presidential election of 1868, and it will not be possible to supplement or overrule their judgment by these vicious organizations attempted to be set up in the South by your reconstruction laws against the will of those who comprise the intelligence of those States, and hold in their hands the property of those States.

I think, sir—and with this point I will conclude—if I were to go from my own position and place myself in yours, that the wisest thing that could be done by Congress, taking into account the existing situation of our country and the present posture of our public affairs, would be to make provision for the temporary preservation of order in the States of the South during the present year, and to hold the presidential election without reference to them, in the States represented in Congress, and in those States only. We would thus avoid an immense amount of expense, a great amount of excitement and disturbance and scandal in the country, and possibly much of evil in the future.

We know that the old State organizations set up by the people themselves disappeared after the war. They were replaced by State governments set up on the invitation of the President of the United States. Those Congress refused to acknowledge, and they have gone aside; they have almost disappeared from the scene. Now, Congress by its law, by an exercise of its authority alone, in hostility to that of the President of the United States, in hostility to the opinions of a large part of the people of the represented States, and in contempt of the rights, opinions, interests, and passions of a large portion of our own race in the southern States, is attempting to set up a system of governments of its own. These are all to be congressional States. Do we not know that the Arkansas constitution will stand, if at all, upon the law of Congress, having been rejected at home? Do we not know that you put in this bill the State of Alabama as a congressional State after the constitution had been rejected under the law in that State? And do we not know that the constitution of every one of these other States stands for its validity upon the legislation of Congress, enfranchising the one race and disfranchising the other? Do you expect the people of the country to accept this system, and not merely to accept it for the time being as a thing not to be helped, but to accept it as the controlling element of political power in the Government of the United States? There is the point. These laws are pressed in the particular form which they assume because it is sought to obtain an element of political power from the States of the South, which shall subserve the interests of party and enable you to maintain control of this Government in the future.

I know that my opinions and advice are likely to go for little in influencing the result upon this bill; but I must repeat that if I were standing in the situation in which the majority in Congress stand, if I held the position which they hold, instead of attempting to rush these States into the presidential election with all the evils and mischiefs that will be attendant upon such a policy, having already delayed their reorganization and their reëntance into the two Houses of Congress, I would postpone their rehabilitation until the elections of the present year had been held in the adhering States.

Mr. President, I regret that I have detained the Senate so long at this late hour. I had no intention of speaking at length. I regret, also, that under the circumstances I am not able and that it would be ungracious to proceed and state the whole argument which ought to be made against this bill before it passes into an enactment. I have said thus much in response to the Senator from Massachusetts and in regard to the policy of this scheme of legislation, because I thought that some answer to his remarks, and some further words of hostility to the bill, would be timely and proper notwithstanding the lateness of the hour and the impatience of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. WILSON. I ask for the yeas and nays on that question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, I desire to occupy the attention of the Senate for but a single moment in consequence of the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts. With the fore part of that speech, in relation to the ordinance of 1787, and with all the encomiums that he passed upon it, and quoted from Daniel Webster, Chase, and others, I cordially agree. With his definition of qualifications and regulations, and the sentiments he uttered on these subjects, I cordially agree. But when the Senator announced that he had got some new matter, never before presented, I listened with interest, as I always do to whatever he has to say; and I was a little surprised to find that it was one of the slogan cries of a former Democratic member of the House of Representatives from Ohio.

Mr. SUMNER. Who was it, pray?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Vallandigham. [Laughter.] Its whole tendency was to raise a prejudice against the equality of representation here in the Senate. Now, Mr. President, I have always supposed that this Government was a Government of checks and balances. If the Senator had referred to the same illustrious personage from whom he quoted in commendation of the ordinance of 1787—Mr. Webster—I think he would have discovered that this Government was not considered by that high authority a pure democracy, but a representative Government, and a Government of checks and balances. Sir, that very feature, which I am sorry to say has received from the Senator from Massachusetts a blow this night, by calling attention to its injustice, has always been regarded as one of the most admirable features in our Government. If it were possible for other nations to copy our Government in this respect, there is no question that we would have proved more of a model Government in fact than we are at the present time. All publicists that I have read on the subject have so intimated. Take France, or England, or any of the continental nations; it is the utter impossibility of their having a body like this, based in any respect upon independent States as a check and balance upon the popular branch of the Government, that prevents the spread of American republicanism there at this day.

Sir, this cry that there is some injustice in having unequal representation on the part of the States would bring us to the position that we should occupy if we had but one representative body. In my opinion, it may fairly be regarded as the very safeguard of the Republic—security for its lasting perpetuity—that we have this body and that we have equal representation in the Senate.

The Senator quoted from the Constitution that this equal representation of the States in the Senate might be changed by the consent of the States themselves. I will not characterize that argument. I do not see its strength. Is it to be supposed that that provision is likely to be construed into a permission to change it? You might as well expect to get the permission of a man that you should hang him as to expect that the States themselves will surrender any such provision as that. It has always been regarded as a permanent, immovable, fixed provision of the Constitution. Without it the Union could not have been established, and it is as much for the benefit of large States as small. No statesman, no commentator on the Constitution that I have ever seen has ever regarded it differently. But, sir, at this late hour I do not desire to detain the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to state that I was requested by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. DAVIS] to announce that he had paired off with the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORRISON.] The Senator from Kentucky, if present, would vote against the bill and the Senator from Indiana for it.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I desire to state that I have paired off with the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS,] who, if present, would vote against the bill, while I would vote in favor of it.

Mr. RAMSEY. My colleague [Mr. NORTON] is confined to his room by sickness, and he desired me to say so to the Senate in explanation of his absence.

Mr. WILLEY. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] and myself agreed to pair off on this subject. If he were here he would vote against the bill and I for it.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 31, nays 5; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Cameron, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Connors, Cragin, Drake, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Howard, Howe, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Wade, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Buckalew, McCreery, Patterson of Tennessee, and Vickers—5.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cattell, Corbett, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fowler, Grimes, Henderson, Hendricks, Johnson, Morton, Norton, Saulsbury, Sprague, Van Winkle, and Willey—18.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The title of the bill should now be amended by inserting Florida.

The title of the bill was amended to read, "A bill to admit the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, Alabama, and Florida to representation in Congress."

Mr. YATES. Mr. President, I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 11, being a bill to admit the State of Colorado into the Union.

Mr. CONKLING. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

INCREASED DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

Mr. MOORHEAD, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1211) to increase the revenue from duties on imports and tend to equalize exports and imports; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the committee.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was re-committed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GOVERNMENT BUILDING AT PITTSBURG.

Mr. MOORHEAD also, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to this House the condition of the Government building used at Pittsburg for custom-house, post office, United States court-room, pension office, Ohio river improvement office, steamboat inspector's office, &c., and its adaptability for all these purposes, and make such suggestions and recommendations as he deems proper and as the public service may require.

REMOVAL OF DISABILITIES.

Mr. PAINE. I am directed by the Committee on Reconstruction, to whom were referred two several petitions for the relief of disabilities of citizens of the State of Arkansas, to report a bill (H. R. No. 1212) for the relief of certain citizens of Arkansas of disabilities.

The bill was read a first and second time, and the question was on ordering it to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill proposes to enact (two thirds of each House concurring therein) that the several persons named therein, citizens of Arkansas, be severally relieved from all disability imposed upon them or either of them by the act passed March 2, 1867, entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States" and the acts supplementary thereto; and the amendment to the Constitution of the United States known as article fourteen; namely, William M. Harrison, of Drew county; and James R. Berry, of Pulaski county.

Mr. PAINE. I will ask the previous question on the bill.

Mr. MILLER. I should like to know who the parties are.

Mr. PAINE. One of these gentlemen is judge-elect of the supreme court of the State of Arkansas, and the other is the auditor-elect of that State. Both of them come to us with perfectly satisfactory indorsements and recommendations, and we therefore advise that they be relieved from disabilities, so as to aid in setting in motion the State government of Arkansas.

Mr. MILLER. I would ask if these men took an active part in the rebellion?

Mr. PAINE. They were sufficiently implicated in the rebellion to render it necessary for them to be relieved by act of Congress.

Mr. MULLINS. Were they officers in the rebel army?

Mr. PAINE. I believe neither of them was an officer in the rebel army.

Mr. MULLINS. What positions did they occupy?

Mr. PAINE. Does the gentleman ask what positions they now occupy?

Mr. MULLINS. No; what positions did they occupy in the rebel cause?

Mr. PAINE. I cannot now state. We have been informed, but the information was laid before us some time ago, and I forget the precise offices they held. I believe they held civil offices during the rebellion. It is certainly necessary that they should be relieved in order that they may hold the offices to which they have recently been elected.

Mr. MULLINS. I would ask if they held any offices which required them to take an oath to support the Government of the United States and afterward went voluntarily into the rebellion?

Mr. PAINE. I cannot now answer with certainty. But if they did, then this is precisely the case designed to be provided for by a bill of this kind requiring the consent of two thirds of both Houses of Congress.

Mr. MULLINS. What I desire is that the House shall know the facts as to their complicity in the rebellion, and as to their subsequent repentance of their fault.

Mr. PAINE. I have no doubt, from the information I have received, that they were implicated in the rebellion far enough to render it necessary that they should be pardoned through this bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to know if it is the wish of the loyal men of Arkansas that this bill shall pass?

Mr. PAINE. It is the earnest wish of the representatives of that State now in Washington. They have been constantly importuning the committee to press this bill to a vote.

Mr. GARFIELD. Do gentlemen expect that we will ever be called upon to pass any bill of this character, on such conditions as make it absolutely unnecessary to pass it? From the questions put to my friend from Wisconsin, I should suppose that gentlemen wanted him to show that these men were entirely innocent of anything that would render necessary the passage of a bill for their relief. It strikes me that the very fact that they were not without offense in the past makes this bill necessary. I am sure that those who desire to restore the rebel States safely, and as speedily as possible, will, whenever the committee have fully examined a case and reported a bill like this, be willing to sustain the committee. I wish to say, moreover, that, so far as I know, the men who fought against the rebellion in the field are among those who are most willing to bring back into the privileges of citizenship all who are sincerely desirous of aiding to build up what they once attempted to destroy. General Scott made an observation in 1861 or 1862 which, I think, is worthy to be remembered. I do not repeat it with reference to any persons here, but as a sentiment applicable to the tendency we observe in some quarters to nurse our vengeance against all who went into the rebellion. General Scott said, that "when this war should be ended, it would require all the force of the nation to restrain the fury of the non-combatants." I think that we ought, without any unnecessary delay, to let all these people in who give sufficient evidence of a genuine purpose to stand by the Union, and I am sure that those who have been in the Army will be the first to assent to this policy.

Mr. PAINE. I will make one single statement, and then I will ask for the previous question. My statement is this: we have been fully informed as to the positions held by these gentlemen; but the facts were stated to us so long ago, and so many other men have been brought before the committee, that I forget the precise positions held by these gentlemen. But the evidence before the committee that these men are entitled to relief is entirely satisfactory to the committee. And I believe there is no objection on the part of any gentleman of the committee to this particular bill. I think I am not mistaken on this point.

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to say a word or two before the previous question is called.

Mr. PAINE. Very well.

Mr. MAYNARD. The gentleman says that in the opinion of the committee these men ought to be relieved. That is not giving us any information. The fact that the committee report the bill and recommend its passage declares all that.

Now, what I desire, and I suppose that is what the House desires, is to know upon what principle the committee have acted, to know what is their reason for thinking that these men ought to be relieved. I do not say I am not in favor of the bill, or that I will not vote in favor of it when I understand it. But I do think that in legislation as important as this, the principle of which is to run through an immense number of individual cases, we ought to establish some general principle of action, and not to act on mere caprice, not to let kissing go by favor, or the want of it by disfavor. I have no doubt the gentleman thought and the committee thought these men ought to be relieved, or they would not have reported the bill. But I submit that they ought to tell the House the grounds of their action.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Will the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] indicate to the House some principle upon which the committee ought to act?

Mr. MAYNARD. No, sir; I will do no such thing. I am not called upon to do any such thing. If I was on a committee which was charged with that responsibility I would do it, and do it most cheerfully; and I should think I was very short of my duty if I failed to do so.

Mr. PAINE. I must resume the floor.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Will my colleague on the committee [Mr. PAINE] yield to me for a few moments?

Mr. PAINE. Certainly.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I would say to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD], and to the House, that the general rule we have adopted in these cases is to take the recommendation of the convention that framed the constitution with which the State comes here. In this case we have, beside the recommendation of the convention, the recommendation of the Republican committee of that State, upon which we place great reliance. As a general rule we act upon the recommendation of the convention forming the State constitution.

Mr. PAINE. I will now answer the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD], and I will be obliged to any gentleman in this House who takes an interest in this bill if he will listen to what I say. In the first place we had the recommendation of the constitutional convention of Arkansas, which came to us in a documentary form. Now, although that is a strong recommendation, and ought to be regarded by this House if it stood alone, we had in addition the knowledge of the fact that these men had been elected by the people of Arkansas to hold the office, one that of State auditor, and the other that of judge of the supreme court of that State. In addition to that evidence we had the verbal assurance of the entire Arkansas delegation at this Capitol, who, in repeated personal interviews with the committee, assured us that although these men had been implicated in the rebellion they were now entirely loyal in their sentiments, were devoted to the Union, and if relieved from their disabilities would, as they were perfectly competent, prove to be loyal and valuable citizens of the United States.

Now, it seems to me that it would be impossible for the Committee on Reconstruction ever to have an accumulation of evidence stronger than they have in this case; and if my friend from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] shall ever require anything more from the Committee on Reconstruction or from this House than a recommendation of the constitutional convention of the State, backed up by the votes of the people of the State, and also by the personal assurances of the entire congressional delegation—representative and senatorial—of that State, then I do not see how he can obtain it.

Mr. MAYNARD. I want to say to the gentleman that his statement is satisfactory. I can take his speech now, and go before the country and sustain my vote for this bill.

Mr. PAINE. I am glad the gentleman from Tennessee is satisfied.

Mr. MILLER. I am told that one of these men was appointed by Mr. Lincoln in charge of the land office in that State, and afterward handed it over to the rebels.

Mr. PAINE. I have never heard of any such thing. But if it was so, this is precisely the bill they need.

Mr. MILLER. I hope the gentleman will tell us what positions they did hold.

Mr. PAINE. I did know, but it was so long ago that I have now forgotten it. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the passage of the bill, which by its terms requires a two-thirds vote.

Mr. BROOKS. Is not this vote to be taken by a division?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] ask for a division?

Mr. BROOKS. No, sir; I do not.

Mr. COBURN. I call for a division.

On the passage of the bill there were—ayes 84, noes 22.

The SPEAKER. Two thirds having voted in the affirmative, the bill has passed.

Mr. PAINE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DIVISION OF THE STATE OF TEXAS.

Mr. STOKES. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution for reference to the Committee on Reconstruction. It is entitled "A joint resolution for the admission into the Union of three more States formed out of the territory of Texas in addition to said State of Texas, for the recession to the United States of certain outlying territory belonging to said State, and for other purposes."

Mr. BROOKS. I object.

POTOMAC NAVIGATION COMPANY.

Mr. WELKER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1213) to incorporate the Potomac Navigation Company; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

JOHN M. PALMER.

Mr. COBB submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 218) for the relief of John M. Palmer, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend, and do recommend to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the House recede from their disagreement to the amendments of the Senate, and agree to the same.

AMASA COBB,

W. S. HOLMAN,

Managers on the part of the House.

W. T. WILLEY,

JOHN SHERMAN,

JUSTIN S. MORRILL,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. COBB. I call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the report was agreed to.

Mr. COBB moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

AMERICAN LINE OF OCEAN STEAMERS.

Mr. ALLISON. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order during the morning hour is the bill (H. R. No. 989) to provide for an American line of mail and emigrant passenger steamships between New York and one or more European ports. This bill was reported yesterday from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and was pending at the expiration of the morning hour. The amendments reported by the committee will be read.

The amendments were read as follows:

First amendment:

In section one, line fourteen, strike out "twelve" and insert "twenty."

Second amendment:

Strike out section four, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That to insure the construction of the above-mentioned vessels within the time and in the manner hereinbefore provided, and the maintenance of the said line, the said Commercial Navigation Company may issue bonds to such an amount that the entire annual interest thereon shall not exceed the sum of $250,000, such bonds to be made payable at the expiration of the before-named twenty years, and the interest thereof to be made payable semi-annually, the principal and interest of such bonds to be made payable in coin of the United States. That for the protection of the holders of such bonds they shall be severally registered at the Post Office Department and certified by the chief clerk of the Department without liability for the payment of the interest or principal of said bonds upon the part of the Post Office Department only in manner as hereinafter provided. And the Postmaster General shall receive all moneys for postage earned by the steamships of said company, and shall apply the same as far as needed to the payment of the semi-annual interest upon the before-mentioned bonds, and shall retain the surplus after paying such interest, and shall invest the same quarterly in the securities of the United States to form a sinking fund, to be held solely for the benefit of the bondholders, and to be applied to the payment of the principal of such bonds. And whenever, and as soon as, such sinking fund shall equal in amount the entire principal of said bonds, then from that time forward the interest of said bonds shall be paid out of the income of such sinking fund, and the principal thereof out of the same fund at their maturity. And all postage earned after the time when said sinking fund shall be made up to the amount aforesaid shall belong to and be paid quarterly to the said company by the Postmaster General of the United States.

Third amendment:

In section five, lines eighteen and nineteen, strike out the words, "guaranteed bonds, including both principal and interest" and insert the following: "The before-named registered bonds, the amount of which in this event shall be paid to the holders thereof at maturity of the same."

Fourth amendment:

In section seven, line three, strike out "twelve," and insert "twenty."

Fifth amendment:

In same section, strike out all after the word, "steamships," to the end of the section, as follows:

And as a further additional security for the guaranteeing of the payment of said bonds in the event of loss of any of the aforesaid steamships, the said navigation company shall, during the continuance of said bonds, or any portion of the same, or any amount that may be due, toward the payment of said bonds, cause to be issued from time to time, policies of insurance against the dangers and perils of the sea, on each of the aforesaid seven steamers, by marine insurance companies of good standing, and made payable to the Postmaster General. The total of such policies shall be equal to the amount of bonds guaranteed and outstanding as aforesaid, and shall be to cover against loss of any and each of said steamships; and in case of loss, such amounts as may be received on said policies shall be held by the Postmaster General to the credit of said Navigation Company, but shall be payable to said company only whenever they may complete the said number of seven steamships, and have and keep them insured for the benefit of the United States as aforesaid; and in default of such insurance by said company, the Postmaster General shall have the right, and it shall be his duty, to insure the same at the expense of said company, and for the benefit of the United States.

Sixth amendment:

In section eight, line eleven, strike out "twelve" and insert "twenty."

Mr. PHELPS. I ask the gentleman from New Jersey to yield to me to move an amendment in the nature of an additional section.

Mr. HILL. I cannot yield now, as I desire first to make an explanation of the provisions of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The pending question is on the amendments which have just been read.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, this bill contemplates the establishing of an "American line of mail and emigrant passenger steamships between New York and one or more European ports." The Commercial Navigation Company of the State of New York propose to build at least seven first-class steamships, and when constructed shall be organized into and compose the United States mail steamship line, for proper conveyance of mails and passengers.

The bill also provides that in order that this line may be placed on a good basis, succeed, and obtain a nationality, the Postmaster General is empowered and authorized to contract with the "Commercial Navigation Company" for the weekly or semi-weekly conveyance of all European and foreign mails of the United States between New York and Bremen, touching at Southampton, England, or Liverpool, touching at Queenstown, for a term not exceeding twenty years.

That to insure the construction of the above-mentioned vessels within the time and in the manner hereinbefore provided, and the maintenance of the said line, the said Commercial Navigation Company may issue bonds to such an amount that the entire annual interest thereon shall not exceed the sum of $250,000, such bonds to be made payable at the expiration of the before-named twenty years, and the interest thereof to be made payable semi-annually, the principal and interest of such bonds to be made payable in coin of the United States. That for the protection of the holders of such bonds they shall be severally registered at the Post Office Department and certified by the chief clerk of the Department. And the Postmaster General shall receive all moneys for postage earned by the steamships of said company, and shall apply the same as far as needed to the payment of the semi-annual interest upon the before-named bonds, and shall retain the surplus after paying such interest, and shall invest the same quarterly in the securities of the United States to form a sinking fund, to be held solely for the benefit of the bondholders, and to be applied to the payment of the principal of such bonds. And whenever, and as soon as, such sinking fund shall equal in amount the entire principal of said bonds, then from that time forward the interest of said bonds shall be paid out of the income of such sinking fund, and the principal thereof out of the same fund at their maturity. And all postage earned after the time when said sinking fund shall be made up to the amount aforesaid shall belong to and be paid quarterly to the said company by the Postmaster General of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, these are the main features of the bill, and Congress may at any time alter, repeal, or amend them.

Never was there in the history of our Government a time when the absolute requirement of a mail and emigrant steam line to Europe was as important as now; yet, to-day, we have not one single steamship performing regular service to Europe under our flag. Foreign steamers do all our mail, passenger, and freight business, and we, the greatest Power on earth, see our Government dispatches, Government agents, mails, and passengers go to and fro to England, France, Prussia, &c., under the flag and protection of Powers who are in no case our superiors.

The Postmaster General's reports, the last six years, show that we have paid away over two million dollars for the transportation of our mails by foreigners, all of which could have been, and should have been, paid to our own people. Besides this, it is estimated that merchants and emigrants have paid out over fifty millions more for freight and passage money, all of which also went into the pockets of foreign ship-owners. This company intend these ships shall be built in this country, thus fostering American industry and giving work to our own mechanics and laborers. It is their purpose to so construct these vessels that passengers will have every possible comfort and convenience.

The manner in which emigrants are brought to our shores on foreign ships is an outrage on humanity, and ought to attract the attention not only of Congress but the whole nation. The Commissioners of Emigration of New York city, in their report in January last, state:

"That of eleven thousand two hundred and sixty-four steerage passengers who arrived in 1865 in our port from Hamburg, two hundred and twenty-eight died on the passage; of fourteen thousand three hundred and thirty-five who arrived in 1866, died on the passage three hundred and eighty-nine; and of eight thousand seven hundred and eighty-eight arrived in 1867, not less than one hundred and ninety-nine died on the passage."

They further state:

"In our opinion it is of great importance for the interest of humanity, in which both Europe and this country are concerned, and as a question of political economy, that the transportation of emigrants across the Atlantic to this port should be confined to steam vessels, as they not only convey the passengers more comfortably and land them in better health, but, in consequence of the regularity and rapidity of the passage, save an immense amount of labor for their own benefit and that of this country."

"One of the greatest sources of the nation's income in wealth and population has been the vast emigration from Europe, and it should, therefore, be protected by appropriate national legislation. Every principle of public policy looking to the welfare of the country, as well as every sentiment of humanity, demands this at the hands of Congress."

"Under the present system the emigrants are treated more like beasts of burden than like human beings, starved and crowded together in ill-ventilated, ill-fitted, ill-supplied, and ill-manned vessels. The arrival of an emigrant ship in our ports, if it does not bring disease and pestilence among us, often occasions great apprehension and alarm, disturbing the regular business of our city, and creating an indefinite prejudice against the worthy emigrant, instead of extending to him, as he truly deserves, a kind and hearty welcome."

"The Commissioners of Emigration are the trustees as well of the emigrant as of the State of New York and of the United States in general. Although appointed by the State authority for State purposes, their line of duty is not confined to the boundaries of the State, but extends over the whole country, inasmuch as they have to encourage and protect the emigrant until he reaches his new home. It would betray a narrow-mindedness, of which no member of this board is guilty, if they did not look at emigration from this national point of view. Whenever they succeed in doing away with a grievance or achieving a result favorable to the emigrants it is a national gain, and an advantage won for the whole country."

"Hence every consideration in relation to the comfort and protection of the emigrant is of a national character, and demands the serious attention of a good and enlightened statesmanship."

"FREDERICK KAPP,
"PHILIP BISSINGER, Commissioners."

"NEW YORK, January 21, 1868."

The value to our country of these emigrants cannot be overlooked nor overestimated. Many thousands of good men are prevented from coming here on account of the horrors of the sea voyage in being confined in these miserable ships used for this purpose, about which there has been so much complaint of late. The Commercial Navigation Company intend to meet this difficulty and so construct their ships as to make it comfortable for emigrant passengers. By the introduction into this country of hundreds of thousands of emigrants who beg and desire to come over and unite with us in enjoying our liberties and blessings, once here it would not be long before they would materially aid us in paying our national debt and make us good citizens, for with their industry and frugality they would soon have their little homes dotted all over the land, as they are in many parts of my district, their occupants esteemed and respected; and I doubt not the same can be said of most of the other congressional districts. By the last census the money value to the country of every emigrant is ascertained to be $1,080.

The State of Maine pays twenty-five dollars for every emigrant between fifteen and fifty years of age that settles in that State for one year, for the reason to encourage emigration to the State and help build it up. European emigration has done much to help build up this country and make it what it is, and should be encouraged by every means at our disposal.

Combinations have been made by the foreign lines to monopolize the American trade, and drive out all transient steamers that may be in their ports for freight and passengers; it is said that it is almost impossible for transient American steamers to get a berth at their docks, except at the extreme end of the wharf. They make their boasts on the other side of the waters, that they can run off any American line; but a line of American steamers owned by a company that is in some way indorsed by the Government could not be so easily run off, would be respected, and its rights regarded and secured.

The European Governments, most of them, foster and assist their lines of steamers, thus giving them a nationality. The Cunard line has been heavily subsidized, and receives yearly a large amount of money from their Government. The French line is largely subsidized, and has also a large loan of money from the Government. The Bremen line has a large reserved fund. The Inman line has a large number of fine steamships and quite a surplus. The Hamburg line is also well established, with a reserved fund. Against such lines an American line will have to contend at its start; but, with the knowledge to the European world that it carries the United States mail and is indorsed by the Government, it would not be long before it would be permanently established, and no doubt outstrip all other steamship lines now doing business on the great waters. Now, the Commercial Navigation Company do not ask for any subsidy from the Government; all they ask is to carry the United States mail between New York and the European ports mentioned, and the compensation to be received is the postage, in accordance with the act of January 9, 1858. It is but right that Congress should foster this enterprise, and encourage it by thus lending its aid.

By the report of the Postmaster General for the fiscal year 1865, it would appear that $405,479 was paid to foreign steamship lines for postage of the United States mail matter to England and Europe; in 1866, $465,979; in 1867, $455,362.

By these reports we see how safe and secure the payment of the bonds of the Commercial Navigation Company are made by the postal money that will accumulate in the hands of the Postmaster General for the mail services performed by this company, which now, amounting yearly to nearly five hundred thousand dollars, is taken out of the country and paid into the hands of foreign ship-owners.

This large amount is received and paid out, though the rates of postage have been wisely reduced, by the exertions of the present Postmaster General, to half, or nearly half, the previous rates.

The Post Office Department and the Government are entirely dependent upon steamships sailing under foreign flags for the safe conveyance of the mails, their dispatches, diplomatic agents, and bearers of dispatches.

To one line alone of English steamships, which is fostered and assisted by the English Government, the Postmaster General, by his report, appears to have been compelled to pay for postal service for a single year, for want of American steamships, the sum of $213,330, and the last few years nearly two million dollars. During the late rebellion it is estimated the loss of more than twenty million dollars was sustained by the ship-owners and others interested in commerce in the destruction of vessels and freights by the so-called confederate cruisers, fitted out and manned and sent to sea from England, a country whose steamships now carry the United States mails; and since the war was over this same Government have imprisoned our citizens, at least our naturalized citizens, which is contrary to the law of nations, and only a few days ago the last of these released from prison. Our natural pride should forbid this aiding and fostering lines of steamships belonging to a country who have directly and indirectly aided our enemies, and unlawfully imprisoned our citizens.

Mr. Speaker, I hope this bill will pass, its provisions be faithfully carried out, a line of steamers established that will be a credit to our country, and fully compete with any other line now in existence, being thoroughly American in build, in management, and control, and henceforth the United States mails be carried over the ocean by vessels bearing our nation's flag.

Mr. MILLER. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. HILL. Only for a question.

Mr. MILLER. I ask the gentleman whether this bill creates any liability on the part of the Government of the United States?

Mr. HILL. It does not.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from New Jersey to the last sentence in the bill. It is there provided that Congress may at any time hereafter, during the period of twenty years, and having a due regard to the rights of the said company, alter, repeal, or amend this act, and it shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage. The question I rise to ask is whether that language is intended to enable Congress or the Government at any time to terminate or abandon this long contract of twenty years. If that be the meaning of the clause I wish to suggest an amendment to make it distinct and clear. If that be not the design it seems to me this language is of no practical value, and that the bill is then one that ought not to receive the sanction of this House. The amendment I would suggest is to make the last sentence read as follows:

And Congress may, at any time hereafter during the period of twenty years, terminate or abandon any contract with said company on the part of the United States, and having a due regard to the accrued rights of the said company.

By moving this amendment I do not propose to commit myself to the bill.

Mr. HILL. I will yield to have that amendment offered, and then demand the previous question.

Mr. PHELPS. I trust the gentleman before calling for the previous question will yield to me to offer an amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. A bill of this kind ought to be discussed.

Mr. HILL. I will yield to the gentleman for a moment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman from New Jersey will permit some discussion of this bill. It is a matter of great importance, and is the initiation of a new system, one that ought not to be passed by this House without due consideration.

So far as I am personally concerned, I will say that anything I can conscientiously do for the promotion of our navigation interests I will be glad to do; but there are matters in this bill which I never could agree to. I think amendments may be suggested which perhaps the gentleman will agree to. One objection is in reference to the first section. I would like to know whether it is the intention to retain accumulated mail matter for the purpose of being sent by this line? There is nothing in this bill which would prevent the Post Office Department from keeping back letters, which otherwise might have gone three or four days in advance, waiting for the sailing of this line.

Mr. HILL. What amendment does the gentleman from Illinois propose?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I wish to submit to the gentleman this proviso, to come in at the end of the last section:

Provided, That no letters or mail matter shall be detained for the purpose of being sent by this line.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Does not my colleague know that the Postmaster General has no right to detain any mail matter unless he is expressly authorized to do so? What is the use of this proviso?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. My colleague will understand that this very bill gives to the Postmaster General very wide authority to contract, and under it he might contract that all the letters and mail matter should be compelled to go by this line. There is certainly no objection, even if what my colleague says is true, to placing this provision in the bill.

Mr. PHELPS. Will the gentleman from New Jersey allow me a single question?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I understand the gentleman is willing to have this amendment offered.

The SPEAKER. It will then be regarded as pending.

Mr. HILL. I have no idea that the Postmaster General can retain letters.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that it is allowed to be offered.

Mr. HILL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DELANO.]

Mr. DELANO. I wish to direct the attention of the House to two features of this bill. The first is that it secures to a company chartered by the New York Legislature a monopoly of the carrying of the mails for the long period of twenty years. The company has yet to enter upon the performance of that duty. The next feature is that it guarantees to that company for that period of time all the sea and inland postage. The gentleman says it gives no bonus. He is mistaken. According to his own figures it gives a bonus, at present rates of carrying the mail, for sea postage alone, of some four hundred thousand dollars per annum. Now, sir, at present it costs the Government the sea postage. But this bill proposes to add as a part of the bonus to this company, not perpetually, but for twenty years, the inland postage. I do not know what the amount now is, but I am credibly informed that it is not less than $50,000 per annum; and who can tell what it may amount to in the expansion of this country during the next twenty years?

Mr. WINDOM. I desire to ask a question at this point. I understand the gentleman to say that this bill gives a bonus of $400,000 for sea postage. I do not so understand it. If it is so I am wholly mistaken. If I understand it we are not paying a bonus of $400,000. We are now paying the sea postage only to foreign vessels under the British flag; and if we pay it to this American company are we not simply paying for the labor they do?

Mr. DELANO. I stated, I believe, that all we paid now to the foreign company was the sea postage. I have been informed by a friend of this measure, who is not a member of the House, that the sea postage alone amounts to about three hundred thousand dollars; but from the particulars given by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HILL] in his remarks it seems to be more than that.

Mr. HILL. The inland and sea postage is $405,000.

Mr. DELANO. Now, what I wish to bring before the House is the propriety of some limitation to this bonus, as it is likely to increase in the progress of time. I have therefore prepared a proviso, which I desire to offer as an amendment to the third section, as follows:

Provided, That when the receipts of said navigation company from sea postage under any contract to be made in pursuance of this act shall equal or exceed the sum of $350,000 per annum, then the right of said company to receive inland postage shall cease and determine, and said company shall only receive the sea postage.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New Jersey allow this to be offered?

Mr. HILL. I do not like to have too many amendments offered to the bill. I will state that in 1858—

The SPEAKER. The five minutes of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DELANO] have expired. The gentleman from New Jersey resumes the floor, and the Chair understands he declines to allow the amendment to be offered.

Mr. HILL. On the 14th of June, 1858, Congress passed an act under which the mails are now carried, which limits the compensation to the sea and inland postage when carried by American vessels and the sea postage when carried by foreign vessels.

Mr. PHELPS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. I decline to yield further. This law was passed on the 14th of June, 1858, and has been in existence nine years, and yet no company has been found in this country to organize under it and carry the mails. Why? Because if they secured a contract for carrying the mails for one year, they had no security that they could get it for two, three, or five years, and no company of individuals are going to invest five, six, seven or eight million dollars in an enterprise of this sort without some pledge or security of a longer contract. I consider the bill a just bill, and I do not like this amendment proposing to put these American steamers on the same level with the foreigners who have been carrying the mails for years past, and who have been doing all they can, directly and indirectly, to injure our commerce and destroy our vessels and do us injury. Sir, I cannot consent to that amendment being offered, and I move the previous question on the bill.

Mr. PHELPS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HILL. I will yield to the gentleman for a moment.

Mr. PHELPS. I would ask the gentleman from New Jersey whether the Commercial Navigation Company of the State of New Jersey—"a corporation existing under the laws of the State of New York"—has at this moment a single steamship afloat? Has it now built or has it in process of construction a solitary steamer?

I wish to ask the gentleman a further question, and that is, whether the provision in the fourth section authorizing the registration at the Post Office Department of the Government of the bonds to be issued by this Commercial Navigation Company for the purpose of enabling it to build the seven proposed ocean steamships, together with the further provision constituting in effect the Postmaster General a trustee or receiver for the payment of the semi-annual interest on these bonds out of accrued postages, and for the ultimate payment of the principal of the bonds by means of a sinking fund, whether these provisions do not amount to a constructive guarantee of the bonds? I find the bill originally did, in express terms, authorize the Postmaster General "to guaranty the payment and interest of the bonds to the amount of not more than $3,600,000."

I shall ask the gentleman from New Jersey to allow me to offer two additional sections to this bill by way of amendment, and I hope he will not insist upon the previous question without permitting this amendment to be read. The bill confers exclusive privileges upon a single corporation in New York—a corporation that has no claims, that has its ships yet to build and its capital to raise, and that by the aid of congressional legislation and patronage, in anticipation of which, so far as appears, the corporation was organized. For my part, Mr. Speaker, I am glad to accord to New York every advantage that her position, enterprise, and capital entitle her to. But I am not disposed to yield to a New York enterprise special privileges by way of Government patronage, when the same privileges are denied to enterprises of my own State which have established already claims upon the protection of the Government, if protection is to be shown anywhere, by their persevering and successful struggles in upholding the American flag upon the high seas.

A Maryland corporation, the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, has maintained for more than two years past a line of ocean steamers, American built and American registered, between the ports of Baltimore and Liverpool. The same corporation is joint owner, with the North German Lloyds, of a line of Clyde-built steamers between Baltimore and Bremen, touching at Southampton, the identical route contemplated by this bill. Another Maryland corporation, the Baltimore and Havana Steamship Company, is struggling successfully to maintain another American line of ocean steamers, American built and American registered. Neither of these lines has yet received a helping hand from the Government, nor a single dollar from its Treasury by way of subsidy. They are the natural result of the natural causes which combine to concentrate the trade of the great West and South in the city of Baltimore, the destined metropolis of those sections. We never have asked, and do not ask now, for any exclusive privileges or special patronage; but I do claim for these lines the equal and exact justice of being placed upon the same footing with an experimental enterprise which, from the first moment of its existence, begins to lean upon the arm of the national Government.

The first additional section of the amendment which I hold in my hand extends the same privileges and advantages which are secured to the Commercial Navigation Company of New York in regard to contracts and compensation for carrying the mails, and also in regard to the arrangements for building additional steamers by the issue of registered bonds, under the auspices of the Post Office Department, to the two Maryland corporations which I have named, the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company and the Baltimore and Havana Steamship Company.

The other section provides for extending precisely the same privileges to any other company in the United States now or hereafter incorporated.

If the gentleman insists on refusing to hear the amendment reported by the Clerk, I hope the House will not sustain the demand for the previous question.

Mr. HILL. I must resume the floor.

Mr. PHELPS. Will the gentleman allow me to offer the amendment I have indicated?

Mr. HILL. I cannot.

Mr. DELANO. I have modified my amendment, and the gentleman from New Jersey allows me to offer it. I move to add at the end of section three the following:

Provided, That when the receipts of said navigation company from sea postage under any contract to be made in pursuance of this act shall equal or exceed the sum of $400,000 per annum, then the right of said company to receive the inland postages shall cease and determine, and said company shall only receive sea postage.

Mr. HILL. I will allow that amendment to be offered; and I now yield to the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I simply desire to say to the House, that they may understand this bill, that there is no subsidy in it whatever. Various schemes and petitions have come before the committee asking us to subsidize different lines, but we have refused to do it. We have done in this bill what we think is a very fair thing. We propose to pay the postages to our own ships, if they will carry the mails, instead of paying them to foreigners, who are doing all they can to drive our ships from the ocean. That is all there is in this bill, and I move the previous question upon it.

The question was taken upon seconding the previous question; and upon a division there were—ayes sixty-three.

Before the noes were counted,

Mr. PHELPS called for tellers upon seconding the previous question.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HILL and Mr. PHELPS were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes sixty-five, noes not counted.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I move that the bill and pending amendments be laid upon the table, and on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the negative—ayes 36, nays 97, not voting 56; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Archer, Baker, Baldwin, Beatty, Boyer, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Burr, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Eggleson, Eldridge, Glossbrenner, Grover, Richard D. Hubbard, Knott, Mallory, Marshall, McCullough, Nunn, Paine, Phelps, Poislley, Ross, Scofield, Stone, Thomas, Lawrence S. Trimble, Upson, Van Auken, Elihu B. Washburne, and Welker—36.

NAYS—Messrs. Ames, Delos R. Ashley, Barnes, Beaman, Benjamin, Benton, Blaine, Blair, Brooks, Calk, Chanler, Churchill, Reader W. Washburn, William Williams, John T. Wilson, Windom, and Woodward—97.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Axtell, Bailey, Banks, Barnum, Beck, Bingham, Boutwell, Butler, Cary, Culum, Delano, Dixon, Dodge, Driggs, Finney, Fox, Haight, Hawkins, Asahel W. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Wood, and Woodbridge—56.

So the motion to lay on the table was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon the amendments reported from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads; and being taken, they were agreed to.

The next question was upon the amendment of Mr. SHELLABARGER, to amend the last clause of section eight so that it will read as follows:

And Congress may at any time hereafter during the period of twenty years terminate or abandon any contract of the United States made with such company, add having a due regard to the accrued rights of the said company, alter, repeal, or amend this act, and it shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next question was on the amendment of Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, to add to section two the following:

Provided, That no letters or mail matter shall be detained for the purpose of being sent by this line.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next question was on the amendment of Mr. DELANO, to add to section three the following:

Provided, That when the receipts of said navigation company from sea postages under any contract to be made in pursuance of this act shall equal or exceed the sum of $400,000 per annum, then the right of said company to receive the inland postages shall cease and determine, and the said company shall only receive the sea postages.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Upon that question I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. HILL, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Leave of absence until Monday next was granted to Mr. MCCARTHY.

Leave of absence for two days was granted to Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana.

Leave of absence for ten days was granted to Mr. SITGREAVES.

Indefinite leave of absence was granted to Mr. HUNTER.

ELIZABETH CAVALIER.

Mr. HALSEY obtained leave to withdraw the papers of Elizabeth Cavalier, now before the Committee of Claims, leaving copies of them on file.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired. The House, on the 27th of May, ordered by unanimous consent that a bill (H. R. No. 929) to promote American commerce, reported by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ELIOT,] from the Committee on Commerce, should be taken up after the morning hour on this day, the second Wednesday in June. That bill is now before the House, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] is entitled to the floor.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 601) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1869.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill (H. R. No. 176) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for carrying the mails from the United States to foreign ports, and for other purposes," approved March 25, 1864, with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

APPROPRIATION FOR PUBLIC BUILDINGS, ETC.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a communication from the chief of engineers, with estimate of funds necessary to supply deficiencies in the appropriation for public buildings and grounds for the year ending June 30, 1868; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

NAVAJO AND UTE INDIANS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a telegram from Lieutenant General Sherman, relative to the removal of the Navajo and Ute Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS ON PURCHASE OF ALASKA.

Mr. LAFLIN reported, from the Committee on Printing, the following resolution; on which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the House eight thousand extra copies of the majority and minority reports on the treaty with Russia; and for the use of the State Department two thousand copies of part two of Executive Document No. 177.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. LAFLIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDING IN NEW YORK CITY.

Mr. FARNSWORTH, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, a bill (H. R. No. 1214) to provide for the erection of a building for a post office and United States courts in the city of New York; which was read a first and second time, recommitted, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SCOFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommitted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am directed by the committee of conference on the bill (H. R. No. 601) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1869, to submit a report.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 601) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1869, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from their disagreement to the third, twenty-fourth, twenty-fifth, thirty-seventh, and thirty-eighth amendments of the Senate, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from their thirty-fifth and thirty-sixth amendments.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the eighth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same, with the following amendment:

Strike out all of said amendment and insert in lieu the following:

Provided, That the civil engineer and naval storekeeper at the several navy-yards shall be appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, and the persons employed at the several navy-yards to superintend the mechanical departments, and heretofore known as master mechanics, master carpenters, master joiners, master blacksmiths, master boiler-makers, master sailmakers, master plumbers, master painters, master caulkers, master masons, master boat-makers, master sparmakers, master blockmakers, master laborers, and the superintendents of rope-walks shall be men skilled in their several duties and appointed from civil life, and shall not be appointed from the officers of the Navy.

And the Senate agree to the same.

E. B. WASHBURN,

N. P. BANKS,

Managers on the part of the House.

L. M. MORRILL,

ROSCOE CONKLING,

J. W. NYE,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I demand the previous question on the adoption of the report.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the report was adopted.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RECUSANT WITNESS.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to yield to me.

Mr. ELIOT. Yes, if it takes no time.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I think it will take no time.

Mr. ALLISON. We will hear what it is first.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee of managers be instructed hereby to examine the witness Woolley immediately, to the end that if he shall answer as required by this House the questions for the refusal to answer which he was adjudged in contempt of this House he may no longer be deprived of his liberty as a citizen.

Mr. ELIOT. I decline to yield for the resolution to be offered.

APPEALS FROM COURT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. CHURCHILL. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to yield to me for the purpose of moving to take from the Speaker's table for reference to the Committee on the Judiciary

Senate bill No. 164, to provide for appeals from the Court of Claims, and for other purposes.

Mr. ELIOT. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. BROOKS. I am afraid of that class of cases in reference to the courts, for I do not forget the McCordle case.

Mr. CHURCHILL. It is only for reference.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is a bill I think that should go to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. SCOFIELD. The gentleman cannot be aware of the character of the bill. It has nothing to do with claims. It only provides for the appeal of decisions of the Court of Claims to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not object.

The bill was taken up, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BROOKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RECUSANT WITNESS.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask my colleague to yield to me.

Mr. ELIOT. If it takes no time.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say, for the information of gentlemen on the other side, that a meeting of the committee of managers has been called for to-morrow morning, at which time Mr. Woolley will be examined.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I insist that it is all wrong and unjust to keep a man for forty-eight hours, indeed for three days, in close confinement—

Mr. ELIOT. I do not yield.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I solemnly protest against this outrage upon the liberty of the citizen.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ELIOT. Mr. Speaker, before I proceed to discuss the bill before the House I shall, with the leave of the House, make a statement. Notice has been given of an intention to make a motion in reference to the tax bill. I suppose it is the desire in some form or other to have the judgment of the House whether that bill is to be continued with or laid over. I have no desire to interfere with any action in that direction, and if I may have the right to-morrow, after the morning hour, as I have it now, the bill of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] to come after the pending bill, I will yield to that arrangement.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope there will be no objection to the gentleman's having his bill in the same position to-morrow morning that it is in now. That, of course, will not prevent my moving to-morrow morning to postpone the consideration of that bill to another time.

The SPEAKER. The bill reported by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] having been made a special order by unanimous consent has priority over all other special orders by usage of the House; but it can be postponed by a majority vote to a certain time, having the same right of priority.

Mr. SCHENCK. If it is postponed till to-morrow morning it will be in the same position then as it occupies now.

The SPEAKER. It will. After the gentleman from Massachusetts shall have concluded his remarks the Chair will entertain the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.]

Mr. ELIOT. There is a bill reported by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. O'NEILL,] which was ordered to be considered after this.

The SPEAKER. That will be governed by the position of this bill as an appendage thereto. It will be subject to the same order.

Mr. SPALDING. There are two short appropriation bills which it is very necessary the House should consider. I would be glad to be permitted to have them taken up and acted upon. They will not both of them occupy an hour.

The SPEAKER. The motion to go into Committee of the Whole would have priority, because that has been ordered by a suspension of the rules to be made every day after the morning hour, subject only to unanimous consent for the assignment of bills.

Mr. ELIOT. I move that the further consideration of the pending bill be postponed, reserving the same rights, till to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to.

INTERNAL TAX BILL.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the tax bill.

Mr. BUTLER. I rise to a question of order. I desire to inquire if it is possible for the House to deal with the tax bill otherwise than in Committee of the Whole, except by voting down the motion just made? because I desire at some time, and now, if I can, to move to postpone the bill. But I suppose it cannot be done at this time.

The SPEAKER. It cannot be done during the pendency of the motion to suspend the rules, which suspends the rule authorizing the motion to be made for the postponement of this bill. If the motion to go into Committee of the Whole should be voted down the gentleman's motion will then be in order, as will be seen by page 182 of the Digest, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

"A special order may be postponed by a majority vote, and according to the rules whenever the time arrives for the consideration of a special order in Committee of the Whole the same may be postponed by a vote in the House."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to suspend the rules and going into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. This will be a test vote. I understand that the Committee of Ways and Means—

Mr. SCHENCK. I object to any debate.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 82, nays 57, not voting 50; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, James M. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Beatty, Beck, Benton, Bingham, Bromwell, Brooks, Broomall, Buckland, Cake, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Cornell, Covode, Cullom, Delano, Eckley, Ela, Farnsworth, Ferry, Garfield, Gravelly, Griswold, Harding, Higby, Hill, Hooper, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Judd, Kelsey, Ketcham, Kitchen, Koonz, George V. Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Lynch, Marshall, Maynard, McClurg, Miller, Moorhead, Morrell, Morrissey, Mullins, Newcomb, Niblack, Paine, Phelps, Pile, Plants, Polsley, Pomeroy, Raun, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Aaron F. Stevens, Stewart, Stokes, Taffe, Taylor, John Trimble, Twichell, Robert T. Van Horn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Wolker, William Williams, and John T. Wilson—82.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Baldwin, Barnes, Beaman, Benjamin, Blair, Burr, Butler, Churchill, Dawes, Dodge, Donnelly, Eldridge, Eliot, Ferriss, Fields, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Grover, Holman, Hotchkiss, Hulburd, Hunter, Julian, Knott, Laffin, Loughridge, Mallory, McCormick, McCullough, Mercer, Moore, Nicholson, Nunn, Price, Randall, Robertson, Robinson, Ross, Sitgreaves, Spalding, Starkweather, Thaddeus Stevens, Stone, Taber, Thomas, Lawrence S. Trimble, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Van Auker, Van Trump, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, and Woodward—57.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, Axtell, Bailey, Barnum, Blaine, Boutwell, Boyer, Cary, Chanler, Dixon, Driggs, Eggleston, Finney, Fox, Haight, Halsey, Hawkins, Asahel W. Hubbard, Humphrey, Johnson, Jones, Kelley, Kerr, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Marvin, McCarthy, Mungen, Myers, O'Neill, Orth, Perham, Peters, Pike, Poland, Prayn, Selys, Shanks, Smith, Burr Van Horn, Van Wyck, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Wood, and Woodbridge—50.

So the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) and resumed the consideration of the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 1060) to reduce into one act and to amend the laws relating to internal taxes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will resume the reading of the bill where it was suspended last night.

The following paragraph was read:

Dealers in horses shall each pay ten dollars. Any person whose business it is to buy or sell horses or mules shall be regarded as a dealer in horses.

No amendment was offered, and the next paragraph was read, as follows:

Cattle brokers whose annual sales do not exceed $10,000 shall each pay ten dollars; and when the annual sales exceed $10,000, shall pay, in addition, one dollar for each $1,000 in excess of $10,000; and the tax on such excess shall be assessed and paid in the same manner as in the case of wholesale dealers. Every person whose business it is to buy or sell or deal in cattle, hogs, or sheep shall be considered as a cattle broker.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to offer the following amendment:

Page 109, line four hundred and seventeen, strike out all after the word "dollars" to and including the word "dealers," on line four hundred and nineteen, as follows: "And the tax on such excess shall be assessed and paid in the same manner as in the case of wholesale dealers."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the next paragraph, as follows:

Butchers whose annual sales exceed $1,000 shall each pay ten dollars. Every person whose business it is to sell butcher's meat at retail shall be regarded as a butcher, and shall not be required to pay the special tax as a retail dealer on account of selling other articles at the same shop, stall, or premises; but butchers who shall sell butcher's meat exclusively, by themselves or agents, traveling from place to place, and not from any shop, stall, or stand, shall be required to pay five dollars only.

Mr. SCHENCK. I offer the following amendment from the Committee of Ways and Means:

Page 110, line four hundred and twenty-seven, after the word "premises," insert the words "unless such sales exceed $5,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next paragraph was read, as follows:

Dealers in canned and preserved meats and vegetables, whose annual sales exceed $1,000 and do not exceed $5,000, shall each pay ten dollars, and when the annual sales exceed $5,000 shall pay, in addition, two dollars for each $1,000 in excess of $5,000. Every person who prepares and puts up, in cans, bottles, or other packages, for sale, meats, fish, shell-fish, fruits, vegetables, sauces, sirups, jams, jellies, or prepared mustard, shall be regarded as a dealer in canned and preserved meats and vegetables.

Mr. ROBINSON. Would it be in order to go back to the paragraph in regard to horse dealers? I desire to ask a question of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee can only go back by unanimous consent.

Mr. BEAMAN. I object to going back.

The Clerk read the next paragraph, as follows:

Owners of stallions and jackasses kept for the use of mares shall pay ten dollars for each animal so kept and used. Every person who keeps for pay a stallion or a jackass for such use shall be regarded as the owner thereof, and shall furnish to the assessor or assistant assessor a statement containing a brief description of the animal, its age, and the place or places where used, or to be used. All accounts, notes, or demands made in consideration of the use of any such stallion or jackass, the owner thereof not having paid the tax as aforesaid, shall be void.

Mr. MULLINS. I move to insert after the word "jackass," in line four hundred and forty-four, the words "or any 'visible admixture' thereof." [Laughter.]

The amendment was rejected.

No further amendment was offered, and the Clerk read the following paragraph:

Proprietors of places of public amusement shall pay therefor: for those of the first class a special tax of $200 each, and for those of the second class a special tax of twenty dollars each. Every building, tent, or other place occupied or used exclusively or chiefly, for dramatic or operatic representations or performances, or for concerts, balls, masquerades, or exhibitions, or for feats of horsemanship or acrobatic sports, for admission to which money is paid, shall be rated as a place of public amusement of the first class. Rooms or halls which are only occasionally hired or used for dramatic or operatic representations or performances, or for concerts, balls, or exhibitions, for admission to which money is paid, shall be rated as places of amusement of the second class. Circuses, or other public amusements or performances which move from place to place, shall pay a special tax the same as places of amusement of the first class; and the special tax receipt therefor shall be framed by the person to whom issued, and shall be hung up at the place of entrance to such circus or other place of amusement, so that the same can be easily seen and read by every person visiting such place of performance. And every proprietor or manager of such circus, public amusement, or performance, shall give a bond in the sum of $10,000, with sureties, to the assessor of the district where such person resides, conditioned that he will comply with all the requirements of law pertaining to such business; and no receipt shall issue to any person for such special tax until such bond shall have been given by such person to and approved by the said assessor. And every such proprietor or manager who shall neglect or refuse to display the proper special tax receipt in the manner hereinbefore required shall, on conviction thereof, be fined $500. And where such circus or other public amusement or performance is had or given in a tent or other temporary or movable shelter or inclosure, the capacity of such tent as provided in the section of this act shall be stated in the application for registry with the assistant assessor, and shall be entered by the collector on his receipt for the special tax. Proprietors of menageries, or other shows not hereinbefore enumerated and described, for the exhibition of, or admission to which, money is paid, shall each be taxed as proprietors of public amusements of the second class, unless such menagerie or show shall be accompanied by, or consist in part of, exhibitions of theatrical or dramatic performances, in which case they shall be taxed the same as places of amusement of the first class. Every proprietor of any circus, menagerie, or other show, who removes his exhibition from place to place, shall be required by the assessor or assistant assessor of any collection district in which such amusement is given or exhibited to produce the receipt showing that this special tax therefor has been duly paid to the assessor of some district within the United States, within the current year; and if it shall appear that such tax has not been paid, or has not been paid within thirty days after the last day of May in such year, or upon neglect or refusal to produce such tax receipt when so demanded by the proper officer, the party so delinquent shall be liable to a penalty of $10,000, and shall be subject to and on conviction for the offense be fined not less than $10,000 nor more than $50,000, and be imprisoned not less than three months nor more than two years.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to offer the following amendment:

Page 112, lines four hundred and eighty-seven and four hundred and eighty-eight, strike out the words "the section of."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ELA. I move to insert after the word "class," in line four hundred and sixty-four, the following proviso:

Provided, That when the net receipts of such room or hall shall not exceed $100 no tax shall be required.

It is so manifest that some restriction ought to be made in this matter that I take it the very statement of the amendment is sufficient.

Mr. PAINE. I would inquire of the gentleman if he refers to the net receipts for a single evening?

Mr. ELA. The net receipts for the year.

Mr. PAINE. I suggest to the gentleman that he should modify his amendment in that way.

Mr. ELA. I will modify it so as to read, "when the net annual receipts," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the next paragraph, as follows:

Proprietors, owners, agents, or lessees, of any place or object, not included in the above classes, for the privilege of seeing which entrance money, fee, or reward is demanded or received, shall, where the entrance money, fee, or reward demanded or received for each adult person does not exceed the sum of twenty-five cents, each pay a special tax therefor of fifty dollars; and when such entrance money exceeds twenty-five cents, $100. And in addition to the penalties, otherwise provided, for non-payment of special taxes, the place or object belonging to, or leased, or held by any such person, shall be seized and forfeited to the United States.

Mr. SCHENCK. I offer the following amendment from the Committee of Ways and Means:

Page 113, line five hundred and fourteen, strike out all after and including the word "or" where it last occurs down to the end of the paragraph, as follows:

Or object, not included in the above classes, for the privilege of seeing which entrance money, fee, or reward is demanded or received, shall, where the entrance money, fee, or reward demanded or received for each adult person does not exceed the sum of twenty-five cents, each pay a special tax therefor of fifty dollars; and when such entrance money exceeds twenty-five cents, $100. And in addition to the penalties otherwise provided for the non-payment of special taxes, the place or object or objects belonging to, or leased or held by any such person, shall be seized and forfeited to the United States.

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

Not included in the above classes, for the privilege of entering or visiting which money, fee, or reward is demanded or received, shall, when such money, fee, or reward demanded or received for each adult person does not exceed the sum of twenty-five cents each, pay a special tax therefor of fifty dollars; and when such money, fee, or reward exceeds twenty-five cents, $100: Provided, That school exhibitions, readings, lectures, art exhibitions not moved from place to place, agricultural or horticultural exhibitions, or fairs for the benefit of any benevolent enterprise, or sanitary, charitable, or religious association, and fairs and exhibitions of any incorporated mechanical or scientific associations, shall not be required to pay a special tax.

The amendment was agreed to.

No further amendment was offered.

The next paragraph was read, as follows:

Jugglers shall each pay twenty-five dollars. Every person who, for pay, gives exhibitions of tricks by sleight-of-hand, or who, as an astrologer or fortune-teller, pretends to foretell future events, shall be regarded as a juggler. Every juggler who goes from place to place giving his exhibitions, or performing as such, shall be required to produce the receipt for his special tax on demand of the proper assessor or assistant assessor, and shall be liable to the same penalties for any violation of the law as are provided against proprietors of circuses or menageries in like cases.

Mr. BUTLER. I move to amend this paragraph by inserting after the words "pretends to foretell future events," the words "or whoever for pay claims to act as a spiritual medium, or gives sittings or exhibitions in conjunction therewith." There is a very large number of persons who are undoubtedly honest believers in spiritual communications. There is another large class of persons who do not honestly so believe, but who claim to do so, and give exhibitions, and pretend to give information derived from the spirits. They now constitute substantially the only class of fortune-tellers or jugglers that we have. I propose that they shall be included in the class of jugglers to be taxed. I do not suppose the amendment will meet with any opposition.

Mr. MULLINS. I suppose the gentleman does not intend to embrace in this class those who are spiritually commissioned from above and specially enlightened to preach the gospel as ministers?

Mr. BUTLER. Oh, no.

The question was then taken upon the amendment of Mr. BUTLER; and upon a division there were—ayes 36, noes 29; no quorum voting.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have no objection to have this amendment regarded as adopted in order to have a vote taken upon it in the House.

Mr. SPALDING. I object to the amendment being adopted here.

Mr. HARDING. I hope it will be rejected.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BUTLER and Mr. RAUM were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 45, noes 51.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

No further amendment was offered.

The next paragraph was read, as follows:

Proprietors of bowling-alleys and billiard-rooms shall pay ten dollars for each alley or table. Every place or building where bowls are thrown or billiards played, and open to the public, with or without price, shall be regarded as a bowling-alley or billiard-room respectively.

Mr. LYNCH. I desire to move an amendment to this paragraph, to strike out "ten" and insert "twenty-five;" so that the clause will read:

Proprietors of bowling-alleys and billiard-rooms shall pay twenty-five dollars for each alley or table.

I notice by this bill that manufacturers of billiard-tables are required to pay a tax of twenty-five dollars, if their annual sales amount to $1,000. Now, I believe the profits from a bowling-alley or a billiard-table are very much larger than the profits upon $1,000 worth of these articles sold by the manufacturers. I think this amendment should be adopted.

Mr. ALLISON. It will be observed that we propose to charge a tax of ten dollars on each alley or billiard-table. I think that is a pretty liberal tax, and I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

The question was then taken upon the amendment of Mr. LYNCH; and, upon a division, there were—ayes 42, noes 39; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. LYNCH and Mr. ALLISON were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 53, noes 43.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BURR. I move to amend this paragraph by adding to it the following:

Provided, That persons keeping billiard-tables in their residences, and using or permitting the same to be used without charge for the use thereof, shall be taxed only ten dollars on each table so kept.

This paragraph as it now stands is perhaps of doubtful construction. Many persons keep billiard-tables in their private houses for their own amusement and gratification and that of their friends. Now, I want to guard against charging them the same amount that is charged against persons who keep tables as a matter of speculation, and for that purpose I have offered this amendment, for I think it is right. I am in favor of increasing the tax on tables kept for speculation; but I do not think the tax should be imposed upon tables kept merely for purposes of recreation or amusement. I suppose the answer will be that it is not intended to tax tables kept by persons in their private residences merely for amusement, because the words of this paragraph are "open to the public." But who shall say, if a dozen friends meet at the house of a gentleman who has one or more billiard-tables, and he opens the room to them, that it will not be held that he opens them to the public?

Mr. ALLISON. We have elsewhere provided that a tax of ten dollars shall be paid on a table not kept for hire, so that the amendment of the gentleman is not necessary.

Mr. BURR. Where is that provision?

Mr. ALLISON. On page 172, line thirty-three.

Mr. BURR. It will do no harm to add my amendment here to explain language which, as it stands, is indefinite.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BENTON. I move to amend by adding at the end of the paragraph the following:

Provided, That no tax shall be required in case of bowling-alleys furnished without charge by keepers of hotels for the use of their guests.

Mr. Chairman, I know that in many hotels bowling-alleys are provided without charge for the recreation of the guests. This is especially so among the mountains, where the hotels during the summer are largely patronized by people from all parts of the country. Bowling-alleys are provided that the guests may have exercise and amusement in this proper and reasonable way; and so far as my knowledge extends, no charge is made for the use of those alleys. To require the keepers of such hotels to pay a tax on the bowling-alleys thus provided without charge strikes me as unreasonable and outrageous. The case is very different in regard to billiard-saloons kept for profit in our cities and towns, because in them our lads and young men are educated to habits of indolence and frivolity which are injurious to the community. But it is very reasonable and necessary that the guests patronizing our large hotels among the mountains and in other places of summer resort should have an opportunity to indulge in healthful exercise and recreation; and the hotel-keepers, so far as I am aware, provide bowling-alleys for this purpose without making any charge for their use.

Mr. LYNCH. Does not the gentleman know that in all these places of summer resort the proprietors charge exorbitant prices for the use of their bowling-alleys, as well as for everything else—much more than is charged in our ordinary hotels?

Mr. BENTON. Mr. Chairman, I do not know any such thing; nor do I believe that such is the fact. My knowledge is directly to the contrary. So far as I have been able to ascertain, the guests of the hotels at our places of summer resort are allowed to use the bowling-alleys without a single cent of charge.

The gentleman talks about the "exorbitant charges" of our hotel-keepers among the mountains. Why, sir, considering the disadvantages and inconveniences under which they labor in furnishing their guests with the necessities and comforts and luxuries of life, I say that they are most reasonable in their charges, though of course they must charge more than the keepers of hotels in large cities where there are abundant facilities for obtaining everything needed for supplying guests. When the gentleman undertakes to say that these hotel-keepers in the mountains exact exorbitant rates, he makes a charge which, in my judgment, is unjust and untrue.

Mr. LYNCH. I can only say that the gentleman's experience must have been entirely different from mine.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. Chairman, I hope that the amendment of the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BENTON] will not be adopted. He voted just now to increase this tax to twenty-five dollars on each bowling-alley; and I, for one, am not in favor of exempting the hotels that may happen to be on the mountains of New Hampshire, while we impose this tax on the keepers of these alleys everywhere else in the country. I think the taxation ought to be uniform. I hope the exception proposed by the gentleman will not be made.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Chairman, gentlemen seem to misunderstand the principle upon which this charge is made. It applies only to "every place or building where bowls are thrown or billiards played, and open to the public with or without price." The reason for including places open to the public "without charge" is that if in such places there is no formal charge it is because the keepers get their pay in some indirect way; and unless we have such a provision, they will sell liquor or something else and throw the bowls in, or they will charge for the bowls and throw the liquor in. [Laughter.] Those who keep these hotels, of which the gentleman speaks, among the mountains and at watering places, will take care that the charges to their guests shall be such as to reimburse them for all the expense which they incur in affording those guests amusement. Therefore, we have extended the tax to all tables or alleys kept for use with or without price, for if they do not get a price directly they will obtain that price in some indirect way.

Mr. BENTON. I will say a word in reply to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON.] If he supposes that the public houses I have referred to are peculiar to New Hampshire he is less informed than I supposed him to be. If he had been informed on the subject of hotels in the United States I do not suppose he would have assumed to make such a statement as he has. What he has said in regard to the hotels in New Hampshire is unjust. There are hotels like those in New Hampshire throughout the country. If he feels invidious toward New Hampshire because of her sublime mountain scenery, he is not so enlarged in his views as I thought he was. I do not envy his people the peculiar advantages of his State.

The amendment was disagreed to.

No further amendment being offered, the Clerk read the next paragraph, as follows:

Jewelers, whose annual sales exceed $1,000, and do not exceed $5,000, shall each pay a tax of twenty-five dollars, and when the annual sales exceed $5,000 shall pay, in addition, ten dollars for each $1,000 in excess of $5,000. Every person who manufactures for sale articles intended for personal wear, or for ornament, composed in whole or in part of gold or silver or other precious metals, or of any alloy or imitation of any of said metals, or of diamonds or other precious stones or gems or any imitation thereof, shall be regarded as a jeweler.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move an amendment to that paragraph, and desire to say a word. If this amendment prevails I will move to strike out the following paragraph. After the word "thereof" I move to insert "or any goods or wares of gold or silver." The proposition is to transfer the manufacturers of gold and silver ware to this head of jewelers, embracing them all in a general paragraph. It is often difficult to determine whether a thing is an article of jewelry, or manufactured of gold and silver ware exclusively; as a watch chain, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCORMICK. I move to reduce the tax from ten dollars to five dollars. It seems to me this is higher than it should be, especially if the other section be stricken out.

The amendment was rejected.

No further amendment being offered, the Clerk read the next paragraph, as follows:

Manufacturers of gold and silver ware, whose annual sales exceed $1,000 and do not exceed $5,000, shall each pay a tax of twenty-five dollars, and when the annual sales exceed $5,000 shall pay, in addition, five dollars for each $1,000 in excess of $5,000. Every person who makes for sale any goods or wares of gold or silver other than jewelry shall be regarded as a manufacturer of gold and silver ware.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to strike out that paragraph.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read the next paragraph, as follows:

Manufacturers of fire-arms, whose annual sales exceed $1,000 and do not exceed $5,000, shall each pay a tax of twenty-five dollars, and when the annual sales exceed $5,000 shall pay, in addition, five dollars for each $1,000 in excess of $5,000. Every person who makes for sale cannon, guns, pistols, or other fire-arms, shall be regarded as a manufacturer of fire-arms.

No amendment being offered, the Clerk read the next paragraph as follows:

Manufacturers of pianos, whose annual sales exceed $1,000 and do not exceed $5,000, shall each pay a tax of twenty-five dollars, and when the annual sales exceed $5,000 shall pay, in addition, five dollars for each $1,000 in excess of $5,000. Every person who manufactures pianos, organs, melodones, harps, or other parlor musical instruments shall be regarded as a manufacturer of pianos.

No amendment being offered, the Clerk read the next paragraph, as follows:

Manufacturers of billiard-tables, whose annual sales exceed $1,000 and do not exceed $5,000, shall each pay a tax of twenty-five dollars, and when the annual sales exceed $5,000 shall pay, in addition, ten dollars for each $1,000 in excess of $5,000.

No amendment being offered, the Clerk read the next paragraph, as follows:

Manufacturers of playing-cards, whose annual sales do not exceed $5,000, shall each pay a tax of twenty-five dollars, and when the annual sales exceed $5,000 shall pay, in addition, ten dollars for each $1,000 in excess of $5,000.

Mr. ROBINSON. Are not playing-cards taxed by a stamp duty?

Mr. SCHENCK. They are.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move to strike out this paragraph.

Mr. MAYNARD. Is that business suffering? I do not understand that it is suffering in the United States.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman asks for information, and it is proper the House should understand how this matter stands. This business of manufacturing playing-cards is specifically taxed in another shape. By schedule C, playing cards are required to pay five cents for each pack. I understand that they cost from eleven to forty cents a pack, and they retail at from twenty cents to two dollars, or even higher. The tax of five cents is without reference to the price or quality upon every pack of cards. Then the committee have proposed in this bill a further tax on the business of manufacturing playing-cards of twenty-five dollars as a special tax, and a further tax on the sales of one per cent. This is in addition to the tax of five cents on each pack, which is collected by stamps.

This is an exceptional case. It will be for the House to determine whether a tax on sales shall be added to the tax collected by stamps upon each pack. It has been agreed to by the committee only for the reason that we have supposed that this was one of those luxuries that it might be well to tax to any extent that it would reasonably bear, even though it should increase the price of the article, because it is a proper subject of high taxation.

The only question with the committee, with me at least, was this: whether by taxing it very high, in two or three different ways, we might not promote the use of cards for a longer time or more frequently, and a less frequent change of the decks, so as to defeat in some degree the object of securing a large revenue. My object, for one, is to strike just that line of tax that will produce the greatest amount of revenue from this article.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have offered this amendment because this, which seems to be as respectable an occupation as any other, has been singled out for a triplicate tax. It is taxed first on the manufacture, then on the sales, and again by stamps. I hardly know what my distinguished friend from Tennessee meant when he asked me some question about cards.

Mr. MAYNARD. The question I asked was whether the interest of manufacturing playing cards had languished at all.

Mr. ROBINSON. I am not quite sure, and I think the question would apply with more force to the gentleman from Tennessee. If I am not misinformed, the history of that State shows that those coming from that quarter should be as well posted in card playing as any body in Brooklyn. For myself, I can say I have never played a game of cards in my life and I do not know that I ever shall. I have no interest at all in this question, only I see the injustice of keeping this tax on a respectable portion of our manufacturers.

The amendment of Mr. ROBINSON was disagreed to.

Mr. BARNES. I desire to amend this section. I am opposed to making playing-cards or any other article pay excise by the way of stamps in addition to other taxes. I move to strike out "ten" and insert "twelve," making a nominal addition to the tax for the purpose of calling the attention of the committee to this subject. I have heard no argument yet advanced by the committee or by anybody on this floor to justify this duplicate tax, or the paying of a tax by stamps. When I have heard an argument on that point I shall be very glad to acknowledge the force of it, and if I can be convinced of its propriety I shall be glad to do all I can to expedite the passage of these different sections of this tax bill. But I submit unless there is some reason occult and difficult to be understood which can be given, there is no propriety in taxing this or a hundred other articles in the manner now proposed, and then seizing the article and compelling the manufacturer thereof to put upon it a stamp. It seems to me the principle is so simple, and the advantage of single taxation so easily understood, that it ought not to require a single word of explanation. With these remarks I submit the amendment.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. MILLER. I move to strike out "twenty-five dollars" and insert "fifty dollars," so that it will read, "shall each pay a tax of fifty dollars." I think there is no subject of taxation that deserves taxation more than this. The manufacture of playing-cards is a nuisance, and I hope it will be taxed to the utmost extent.

Mr. ALLISON. I oppose the amendment, and ask for a vote upon it.

The question was taken on Mr. MILLER's amendment, and it was disagreed to.

The Clerk read the next paragraph, as follows:

Proprietors of export warehouses for the storage of distilled spirits, tobacco, or petroleum in bond, shall each pay twenty-five dollars, and the person who has the chief control of the premises occupied for such warehouse purposes, either as owner or lessee thereof, or otherwise, shall be deemed the proprietor.

Mr. SCHENCK. I offer the following amendment from the Committee of Ways and Means:

Page 116, strike out from and including the word "export," in line five hundred and eighty-eight, to and including the word "petroleum," on line five hundred and eighty-nine, as follows: "export warehouses for the storage of distilled spirits, tobacco, and petroleum," and insert in lieu thereof the words "United States bonded warehouses for the storage of articles;" so that the paragraph will read as follows:

Proprietors of United States bonded warehouses for the storage of articles in bond, shall each pay twenty-five dollars, and the person who has the chief control of the premises occupied for such warehouse purposes, either as owner or lessee thereof, or otherwise, shall be deemed the proprietor.

Mr. LOGAN. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the word "articles" and inserting "merchandise" in lieu thereof.

The amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

The amendment of the Committee of Ways and Means was then agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not desire any discussion about this question, but I want to have an understanding with the Committee of Ways and Means, inasmuch as I may differ with them, whether or not I shall be permitted, at the proper time, to return to these sections and offer an amendment in reference to all of them. If so, I have nothing further to say. If not, I desire to propose an amendment now to this paragraph.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I object.

Mr. LOGAN. Then I move to strike out the word "proprietors." I am very much surprised at the objection of the gentleman from Massachusetts, because he knows my views in reference to this matter and I think the views of the House, and really the views of the committee when they first met. I offer this amendment because all through the law we find bonded warehouses—the very thing that we have been striking at from the commencement of this session of Congress—in reference to whisky and other articles. The object of this provision is to assess upon the person who is the owner or proprietor of a bonded warehouse a tax of twenty-five dollars. By indirection this authorizes the establishment of bonded warehouses.

It will not do to say that this paragraph applies to warehouses connected with the customs of the country, because it does not, nor is it so intended. There is a law already in existence, which this bill does not repeal, which is full and sufficient so far as customs warehouses are concerned. If the gentleman will consent to so amend the paragraph as that it shall apply only to the custom-house warehouses and exclude the idea of reestablishing bonded warehouses all over the country, I am willing to agree to that; but this is an indirect way of establishing again the system of frauds that existed in this country for the last few years. Gentlemen will see that it is so if this law goes into effect. I will modify my amendment, and move to amend the paragraph so that it shall read "proprietors of United States customs warehouses for the storage of merchandise," &c. That will exclude the idea of these bonded whisky shops and apply it only to the warehouses necessary to the collection of the customs of the country.

Mr. SCHENCK. I regret exceedingly that the occupation, absorbing as it was, of our colleague upon the committee prevented him from being present when this bill was being framed. If he had been, and had had an opportunity of understanding the bill in its different parts as we progressed with it, I know he would not stand here imputing directly, or indirectly, in any way an intention on the part of the committee of which he is a member—

Mr. LOGAN. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I have not intended to impute any such thing to the committee, nor do I desire to impute any such thing.

Mr. SCHENCK. That is enough. I misapprehended the gentleman, then, when I supposed he thought that was the effect of our legislation.

Mr. LOGAN. I think that is the effect of it; but I do not say that was the design of the committee.

Mr. SCHENCK. What is proposed? That proprietors of United States bonded warehouses, a very profitable business, shall each pay twenty-five dollars internal tax. That is the whole of it. Now, who will be affected by that? Every man who is the proprietor of a United States bonded warehouse for the use of the custom-house; every one who is the proprietor of a distinct distillery warehouse. And if we have export warehouses for distilled spirits, tobacco, oil, or anything else to be exported from the country, then this provision will apply to them. If we have no such warehouses, in which distilled spirits, tobacco, or other articles are stored, then, of course, so far as they are concerned, this provision will be inoperative. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] sees in it a bugbear, a specter, connected with this whisky question, which has no existence at all. Now, if you put your direct tax on whisky very low, perhaps even as low as seventy-five cents per gallon, or even lower than that, you may be able to collect it at the distillery, and not have any warehouses at all except at the distillery, out of which the whisky shall not be permitted to go without the payment of the tax, except it be to warehouses to which it is to be carried, to be conveyed thence on ship-board, under such strict regulations that it shall not be allowed to go abroad without paying the tax. If you propose to break up the whole export trade, then you may get rid of even any export warehouses at all. But in either case you will still want, and will still have, bonded warehouses, and we want to tax the proprietors of them. That is all there is in it. This warehousing business is a profitable business, and we think it can very well afford to pay this special tax. It has been a vastly money-making business, directly under the whisky law and indirectly by reason of frauds. I am as much opposed to a loosely-regulated warehouse system as the gentleman can possibly be.

Mr. LOGAN. I will modify my amendment so as to have the opportunity to say a few words. As a matter of course, I feel very much embarrassed in proposing amendments to this bill, belonging, as I do, to the Committee of Ways and Means. But I hope my zeal in the matter will not be misunderstood. I desire to have no difference with the committee, but I do desire to be understood. I moved to amend this paragraph by inserting the word "merchandise," and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] objected. Now, I desire any gentleman to tell me, if this is intended for a bonded warehouse for the use of merchandise, why not put the word "merchandise" in the provision instead of the word "articles?" That is a very simple proposition. I propose to amend this paragraph so that it will read, "United States custom-house warehouses for the storage of merchandise." Now, that is so plain that we can all understand it. United States warehouses for the storage of merchandise; that is all that is intended by this law, the gentleman says. If so, why not say so? My proposition is to make this read, "United States custom-house warehouses for the storage of merchandise." That is all the gentleman says that they propose. Then I say put those words in the bill.

My first proposition is this: I said to the committee if they would allow me to offer an amendment at the proper time in reference to the bonded warehouses I would make no objection to passing this paragraph. But the gentlemen refused to do that. Why not allow an amendment at the proper time, so that the House may determine what kind of warehouses they want, if they want any? The gentlemen can prevent my going back to this paragraph in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BLAINE. You can offer an additional section to the bill.

Mr. LOGAN. I know you can put a section in at any place, provided you can have time to explain it and make it understood. But if the House commits itself all along to this bonded warehouse system, then we shall get no better law than we have had heretofore.

Now, my objections to some of the action of the committee in reference to this question arise not from a desire on my part to make any accusation against them, but from an honest difference of opinion. If such a difference of opinion is not legitimate and authorized in this House, I am ready to withdraw from the committee, and they can get in my place some one who will agree with them. That is all.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Chairman, I am determined to be, if possible, entirely understood in reference to this matter. I say again that if you prohibit in every shape whatever export warehouses for distilled spirits, and abolish the entire business of exportation of spirits from this country, you will still need bonded warehouses. You will need not only bonded warehouses for customs, but warehouses at the distilleries. I explained the other day the impossibility (which must be obvious to every gentleman) of standing with your quart or gallon measure at the tail of the worm of the still catching the whisky as it flows, and collecting the tax upon each gallon as it comes forth. The liquor must be removed into some closely-guarded cistern-room, put into the necessary barrels, properly stamped, put into the warehouse at the distillery, and not removed therefrom without the payment of the tax. If you do reduce the tax to a low standard, and require the payment of all the taxes at the distillery, and if you do put the whisky into such a warehouse, shall it be there without any bond? Shall not these be bonded warehouses? I apprehend it is essentially necessary that they shall be?

Mr. LOGAN. I will call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that that is provided for in the bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. I know it is.

Mr. LOGAN. Why, then, insinuate that I am trying to exempt this kind of warehouse from the payment of tax?

Mr. SCHENCK. I am only saying that the question now before us is not whether we shall or shall not have anything of that kind, but whether we shall tax the proprietors of all bonded warehouses. We cannot tax them unless we put in the law a provision for taxing them. If we do not insert such a provision they escape taxation; and if we do insert it, we say that they ought to be taxed, without regard to the kind of bonded warehouses. I did not care particularly about the insertion of the word "merchandise" in place of "articles." I made no objection to that proposition. "Articles" happens to be the word that is used all along through the bill; and it is broad enough to embrace tobacco, distilled spirits, and goods of every kind. The gentleman may put in not only "merchandise," but "goods, wares, and merchandise," and when he has done that he has not shut out whisky. Distilled spirits are as much merchandise as is cotton cloth, and if we have customs warehouses and receive in them importations from abroad, you may call them "goods," you may call them "wares," you may call them "merchandise," you may call them "articles," you may call them by any generic name of that kind, and in either case the term will include fluids as well as solids, because they are all articles of trade.

Now, so far as I am concerned, I have no objection to permitting this question to be reserved, that the gentleman may go back to it hereafter. But I say there will be no necessity for going back. Whatever the House may decide as to export warehouses, whether it permits or does not permit the removal of distilled spirits from the distillery to any warehouse, that matter cannot affect in the slightest degree the question whether we shall or shall not tax the proprietors of bonded warehouses. [Here he hammered fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. Unless there is objection the pro forma amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] will be considered as withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. JUDD. I move to amend by striking out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, at an earlier stage of the discussion of this bill it was intimated by several gentlemen that when the proper point should be reached the question would be raised for the decision of the committee, whether the system abolished by our legislation in the early part of this session should be by this bill reinstated in form or in substance. Those sections were passed over, Mr. Chairman, with the understanding that if the amendment be made at the proper stage of the proceedings then the privilege should be granted to go back to all other sections and make them correspond to the action of the committee on the main question. That was my understanding, and hence I should have taken no sort of exception to the phraseology here in this clause if that was so understood by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. Chairman, it is utterly impossible by one amendment to strike the system of warehouses out of this bill. It is coupled with other articles throughout the bill. In other words, the committee had their system, which not only embraces tobacco, but distilled spirits. There is no objection to that if that was their view; but what I desire is, that when the main point is decided by the committee, whether distilled spirits shall be allowed to be transported in bond or not, when that question is decided, if decided in the negative, we shall have the privilege of recurring to the preceding sections and correcting them.

Mr. MAYNARD. The gentleman will see that we provide in another section for export bonded warehouses, a section which we have not yet reached.

Mr. JUDD. I have read that section, and I have read the entire bill, although the chairman seems to think no member has read the bill. I do not pretend to be as familiar with the bill as the members of the Ways and Means Committee. I do not intend to be forced from the position I assumed a few days ago by any of this side discussion, that the fraud which has been perpetrated in relation to distilled spirits has grown out of the business of transporting distilled spirits in bond; and although you may talk about warehouses at the distilleries or elsewhere, I am not discussing that question now, nor did I the other day. I did allege that at an early part of the session this committee did agree that frauds in the whisky trade arose when you set the article in motion. When it is set in motion it disappears from taxation. I want the main question settled first, and when that is settled I want to have the privilege of amending accordingly the preceding sections.

The question recurred on Mr. LOGAN's amendment.

Mr. LOGAN. I will withdraw the amendment if the gentleman from Ohio will consent at the proper time that all the sections in reference to bonded warehouses shall be open for amendment.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The amendment is not in order as it now reads.

Mr. LOGAN. I will modify my amendment so as to strike out the section as it has been amended, and move for it the section as I have proposed to amend it.

Mr. SCHENCK. I object to that. The gentleman is willing to put a tax upon customs bonded warehouses. So am I. I want to put a tax upon distilled spirits bonded warehouses. The gentleman does not want any distilled spirits bonded warehouses. How he is to get the tax upon whisky with it lying around loose in barrels or in the cistern-room is more than I can tell. I beg to call the gentleman's attention to this section:

SEC. 204. And be it further enacted, That every distiller shall provide at his own expense a warehouse, to be situated on and constitute a part of his distillery premises, to be used only for the storage of distilled spirits, of his own manufacture, but no dwelling-house shall be used for such purpose, and no door, window, or other opening shall be made or permitted in the walls of such warehouse leading into the distillery or into any other room or building; and such warehouse, when approved by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, on report of the collector, is hereby declared to be a bonded warehouse of the United States, to be known as a distillery warehouse, and shall be under the direction and control of the collector of the district, and in charge of an internal revenue storekeeper assigned thereto by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue; and the tax on the spirits stored in such warehouse shall be paid before removal from such warehouse, unless removed in pursuance of law.

We do not permit them to be removed without the tax being paid; but I am not certain that will be the ultimate result of our legislation. Still, I say it will be impossible to get along without warehouses of some kind at the distilleries to collect the tax. If you are going to leave the whisky lie around until the stamps can be put upon it and paid for, then you will out-Herod all the looseness that has ever been practiced in the warehouses or out of the warehouses. We have seen this to be so necessary that we have taken care to guard this whisky by provisions of law, every drop of it, as far as practicable, from the moment it leaves the worm till it goes into the distillery or warehouse, and is made there a subject of taxation, and is released from it upon the payment of the tax. But a distillery warehouse is necessary, and I want the parties in addition to other taxes to pay for the warehouse. If the gentleman wants to get rid of that, and save the distiller twenty-five dollars, that is another thing. He wants to tax bonded warehouses. So do I; but I want to tax distillery warehouses also. And if we have export warehouses I want to tax them also. I want to tax every proprietor of every bonded warehouse in the United States, everywhere and for all purposes. The more they make of these warehouses the more tax we shall get. It may be important not to have many classes of them; but whether we have few or many I want to put at least twenty-five dollars on each proprietor.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire a moment to answer the gentleman. I am glad to find that he begins to agree with me. He wants to tax bonded warehouses, and so do I. But I want to tax them under their proper names. If the gentleman wants bonded warehouses for distilled spirits, let them be named as such. But then I propose to tax these warehouses more than twenty-five dollars. But I want to collect the tax on distilled spirits at the worm of the still. The gentleman need not try to make sport, as he has several times endeavored to do, about measuring out the spirits by the quart at the worm of the still, in order to prevent gentlemen from getting a true idea of the proper manner of collecting the tax at the still. The way to collect it is at the place where the distiller keeps his whisky when he gauges the barrels. You propose to reduce the whisky tax and give the distiller his bonded warehouse, and then you propose to tax the bonded warehouse. Now, I am for taxing the warehouses and making the law apply to them under their specific names.

Make your warehouses for the storing of merchandise and warehouses for storing whisky alone. And when you come to make warehouses exclusively for the storing of whisky, I am for taxing them more than twenty-five dollars. There is the distinction between the gentleman and myself. Now, if gentlemen are sincere—and I presume they are—if you intend to have these warehouses that you are now talking about for merchandise, why not say so? Then my proposition is correct and proper. Then when you put a tax upon your whisky warehouses say so, and let the country understand it.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. Is not whisky merchandise?

Mr. LOGAN. I do not mean to say but that it is; but if you will put it in this law in the way I suggest, and have your whisky warehouses separate from the others, then the law will exclude distilled spirits from the warehouse for merchandise. I desire each class of bonded warehouses to stand on its own merits. This is intended for customs warehouses, I presume, because I suppose the gentleman does not intend to tax bonded warehouses for holding whisky the same as for storing something else that does not pay half the tax. Now, let us declare the customs warehouses to be taxable at twenty-five dollars, and then if the House determines to have bonded warehouses for whisky, tax them according to the character of the article they contain.

The amendment of Mr. LOGAN was disagreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Dealers in petroleum, whose annual sales do not exceed $10,000, shall each pay ten dollars, and when the annual sales exceed $10,000 shall pay, in addition, one dollar for every $1,000 in excess of $10,000. Every person who is an owner or operator of an oil well, or whose business it is, either for himself or others, to buy or sell crude petroleum, shall be regarded as a dealer in petroleum.

Mr. SCOFIELD. In line five hundred and ninety-nine I move to strike out the word "an" and to insert in lieu thereof "a productive;" so that it will read: "Every person who is an owner or operator of a productive oil well," &c.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not think that amendment should be adopted. I oppose it.

Mr. WOODWARD. I beg leave to inquire of my colleague what he means by a "productive oil well?"

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the amendment.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I will withdraw it, and renew it for the purpose of explaining.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can do so if there be no objection.

No objection was made.

Mr. SCOFIELD. The words are "an owner or operator of an oil well." If only the word "operator" had been used it would have meant to limit the tax to productive wells. But the owner of any oil well that is not at present yielding oil, although it may at some future time yield oil or has yielded it in the past, ought not to be taxed or considered as a dealer in oil. Perhaps he might be so considered under the construction of this clause, and it will make it clearer if we put in the word "productive."

Mr. UPSON. I call the attention of the gentleman to the first part of the paragraph. It relates to dealers "whose annual sales do not exceed $10,000." The oil well, therefore, must be productive; there has got to be a sale of some kind.

Mr. WOODWARD. I do not want to debate this matter. I wish to say, however, that I would rather strike out this whole paragraph with regard to oil. I do not think we ought to tax it in any form whatever, or to tax either the owner or the operator of an oil well.

Mr. SCOFIELD. The language of the paragraph is "whose whole annual sales do not exceed $1,000." Now, if he only sells a gallon he will have to pay the tax.

Mr. UPSON. Would it not be a "productive" well if it produced a gallon?

Mr. SCOFIELD. No; I suppose not. At all events, the insertion of the word can do no harm.

Mr. WOODWARD. I move to strike out the whole paragraph.

Mr. SCHENCK. I wish to suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that he alter his amendment, and move to amend the paragraph so as to read, "Every person who is an owner or lessee and operator of an oil well," &c.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I will accept that modification.

Mr. SCOFIELD's amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. WOODWARD. I withdraw the motion to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to strike out the word "one," in line five hundred and ninety-seven, and to insert "two" in lieu thereof; so that it will read: "shall pay in addition two dollars for every $1,000 in excess of $10,000." I offer this amendment because it has been intimated that the provision in this bill taxing oil specifically ten cents per gallon is to be stricken out. I believe the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means intimated as much in his opening remarks. I do not know what may be the fate of that proposition, but if that tax is to be stricken out, then dealers in oil should be placed precisely on a par with all other dealers in this country and pay two dollars on their sales in excess of $10,000, as every other dealer is obliged to do. If the provision taxing oil specifically shall not be stricken out, then I shall be willing to go back and restore this tax to one dollar.

Mr. SCHENCK. I suggest to my colleague that he enter his motion, and that the vote on it be reserved. I agree with him that if we take off the tax of ten cents per gallon the least we can do will be to put dealers in oil on the same footing with other dealers.

I ask that by unanimous consent this amendment may be reserved.

No objection was made, and the amendment was reserved.

The Clerk read the next paragraph, as follows:

Distillers of oil shall each pay fifty dollars. Every person who shall distill, refine, or filter petroleum or oil from coal, asphaltum, shale, peat, or other bituminous substances, or shall manufacture illuminating or lubricating oil, or shall mix, purify, filter, or prepare in any other manner any of the products of such refining process, distillation, or manufacture, shall be regarded as a distiller of oil.

Mr. SPALDING. I do not object to this tax, but I wish to have it graduated, and I have prepared an amendment for that purpose. I move to strike out the first sentence, "distillers of oil shall each pay fifty dollars," and insert in lieu thereof the following:

Distillers of oil, who manufacture not more than ten thousand barrels a year, shall pay twenty-five dollars; those who manufacture more than ten thousand and less than fifteen thousand barrels shall pay fifty dollars; and all who manufacture more than fifteen thousand barrels annually shall pay seventy-five dollars.

I represent a district largely interested in the refining of this article, petroleum. I believe the manufacturers do not so much object to this tax of fifty dollars; but a great many of them are small manufacturers, and the twenty-five dollars tax which I propose will, perhaps, be enough for them to pay; I refer to small manufacturers who manufacture twenty, twenty-five, or thirty barrels a day. We have some who manufacture two hundred, three hundred, and even five hundred barrels a day. I propose by my amendment to graduate the tax, and make the large manufacturers pay seventy-five dollars, the small manufacturers twenty-five dollars, and the medium fifty dollars.

Mr. MAYNARD. Are there any manufacturers who would pay seventy-five dollars under this amendment?

Mr. SPALDING. Yes; there are several in my district.

Mr. ALLISON. I think this paragraph and the preceding paragraph should be passed over for the present. If the subsequent section is stricken out there should be an addition to this tax.

Mr. SPALDING. I do not think the subsequent section will be stricken out. The tax on mineral oil has been reduced from twenty cents to ten cents per gallon; and it will be putting me in an embarrassing position if we take it all off.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well; I will go with the gentleman.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I move to amend the amendment so as to provide that the person who runs but one still shall pay ten dollars. I think the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] is very much mistaken in regard to the disposition of this House if he thinks it will not relieve this oil interest from the specific tax per gallon. From conversations with a very large number of the members of this House, I am very sure they will not be in favor of continuing all this expensive machinery for the collection of a tax so small yet so oppressive, considering the amount. I feel very sure the whole tax per gallon will be stricken out, and I hope the gentleman will aid us in doing so when we come to it. I am of this opinion from conversations that I have had with, I suppose, one half of the members of this House.

Mr. SPALDING. Of course I cannot be expected to oppose the relieving of my people altogether from this tax, and I shall vote for it. But I do not ask for it; I do not think my constituents ask for it; I do not think they feel the necessity for it.

Mr. SCOFIELD. A great many of the gentleman's constituents have asked me for it. The gentleman has been absent a short time, and a great many of his constituents have come to me about this tax. If it is to affect the final vote I hope the suggestion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] will be agreed to; for I feel perfectly confident that this tax per gallon will be removed. I now withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

The question was upon the amendment of Mr. SPALDING.

Mr. SCHENCK. At the beginning of the winter the oil men, represented here very numerous, fell into a mistake, perhaps, in regard to their interest, when they represented that nothing could bear a tax better than oil; it was then twenty cents per gallon. They afterward became satisfied that they must have some relief, and this House gave it to them, taking off the half of that tax. It has now reached that point when I think it will be about as expedient to put these oil manufacturers in the general class of manufacturers as it will be to keep on this tax of ten cents per gallon. However that may be, we have already taken from them a burden of some three million dollars.

Now, what do we propose here? That each distiller shall pay a special tax of fifty dollars upon the manufacture of this article, which it was once thought could bear a tax so well. What will that amount to? My colleague [Mr. SPALDING] says that the very small establishments manufacture only some ten or fifteen barrels per day. Suppose we take ten barrels as the average, allowing three hundred working days in a year, that will make three thousand barrels. And at fifty dollars, that will be less than two cents per barrel; not a very onerous tax, considering the millions already taken off. But if you get it down to twenty-five dollars, it will be not quite a cent on a barrel. The truth is it is not a heavy tax at all; and it does seem to me that gentlemen who are expecting to urge upon this House the propriety of taking off altogether the specific tax of ten cents a gallon, leaving these men to pay like other manufacturers a tax of two tenths of one per cent. on the amount of their sales over $5,000, ought not to be pressing us in regard to these incidental points as they arise, lest thereby they endanger their case.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. The gentleman will permit me to say that all I am seeking now is to have this question reserved.

Mr. SCHENCK. This is a very small tax when you come to examine it.

Mr. SPALDING. I am not objecting to the tax; but I wish to have it graduated.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent that this paragraph may be reserved for consideration hereafter.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the paragraph will be reserved.

There was no objection.

The next paragraph was read, as follows:

Distillers producing two hundred barrels, or less, of distilled spirits, counting forty gallons of proof spirits to the barrel, within the year, shall each pay $200, and one dollar for each such barrel produced in excess of two hundred barrels. And monthly returns of the number of barrels of spirits, as before described, distilled by him, shall be made by each distiller in the same manner as monthly returns of sales are made. Every person who produces distilled spirits, or who brews or makes mash, wort, or wash for distillation or for the production of spirits, or who by any process of vaporization separates alcoholic spirit from any fermented substance, or who, making or keeping mash, wort, or wash, has also in his possession or use a still, shall be regarded as a distiller.

Mr. SCHENCK. On behalf of the Committee of Ways and Means, I move to amend by adding at the end of the paragraph just read the following:

Provided, That no tax shall be imposed for any still, stills, or other apparatus used by druggists and chemists for the recovery of alcohol for pharmaceutical, chemical, or scientific purposes, which has been used in those processes.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. Chairman, I know that I occupy an unfortunate position in being obliged to oppose propositions emanating from the Committee of Ways and Means. I expect that this amendment will be adopted. I presume the House will not pay any attention to anything I may say about the matter. But I desire to call attention to the fact that the exemption of persons recovering alcohol in the manner and for the purposes indicated in the amendment has been shown to be one of the sources of fraud. Why the Committee of Ways and Means should recommend this exemption I cannot understand. There are evidences that in this way frauds have been committed; and although at one time the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, I believe, suggested the insertion of this amendment, yet since that time he has recommended taking it out of the bill. I am opposed to any such amendment, because it opens up one of the avenues for fraud. The only thing we can safely do is to tax these persons as we tax all other distillers. When they carry on these processes they are in fact engaged in distilling; and there is as much propriety in taxing them as in taxing the distiller who manufactures spirits in the first instance.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this amendment is exhausted.

Mr. SCHENCK. In order that I may make an explanation, I move pro forma to amend the amendment by striking out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, my colleague on the committee [Mr. LOGAN] is somewhat mistaken as to the facts in relation to the history of this amendment. The position of the matter is this: we are endeavoring, by the most stringent measures we can devise, to guard against illicit distillation. In revising the present law we found in it a saving clause in favor of those engaged as druggists or chemists in recovering alcohol which had once been used. This exception in their favor is made by the law as it now stands; it is to-day the law. We were so anxious, however, to cut off all possibility of any wrong being done that, in preparing this bill, we omitted the provision. The gentleman from Illinois is mistaken in saying that it was left out at the request of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. He may have made that request, but—

Mr. LOGAN. I said he made the suggestion.

Mr. SCHENCK. I never heard of it before this morning, and I have since been ransacking my memory in regard to the matter. I remember very well now that the sub-committee on whisky, in a room in the Treasury Department, came to the conclusion that provision might leave the door open to some frauds. I know that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue never spoke to me, nor, so far as I know, to any of the committee, on the subject. He came afterward and suggested that he had made a mistake in leaving that off. Since that I have had complaints made to me by druggists and chemists that, instead of opening the door for fraud by leaving the law as it is, we were doing them great mischief in not retaining it as it now is.

Now, I remember the frauds the gentleman refers to. They were not frauds under this but under another section of the present law, the one hundred and sixty-eighth section, where men have been permitted to take, for the manufacture of articles to go abroad, such as cosmetics and patent medicines or anything of that kind, distilled spirits in bond, and upon proof that they had manufactured into these articles and sent them abroad, they have been relieved from paying any tax. This opened the door for fraud against which we have provided.

Mr. BECK. I ask the chairman whether he will not consent to pass by the remaining portion of this paragraph until the tax on whisky and tobacco is determined?

Mr. SCHENCK. I have no objection to that, but I do not wish to reserve the whole bill.

Mr. BECK. When that is done we will be better able to arrange these things.

Mr. SCHENCK. I was going to suggest something of that sort, but this is a distinct question which does not touch the other. I desire to say, so far as I know anything about it, that I have come to the conclusion we ought not to have cut this section out of the law as it now is, but, on the contrary, ought to have retained it; and although the committee reported the bill without this little clause, it afterward concluded to restore it.

I am sure my colleague is mistaken. The examination of Mr. Parker—

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LOGAN. I do not desire any further controversy about this; but I desire to be fairly understood and fairly represented. Now, when the gentleman says there has never been anything of the kind he has, unintentionally I know, done me injustice. The Clerk knows what I state to be true. I examined Mr. Parker myself. I was a member of the sub-committee, and heard the facts I have stated, and it was upon those facts I made the suggestion. I made it, too, in the committee. I do not know whether the Commissioner made the statement to him or not. I know the statement made to me, and I know the proposition was to put this in the bill. I know the evidence before the committee shows that frauds were committed by stills used by druggists, and that is the only reason I made the suggestion.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend by striking out "$200" and inserting "$1,000;" and striking out "one" and inserting "five," so the special tax on the distiller shall be $1,000 in addition to five dollars as a special tax on each barrel. I do not ask for a vote now; but that it shall be reserved until we fix the direct tax together with the pending and succeeding paragraphs, as follows:

Rectifiers of distilled spirits, rectifying, purifying, or refining two hundred barrels or less of distilled spirits, counting forty gallons of proof spirits to the barrel, within the year, shall each pay $200, and fifty cents for each such barrel produced in excess of two hundred barrels. And monthly returns of the quantity and proof of all the spirits purchased and of the number of barrels of spirits, as before described, rectified, purified, or refined by him, shall be made by each rectifier in the same manner as monthly returns of sales are made. Every person who rectifies, purifies, or refines distilled spirits or wines by any process, and every wholesale or retail liquor dealer or compounder of liquors who has in his possession any still or leach-tub or who shall keep any other apparatus for the purpose of refining in any manner distilled spirits, shall be regarded as a rectifier.

Compounders of liquors shall each pay twenty-five dollars. Every person who, without rectifying, purifying, or refining distilled spirits, shall by mixing such spirits, wine, or cider with any materials, manufacture any spurious, imitation, or compound liquors, for sale under the name of whisky, brandy, gin, rum, wine, spirits, cordials, or wine bitters, or any other name, shall be regarded as a compounder of liquors.

Retail liquor dealers whose annual sales do not exceed $2,500 shall each pay twenty-five dollars; if exceeding $2,500 and not exceeding $5,000 shall each pay fifty dollars; if exceeding $5,000 and not exceeding $10,000 shall each pay $100; if exceeding $10,000 and not exceeding $20,000 shall each pay $200; and if exceeding $20,000 shall each pay $1,000. Every person who sells or offers for sale distilled spirits, wines, or malt liquors, in less quantities than one quart at a time, or to be drunk at the place, or on the premises where they are sold, shall be regarded as a retail liquor dealer.

Wholesale liquor dealers shall each pay fifty dollars, and twenty-five dollars for every additional $1,000, on all sales in excess of $2,000. Every person who sells or offers for sale distilled spirits, wines, or malt liquors in quantity of not less than one quart at one time, and not to be drunk at the place or on the premises where the sale is made, shall be regarded as a wholesale liquor dealer. But no distiller or brewer, who has paid his special tax as such, and who sells only distilled spirits or malt liquors of his own production in the original casks or packages in which they are placed for the purpose of affixing the tax stamps, shall be required to pay the special tax of a wholesale dealer.

Mr. ROBINSON. Would it not be proper now, instead of reserving this portion, to take a vote on the tax on distilled spirits?

The CHAIRMAN. That question is not pending.

Mr. ROBINSON. Why not move a proviso that hereafter distilled spirits shall pay fifty cents a gallon?

The CHAIRMAN. That would not be germane to the paragraph. If there is no objection these portions of the bill will be reserved. The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

Manufactures of stills shall each pay fifty dollars, and twenty dollars for each still or worm for distilling made for sale by him. Any person who manufactures any still or worm to be used in distilling shall be deemed a manufacturer of stills.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to strike out the words "for sale," so that it will read "or worm for distilling made by him."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Maltsters or malt-dealers, whose annual sales do not exceed $25,000, shall each pay fifty dollars; and if their annual sales exceed $25,000, for every additional $1,000 in excess of $25,000 they shall pay two dollars. Every person shall be regarded as a maltster or malt-dealer who makes or prepares malt extract, malt, or any preparation thereof, and who sells the same or offers it for sale, on commission or in any other manner. The market value of all malt extract, malt, or any preparation thereof, prepared and used by any maltster himself, shall be included in and be regarded as part of the sales made by him as a maltster; and the payment of a special tax by any person as a brewer or distiller shall not exempt such brewer or distiller who may do the business also of a maltster or malt-dealer from the payment of the special tax as such maltster or malt-dealer, nor from the keeping of separate books and making the returns required of a maltster or malt-dealer;

Mr. GRISWOLD. I move to amend the paragraph by striking out the following clauses:

Whose annual sales do not exceed $25,000.
And if their annual sales exceed $25,000, for every additional $1,000 in excess of $25,000, they shall pay two dollars.

The market value of all malt extract, malt, or any preparation thereof, prepared and used by any maltster himself, shall be included in and be regarded as part of the sales made by him as a maltster, (nor from the keeping of separate books and making the returns required of a maltster or malt-dealer:

So that the paragraph as amended will read:

Maltsters or malt-dealers, shall each pay fifty dollars. Every person shall be regarded as a maltster or malt-dealer who makes or prepares malt extract, malt, or any preparation thereof, and who sells the same or offers it for sale, on commission or in any other manner; and the payment of a special tax by any person as a brewer or distiller shall not exempt such brewer or distiller who may do the business also of a maltster or malt-dealer from the payment of the special tax as such maltster or malt-dealer.

The effect of this amendment will be to leave the tax on ale as it now is. I should have presented this matter to the committee if I had had an opportunity to do so; but as I had not I now submit it on my own responsibility. I do so for the reason that, in my judgment, the present tax on ale is quite as high as is practicable. If we increase it it becomes an unreasonable and onerous tax, and from necessity, when you go beyond a certain point, the tax must affect the consumption. It will be borne in mind that the original tax on ale was sixty cents per barrel. In 1864, I think, it was increased to one dollar, that being regarded as the highest tax which the article would admit of practicably. Now, by this section it is proposed to put a special tax on maltsters or malt-dealers and a further tax on their sales, thus increasing the tax on the article.

Mr. GETZ. Would it be in order to propose an additional amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. As soon as this is disposed of.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman from New York proposes that all maltsters or malt-dealers shall pay fifty dollars and to stop there, with no tax on the sales. Now, I know how popular lager beer is, as well as beer and ale. I like them myself. I would like to see them taking the place of spirituous liquors as far as possible. But, at the same time, I am not prepared to believe that this is an interest, so far as the manufacture is concerned, that is suffering. We have not proposed to increase the tax on malt liquors, which remains, as before, at one dollar on each barrel produced. What is proposed is, that inasmuch as the manufacturing of malt is a distinct business, and inasmuch as these maltsters or dealers in malt make a profit on the capital invested separate from the production of beer or ale, they shall be put upon a footing with other manufacturers and made to pay a tax on their sales. And I submit to the gentleman whether, if he succeeds in this amendment, he will not leave them, so far as a tax on sales will be concerned, to fall in under the head of other manufacturers. It appears to me that to deal in malt, to manufacture it, being a separate business, there is as much propriety in charging the dealer in malt and charging the manufacturer of malt as there is propriety in charging the man who deals in hops, which are also used in the production of this commodity. You do not let off the dealer in hops because he happens to deal in an article which contributes to make this popular beverage. Why let off the malt dealer who also deals in an article which enters as one of the component parts into beer. You do not let off the man who manufactures the vats or barrels in which the fermented liquor is made or put to be conveyed to market. And yet why should you not on the same principle let him off because he contributes to what we propose to make, if possible, the great popular beverage, driving out spirits from the country? I cannot understand upon what principle a proposition can be founded to treat the manufacturer of this article or the dealer in this article as if he stood upon a different footing from the manufacturer of or dealer in any other article.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I move pro forma to strike out the last word. I desire to say, in answer to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, that, of course, there is but one reply to make to his interrogatory, and that is that we have already, as I stated in my remarks before, taxed this article as high, in my judgment, as it will bear, and that it is impolitic to go beyond the point of safety on this or any other article. And I may take occasion to say here that I am influenced on this question by the same considerations and views as I have entertained in reference to the whisky tax. I believe that the present tax on whisky is too high; that it is impracticable and impossible to collect it, and for that reason I have from the outset been in favor of reducing the tax. And as I view the tax on whisky, so I view that on ale. I think we have got it already as high as it will bear, and that, of course, is the only reason that can be alleged for opposing any additional tax upon it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I would like to make this suggestion in regard to malt. The last action that was had by Congress on the subject of the tariff left malt in an exceptional and unfortunate position in this, that the tariff duty on barley and its relation to the tariff duty on malt is such that it is cheaper to go over into Canada and buy malt and bring it into this country already made than it is to buy the barley in Canada and manufacture the malt in our own manufactories. There is, therefore, a peculiar hardship resting at this time upon maltsters in consequence of the exceedingly high duty on barley as compared with the duty on manufactured malt.

It seems to me, therefore, that if anything is to be done touching this question at all, or touching the burden which maltsters should bear, it should be done with that fact borne in mind, that they are already bearing a burden that is disproportionate in consequence of the bad adjustment of the tariff.

Whilst the reciprocity treaty between us and Canada was in existence, barley came in free and malt was protected by a certain rate of duties, but when the reciprocity treaty expired barley immediately passed under the general regulations of the tariff.

Mr. SCHENCK. If that is the case, how is it that the manufacture of malt has gone on as usual?

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not know what the fact may be; but if it is a profitable business now it must have been vastly more so then. I do know from correspondence I have had with gentlemen in the trade that it is said that many American maltsters now get their malt in Canada instead of making it at home, as they did before the present state of affairs supervened.

Mr. GRISWOLD. In reply to the inquiry of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. SCHENCK] as to the reason why the business of the maltster is so profitable I desire to say that one very good reason is this: with the present tax of two dollars per gallon on whisky a demand has sprung up among the small distillers of whisky for malt for distillation. A very large market for malt has been created by the demand of these illicit distillers. I now withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

The question recurred upon the amendment of Mr. GRISWOLD.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move to strike out this entire paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion will be in order after amendments to the paragraph have been disposed of.

The amendment of Mr. GRISWOLD was to make the paragraph read as follows:

Maltsters or malt-dealers shall each pay fifty dollars. Every person shall be regarded as a maltster or malt-dealer who makes or prepares malt extract, malt, or any preparation thereof, and who sells the same or offers it for sale, on commission or in any other manner. And the payment of a special tax by any person as a brewer or distiller shall not exempt such brewer or distiller, who may do the business also of a maltster, or malt-dealer, from the payment of the special tax as such maltster or malt-dealer.

The question was taken upon the amendment; and upon a division there were—ayes 36, noes 38; no quorum voting.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. GRISWOLD and Mr. ALLISON were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 55, noes 42.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GETZ. I move to further amend the paragraph by reducing the tax from fifty dollars to twenty-five dollars.

Mr. MAYNARD. I rise to a question of order. The amendment we have just adopted, on the motion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. GRISWOLD,] puts those words in this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GETZ] moves to amend a portion of the original paragraph.

Mr. GETZ. I propose this amendment because the tax upon maltsters is an indirect tax upon brewers. Whatever tax the maltster is required to pay is ultimately paid by the brewer. The Committee of Ways and Means have provided fully for the tax on the brewing interests, and the brewers are willing to pay that tax. The amendment I propose is merely to put maltsters upon the same footing with all other dealers, as will be seen by reference to the bill. I offer this amendment in pursuance of the statement of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. SCHENCK,] who contended that maltsters should not be exempted from the general taxes imposed upon other dealers.

Mr. ALLISON. I think there is a great deal of force in what the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GETZ] says. I will move to strike out this entire paragraph, and that will put maltsters upon the same footing with other manufacturers.

Mr. GETZ. I will withdraw my amendment and allow the vote to be taken upon the motion to strike out, with the understanding that if that motion does not prevail I shall be allowed to renew my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. That will be done if no objection is made.

No objection was made.

Mr. ALLISON. I now move to strike out the entire paragraph.

Mr. ROBINSON. I believe that was my motion, to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] as entitled to the floor.

Mr. ROBINSON. This is one of those cases in which the tax is already high enough without duplicating and triplicating it. The tax upon this healthy and useful beverage is high enough; and I trust this paragraph will be stricken out, so as to give this measure of relief to an article already too highly taxed. I will not make a very long speech upon this subject, as I do not intend to occupy the attention of the House. The propriety of this motion to strike out is so self-evident that I presume it will pass unanimously.

The question was then taken upon the motion to strike out the paragraph; and, upon a division, there were—ayes fifty-six, noes not counted.

So the motion to strike out was agreed to.

The committee then rose informally, and the Speaker resumed the chair.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION.

Mr. HOPKINS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled, a joint resolution of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 218) for the relief of John M. Palmer.

INTERNAL TAX BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed the consideration of the internal tax bill.

The following paragraph was read:

Brewers shall each pay $100. Every person whose business it is to manufacture fermented liquors of any name or description, for sale, from malt, wholly or in part, or from any substitute therefor, shall be regarded as a brewer.

Mr. SPALDING. I would like to move to strike out this entire paragraph. But I will move to reduce the tax from $100 to fifty dollars on brewers.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes thirty-four, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. VAN AUKEN. I move to amend, so as to make the first sentence of the pending paragraph read as follows:

Brewers whose sales do not amount to over $10,000 shall pay twenty-five dollars; above $10,000, $100.

Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to discuss this question; but it seems to me the provision of the bill as it stand must operate unjustly by making no discrimination between brewers doing a large business and those who do a small business. Gentlemen must, I think, see at once the manifest propriety of graduating this tax according to the amount of business.

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire to say that the tax proposed in this paragraph is precisely the same as that imposed by the present law. I believe the brewers are satisfied with it, and are enabled to carry on their business successfully.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. Does not my colleague [Mr. SCHENCK] wish to satisfy the small brewers?

Mr. SCHENCK. No complaints of this $100 tax have come to the committee.

Mr. VAN AUKEN. There are some small brewers in my district who are seriously affected by this requirement of $100. It seems to me there should be a reduction as to those doing a small amount of business.

On the amendment of Mr. VAN AUKEN there were—ayes 39, noes 57.

Mr. VAN AUKEN. I call for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. SPALDING. I move to amend by striking out the pending paragraph.

The hour of half past four o'clock p.m. having arrived, the committee, under the order of the House, took a recess until half past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union reassembled at half past seven o'clock p. m., (Mr. POMEROY in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 1060) to reduce into one act and amend the laws relating to internal taxes.

The pending paragraph was the following:

Brewers shall each pay $100. Every person whose business it is to manufacture fermented liquors of any name or description, for sale, from malt, wholly or in part, or from any substitute therefor, shall be regarded as a brewer.

The pending question was upon the amendment of Mr. SPALDING, to strike out the paragraph.

The amendment was not agreed to.

No further amendment was offered.

The next paragraph was read, as follows:

Dealers in leaf tobacco, whose annual sales do not exceed $25,000, shall each pay fifty dollars; and if their annual sales exceed $25,000, for every additional $1,000 in excess of $25,000, they shall pay two dollars. Every person shall be regarded as a dealer in leaf tobacco, who shall, for himself or on commission, sell or offer for sale leaf tobacco of foreign or domestic production. And payment of a special tax as a wholesaler, dealer, tobaccoist, manufacturer of cigars, or manufacturer of tobacco, shall not exempt any person dealing in leaf tobacco from the payment of the special tax therefor hereby required. But no person shall sell at any one time a less quantity than fifty pounds of leaf tobacco without making a monthly return of the aggregate of such sales to the proper assistant assessor, and a tax of sixteen cents per pound shall be assessed on all sales made in less quantity than fifty pounds, and collected as other monthly taxes are required to be paid. But no farmer or planter shall be required to pay a special tax as a dealer in leaf tobacco for selling tobacco of his own production.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend by striking out the words "but no person shall sell at any one time a less quantity than fifty pounds of leaf tobacco without making," and inserting "every dealer who shall sell at any one time a less quantity than fifty pounds of leaf tobacco shall make;" so that the sentence shall read as follows:

Every dealer who shall sell at any one time a less quantity than fifty pounds of leaf tobacco shall make a monthly return of the aggregate of such sales to the proper assistant assessor, and a tax of sixteen cents per pound shall be assessed on all sales made in less quantity than fifty pounds, and collected as other monthly taxes are required to be paid.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend the same sentence by striking out the word "collected," and inserting "paid."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER. I move to amend the pending paragraph by striking out at the close of the second sentence the words "of foreign or domestic production;" so that the sentence will read:

"Every person shall be regarded as a dealer in leaf tobacco who shall, for himself or on commission, sell or offer for sale leaf tobacco."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK, of Ohio. I move to amend by adding at the end of the pending paragraph the words "or which he received as rent of that produced by tenants upon his lands;" so that the last sentence will read as follows:

But no farmer or planter shall be required to pay a special tax as a dealer in leaf tobacco for selling tobacco of his own production or which he received as rent of that produced by tenants upon his lands.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I move in lines seven hundred and three and seven hundred and four to strike out "twenty-five," and insert "ten;" so it will read "$10,000," instead of "$25,000," and in line seven hundred and three to strike out "fifty dollars," and insert "twenty-five dollars." The committee will understand that the only alteration is in the amount of sale, putting the limit at $10,000, and fixing the tax at twenty-five dollars where the sales do not exceed $10,000, and two dollars for every 1,000 over that. In the bill the tax is fifty dollars on sales which do not exceed $25,000.

I wish for a single moment to call the attention of the committee to the fact that in many sections of the country it is the custom of persons in individual districts and towns to buy the tobacco raised in the neighborhood, amounting to $10,000, which they sell to the dealers in the cities. This bill cuts off that class of persons. The amount they purchase is small in any one town or neighborhood, amounting only to $5,000, $8,000, or $10,000, and they cannot afford to pay fifty dollars. My amendment provides if the sales do not exceed $10,000 the tax shall be ten dollars, and if over that the tax shall be two dollars on every additional $1,000.

Mr. SCHENCK. I understand the gentleman to change in the seven hundred and fourth line, as well as in the seven hundred and third line, so it will read:

Dealers in leaf tobacco, whose annual sales do not exceed $10,000, shall each pay twenty-five dollars; and if their annual sales exceed $10,000, for every additional $1,000 in excess of $10,000 they shall pay two dollars.

That preserves the principle of the bill, and I do not object.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky. I move to strike out the paragraph. I do not think, sir, that the principle of this section ought to be adopted. The action of Congress heretofore on the subject of tobacco has left the leaf tobacco free. We have heretofore imposed no tax on it, but this paragraph proposes to require every man who deals in tobacco to any extent to get a license. In the State I represent a large number of farmers buy from their neighbors, and under this section, if the neighbor has not even sufficient to make a hoghead, he will have to get a license or else will act in violation of the law.

I think this principle ought not to be adopted by the House. The people who buy from those who raise the tobacco in the leaf, in the raw state, ought to be permitted to do so without being compelled to get a license or coming under this provision of the bill. There is no more reason for compelling a farmer who buys a part of a hoghead of tobacco from his neighbor to pay a license than to require a farmer who buys his neighbor's hogs or corn or wheat. I think the section ought to be stricken out, so we may obtain from tobacco in its manufactured state that revenue which should be borne by it. You will find this will operate oppressively, in my judgment, upon the tobacco-growing section of this country. I think the committee will act wisely in striking out the section and imposing no tax upon those who deal in this limited way.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am like the gentleman from Kentucky. I represent a tobacco and leaf tobacco district, and I think he labors under a misapprehension in reference to this section. There is no burden upon the farmer at all. He is not required to pay for a license on the leaf tobacco that he raises.

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky. There are some who buy the leaf tobacco from their neighbors.

Mr. SCHENCK. I put the case of one who trades in leaf tobacco. One of the great difficulties we have in keeping the trade within such limits as to prevent great fraud has been to have a run of the leaf tobacco. For this purpose on the regular dealers who buy and sell tobacco not produced by themselves or received as rent from their tenants, we have laid a tax, that is, upon those who deal in leaf tobacco as a trade, as a business. It enables us to have a run of leaf tobacco, to trace it to the manufacturers, and to keep a supervision over them. These men should pay a tax as well as the dealers in other articles. So far as dealers are concerned I know no reason why dealers in leaf tobacco should stand on any more favorable footing than dealers in any other commodity.

The other part of the section relates to the necessity of making a return and paying the tax upon a quantity less than fifty pounds that may be sold. This was regarded as a necessary provision in order to prevent a practice which prevails to a great extent of evading the tax by selling leaf tobacco, not as a regular dealer, but in small lots, to be cut up by the person who purchases and uses it as smoking or chewing tobacco without being subject to any tax at all. It is to protect regular dealers in leaf tobacco who sell in amounts greater than fifty pounds, who are engaged in regular honest trade in that article. At the same time it prevents filling the country and supplying individuals with small lots of tobacco which are not bought for the purpose of being manufactured, and which are not manufactured at all, except in such a way as to evade all payment of tax upon it by being cut by the party who thus obtains the small quantity. This provision in relation to leaf tobacco has been made after full consultation with all the tobacco manufacturers and dealers as one of the means of protecting their own trade.

Mr. O'NEILL. I move, pro forma, to strike out the words "in less quantity than fifty pounds." It seems to me that this condition of purchasing not less than fifty pounds will have a very disastrous effect upon the small manufacturers of cigars.

Mr. PILE. I suggest that this section does not refer to manufacturers, but dealers in leaf tobacco.

Mr. O'NEILL. It proposes to prevent the selling of leaf tobacco in quantities of not less than fifty pounds at any one time. Now, I suggest whether this does not tend to depress a very large number of persons who are engaged in a small way in making cigars.

A MEMBER. It refers to dealers in leaf tobacco.

Mr. O'NEILL. I supposed it affected the class of persons that I have alluded to, who are not able to buy in large quantities with which to make cigars in their shops for sale. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. LOGAN. I hope the chairman of the committee will excuse me for proposing an amendment. I do it for the reason that this law in regard to tobacco is a little different from what I understand it to be. Inasmuch as I was not before the committee very often, I presume I will be excused for moving to strike out of the paragraph these words:

But no person shall sell at any one time a less quantity than fifty pounds of leaf tobacco without making a monthly return of the aggregate of such sales to the proper assistant assessor, and a tax of sixteen cents per pound shall be assessed on all sales made in less quantity than fifty pounds, and collected as other monthly taxes are required to be paid.

All dealers in leaf tobacco under this section whose annual sales do not exceed $25,000, have to pay fifty dollars. But the part which I move to strike out provides that they shall not sell less than fifty pounds at any one time.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. Without paying sixteen cents a pound.

Mr. LOGAN. Without paying sixteen cents per pound. I think this will work a great hardship. Where I reside, in my immediate home, there is a great deal of tobacco raised; in fact the most of the crop in that country is tobacco. There are a great many poor people there. You will find it so in all tobacco-raising countries. They do not use the pressed tobacco, the article that is sold for a dollar a pound, nor do they use smoking-tobacco put up in packages, but they buy it in the hand, cheaply twisted for their own use. Now, this provision, if I understand it, will prevent just that thing. It will force the poorer class of people who purchase tobacco in the hand to go and buy it at the prices charged for it as put up in parcels. That is not the object, but it is the effect of the provision, and for that reason I move to strike out this clause. It is not necessary for us to legislate entirely for the manufacturers. We should legislate somewhat for the poor man, who is his own manufacturer of tobacco. Let the man who desires to purchase tobacco and twist it for himself do it; and if he prefers to smoke it let him do it. It is nobody's business. It is his own taste, and if he cannot afford to smoke and chew the kind of tobacco you do, let him have the kind he can afford to use. Hence, I propose to strike out those words, and then the section will stand that all persons who deal in leaf tobacco, whose annual sales do not exceed $25,000 shall pay fifty dollars, and if their annual sales do exceed that, then it is to be increased according to the excess over $25,000. What difference does it make to you or I whether the leaf-tobacco man sells by the ten pounds or by the hand or by the fifty pounds? It makes no difference. You collect the same revenue precisely if he sells by the ten pounds as if it is sold by the fifty pounds, but it is not the same to the poor man who can afford to buy it only by the hand.

Mr. CLARKE, of Ohio. I call the gentleman's attention to the closing lines of the paragraph:

But no farmer or planter shall be required to pay a special tax as a dealer in leaf tobacco for selling tobacco of his own production.

Mr. LOGAN. That is true.

Mr. CLARKE, of Ohio. Does not that exempt these men of whom the gentleman speaks?

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir; it does not.

Mr. SCHENCK. I think the gentleman is laboring under a misapprehension. I have amended the paragraph so that it now reads "But every dealer who shall sell at any one time," &c.

Mr. LOGAN. How has it been amended?

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman and I are both striving after the same thing. We know that there is a great deal of injury done to the revenue by the selling of tobacco in small lots to be cut up by the purchaser, and thus escaping taxation entirely and interfering with the manufacturers of tobacco. We have, therefore, required that in those cases where they sell in less amounts than fifty pounds they shall make monthly returns, and that it shall be charged at the lowest rate of tax, sixteen cents a pound. But the object is not to prevent persons from raising and selling their own tobacco, and therefore I had amended the paragraph before the gentleman spoke, and I will ask the Clerk to read it as it now stands amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

But every dealer who shall sell at any one time a less quantity than fifty pounds of leaf tobacco shall make a monthly return of the aggregate of such sales to the proper assistant assessor, and a tax of sixteen cents per pound shall be assessed on all sales made in less quantity than fifty pounds, and paid as other monthly taxes are required to be paid. But no farmer or planter shall be required to pay a special tax as a dealer in leaf tobacco for selling tobacco of his own production, or which he received as rent of that produced by tenants upon his lands.

Mr. LOGAN. I will only say that I do not understand it. I do not mean to be captious at all, but I really do not understand this explanation. I do not think it obviates the difficulty at all. My object is to provide that a poor person may buy a hand of tobacco without having to pay an extra tax for it. That is my object. I do not think the objection I have to this provision is obviated by the amendment which has been made, and I, therefore, insist on my amendment.

Mr. COBURN. I think the difficulty can be obviated by exempting all sales under $100 worth, and then a man who wants to buy fifty dollars' worth or seventy-five dollars' worth, or any amount under $100, can do it without paying tax.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the amendment.

The question was taken on Mr. LOGAN's amendment, and it was disagreed to.

The question recurred on the motion of Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky, to strike out the entire paragraph; and being put, the motion was disagreed to.

The Clerk read the next paragraph, as follows:

Dealers in tobacco, whose annual sales do not exceed $5,000, shall each pay ten dollars, and two dollars for each additional $1,000 in excess of $5,000. Every person whose business it is to sell or offer for sale manufactured tobacco, snuff, or cigars, shall be regarded as a dealer in tobacco. And any keeper of a hotel, inn, tavern, or eating-house, who sells tobacco, snuff, or cigars, shall pay, in addition to his special tax therefor, the special tax of a dealer in tobacco.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend this paragraph by striking out in the first sentence all after the words "dealers in tobacco, whose annual sales do not exceed," and inserting in lieu thereof, "$1,000 shall pay five dollars, and if their annual sales exceed $1,000 shall pay in addition two dollars for each $1,000 in excess of $1,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to further amend the last sentence of this paragraph by inserting before the words "keeper of a hotel," the words "retail dealer or."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEWART. I move to amend this paragraph by striking out the last sentence, which has been amended to read as follows:

And any retail dealer or keeper of a hotel, inn, tavern, or eating-house, who sells tobacco, snuff, or cigars, shall pay, in addition to his special tax therefor, the special tax of a dealer in tobacco.

I suppose it is not the intention of the Committee of Ways and Means to make the tax too onerous upon keepers of hotels and tavern-keepers. We have already charged upon hotel-keepers a tax of twenty-five dollars on every billiard-table and bowling-alley, besides a very large tax on rentals. And then there is a paragraph which has been passed over, which increases the tax to an enormous extent.

As such a provision as this has not been in any other revenue law, and as I think it is too onerous a tax to be imposed upon these people who are keepers of hotels, tavern-keepers, and keepers of eating-houses, I have moved this amendment, for I think this burden is unjust.

Mr. MULLINS. I cannot see the propriety of the change contemplated here. I can see one way in which it would perhaps be advantageous to those who stay at hotels and want to smoke their pipes and puff their cigars there; it would be very convenient to them. These hotel-keepers, as a general thing, rent a small room besides the tipping-room to a person who deals in smoking-tobacco and cigars, and perhaps is ready to flavor it with a little Tom and Jerry. As persons avoid an indictment for selling whisky by saying that they only flavor their Tom and Jerry with it, so in this case they will avoid the tax on cigars by saying they flavor their Tom and Jerry with a cigar. Now, these are the very men who dodge the law, and we want to knock off this little wheel-house where they are standing.

Now, I know it would be very convenient for gentlemen who stay at hotels to have a chance to get their smoking-tobacco and cigars without going out of the hotel. Now, I stop at a hotel, and I am willing to take a little walk whenever I want to get any tobacco or cigars, if that will help the revenue. And I have no doubt it would be better for the health of all parties if they would take this little exercise. I do not suppose the gentleman was serious in offering this amendment, and therefore I will not seriously oppose it, as I know it cannot pass.

Mr. ALLISON. I would say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. STEWART] that this paragraph now proposes a reduction of five dollars upon the tax imposed by the existing law.

Mr. STEWART. I do not think there is anything in the old law to this effect.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. STEWART; and upon a division there were—ayes 18, noes 51; no quorum voting.

Mr. STEWART. I ask for tellers.

Mr. SCHENCK. If the gentleman desires it, I will agree that he shall have an opportunity to move his amendment in the House.

Mr. STEWART. That is all I want.

The CHAIRMAN. That can be done if no objection is made.

No objection was made.

The amendment of Mr. STEWART was accordingly rejected.

Mr. COBURN. I move to amend the first sentence of this section by inserting after the word "sales" the words "are over $100 and;" so that it will read:

Dealers in tobacco, whose annual sales are over $100 and do not exceed $5,000, shall each pay ten dollars, and two dollars for each additional $1,000 in excess of $5,000.

The effect of this amendment will be to exempt from taxation all dealers in tobacco in an amount less than $100. There are many small dealers in tobacco, country storekeepers and such persons, who do not make it a regular business. It is a great hardship upon such persons to be compelled to pay this tax, and it should not be imposed. Such dealers make little or nothing on their sales, and there is no danger of frauds from this source.

I think it may in some measure obviate the objection of my friend from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] to a portion of this bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope that amendment will not be adopted. If we are going to rely upon tobacco, fermented liquors, and distilled spirits mainly for the revenue to carry on the Government—and I think we must ultimately come to that—we shall have to tax the persons who engage in the business of manufacturing and selling those articles. This anxiety to fill the country, or to pursue such a course as must result in filling the country, with all sorts and descriptions of small dealers in these articles, tends, and will continue to tend, to defeat the end we are aiming at.

Now, we have become convinced that the only course for us to pursue in regard to distilled spirits and tobacco was to cover the whole subject in such a manner as will require all persons engaged in the business to contribute fairly and fully to the support of the Government by increasing its revenues so as to relieve in part now, and ultimately relieve altogether, those industrial pursuits which relate to matters that are not merely of luxury and of artificial tastes. I hope no such principle as this will be adopted.

Mr. PAINE. If the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBURN] will examine this whole paragraph he will see that his amendment will not meet the case of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN,] which had reference to leaf-tobacco, while this amendment is confined to dealers in manufactured tobacco.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. COBURN; and it was not agreed to, upon a division—ayes twelve, noes not counted.

Mr. STEVENS, of New Hampshire. I move to amend the pending paragraph by striking out the word "cigars," wherever it occurs. Mr. Chairman, I received some time ago from some of my constituents engaged in the manufacture of cigars a remonstrance against this increased tax, which I presented and had referred to the Committee of Ways and Means. On an examination of that remonstrance, I have been led to conclude that it is well provided, and in this conclusion I have been confirmed by the admissions made from time to time on this floor by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. It has been repeatedly stated here, not that the tax upon the articles of spirits and tobacco is too low, but that the difficulty is that the Government cannot collect one half or a much less proportion of the tax already assessed and attempted to be collected. Yet, in the face of the admission made on this floor by the chairman of the committee, in the hearing of members of the House that the tax upon cigars has been such as to stimulate almost beyond precedent the smuggling into this country of foreign cigars, coming into ruinous competition with our home manufacture. Notwithstanding this admission, the Committee of Ways and Means propose to increase this tax, burdening to a still greater degree the manufacturers of cigars.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I take it for granted that the manufacture of cigars is an honest and reputable business. I take it for granted, also, that in the estimation of at least a considerable proportion of the community this business stands upon a different ground from the distillation of spirits. I regard it as an honest and reputable business; and so viewing it I do not desire to see it burdened with this onerous, and, as it seems to me, entirely useless tax, a tax that cannot be collected.

For this reason, and because I desire to represent on this floor the wishes of my constituents, I have moved to strike out the word "cigars" wherever it occurs in this paragraph, leaving this branch of business still subject to the specific tax per thousand on the manufacture of cigars, which, as I understand, has been raised by the committee to ten dollars per thousand, although I trust it will be reduced to five dollars as it has stood heretofore.

Mr. SCHENCK obtained the floor.

Mr. BROMWELL. If my friend from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] will yield for a moment I would like to ask the gentleman from New Hampshire what difference this paragraph can make as to foreign cigars? It imposes a tax on the sales and applies to the seller of either the foreign or the domestic article. The gentleman speaks as though his objections to the paragraph were that it favors the foreign article.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] yield?

Mr. SCHENCK. No, sir. Mr. Chairman, I desire in the first place to announce distinctly that so far as the Committee of Ways and Means can control the matter, no attempt will be made to change the tax on cigars; that will remain at five dollars per thousand, although it was ten dollars in the bill as originally reported. Such, I understand to be the desire of the committee.

What is it that the gentleman from New Hampshire proposes? Why, that the manufacturers of cigars shall be put, as to their sales, upon a different footing from all other manufacturers, and upon a different footing from the manufacturers of snuff, plug tobacco, or chewing tobacco. On what ground this proposition is to be sustained I am at a loss to comprehend, except that the gentleman says he understands it to be the wish of his constituents. Sir, in every civilized country raising a revenue by taxation, it is coming to be understood that in order to relieve the burdens of the people it is best that taxation shall be made, so far as possible, to rest upon those objects connected with artificial appetites or mere luxuries. Yet, the gentleman would put the manufacture of cigars upon a better footing than perhaps almost any other manufacture in the country. He proposes to relieve these manufacturers entirely, as I understand, from any special tax, leaving them, it is true, subject to the specific tax upon the article itself; but the manufacture and the sale of the article and the dealing in the article are not to be subjected to the tax of two tenths of one per cent. imposed upon other manufactures.

Mr. STEVENS, of New Hampshire. I made no such statement.

Mr. SCHENCK. Now, sir, we have taken a different view of this matter. We put a special tax of ten dollars upon those who make sales not exceeding $5,000, and only two tenths of one per cent. on all over $5,000. We thought at least this might be made in reference to the manufacture of cigars, as well as that they should pay ten dollars on the basis of a specific tax, although their manufactures might, in the amount of sales, be less than $5,000.

I hope this amendment will not prevail. I hope we shall contrive in some way out of these subjects of tax to get something more than that proportion of tax we derive from the ordinary industry of the country. These refer to luxurious habits and artificial appetites.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. STEVENS, of New Hampshire, and it was rejected.

Mr. GETZ. I move to insert after the word "cigars," in the seven hundred and thirtieth line, the words "to an amount exceeding $300 a year." I make this amendment for this reason: there are a great many small hotels, beside tavern-keepers and restaurant-keepers, who sell an inferior quality of tobacco and cigars to small amounts, and who are under the imposition of other taxes. I do not think it is fair to tax them again. Some do not sell more than fifty dollars a year. I have in my district tavern-keepers who do not sell more than $100 a year.

Mr. MAYNARD. I suggest that the people who cannot engage in this business profitably should get into some other small business that is profitable.

The question was taken; and Mr. GETZ's amendment was rejected.

Mr. STEVENS, of New Hampshire. I move to strike out the entire paragraph.

Mr. Chairman, I have been accused, if I may use the expression, by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means with being partial to the manufacture of cigars. I disclaim entirely any such partiality. I suppose those more particularly interested than my constituents in the other branches of the manufacture of tobacco have their Representatives who will take care of their interests. I stated at the outset the particular reason why I brought this subject to the attention of the committee. I say now to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means I am prepared to vote to strike out this whole paragraph, and strike off this additional burden from the manufacturers of tobacco.

I am not prepared to say we should go so far as to burden the manufacture or culture of tobacco with such a tax as the gentleman proposes to derive revenue from it. I do not admit that tobacco stands upon the same ground as distilled spirits or intoxicating liquors. In my judgment it is no more a luxury than tea or coffee, and it is a habit no more false for tobacco than for tea or coffee. Yet, sir, we all know that tea and coffee are taxed only for the purpose of raising revenue, and not because they are luxuries. I am willing that tobacco shall be taxed for the purpose of raising revenue, but I do not wish it taxed so that it will be burdensome upon the people, and the result shall be, as the committee say it has been, to prevent the collection of the tax.

Mr. ALLISON. I rise to oppose the amendment. I do not precisely understand the proposition of the gentleman from New Hampshire. Under the existing law retail dealers in tobacco are taxed ten dollars. Under the bill now proposed we reduce the tax to five dollars, and two dollars per thousand on other sales, so that it is a reduction. It is an absolute reduction of tax on small dealers for the reason that we have taxed tobacco in the form of manufactured tobacco and cigars.

Mr. STEVENS, of New Hampshire. Do I understand, as the section now stands, we only put the tax at five dollars?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEVENS, of New Hampshire. I read it ten.

Mr. ALLISON. That has been amended. Does the gentleman withdraw his amendment?

Mr. STEVENS, of New Hampshire. I do not.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say further that we propose to tax dealers in tobacco as we propose to tax dealers in other articles. I appeal to my friend to know whether or not he proposes, after having reduced the tax upon the industry of the country, now to reduce the tax on luxuries, those things that are known as such, so that we shall not raise the requisite amount of revenue, and next winter have to come back here and impose taxes upon the industry of his constituents? Because that will be the result of it. We must either impose a liberal and fair tax upon the luxuries of the country, or we must impose taxes upon its industry. Now, here is a luxury, and tobaccoists in this country cannot complain of the tax, because we have imposed an enormous tax on all imported tobacco.

Mr. STEVENS, of New Hampshire. If the gentleman will allow me, I would ask him if the Committee of Ways and Means have not found that it is utterly impossible to collect the tax already imposed upon tobacco in its various forms?

Mr. ALLISON. I answer the gentleman by saying that we believe we can collect the small tax of two tenths of one per cent., or two dollars on $1,000 as easily upon tobacco as on any other product manufactured in this country. That is all we propose to do by this bill. We propose to disseminate this tax among the dealers in and manufacturers of tobacco as we do among the dealers in and manufacturers of every other product under this bill. Now we have reduced the specific tax on cigars to five dollars per thousand, and I believe we will not increase the specific tax on the article of tobacco. Therefore I ask the gentleman not to interpose an amendment here which will discriminate in favor of these luxuries and against the necessary industry of the country. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from New Hampshire.

Mr. STEVENS, of New Hampshire. I desire to say that I did not understand when I moved the amendment that an amendment had been made reducing the tax from ten dollars to five dollars. That certainly is a concession on the part of the committee which I hail with a great deal of satisfaction. I will say to the gentleman who appeals to me to know whether I desire to discriminate that I think the appeal was made, to my knowledge, by way of enlargement of his own speech, and not with any idea that I could entertain a feeling of that kind. I put the question to him which he has avoided answering, whether the Committee of Ways and Means have not ascertained—and I now ask him if they have not so announced to the House—that it is utterly impossible to collect the tax on manufactured tobacco under the present law? He has not answered it; he evades it.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not evade it. The specific tax I know has been avoided, not the tax upon the dealer.

Mr. STEVENS, of New Hampshire. Then I will say I desire just this: that the Committee of Ways and Means and this House shall devise some means by which we can collect the tax already imposed.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. STEVENS, of New Hampshire. I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Manufacturers of tobacco shall each pay ten dollars, and in addition thereto, where the amount of the penal sum of the bond of such manufacturer, required by this act to be given to the collector of the district, shall exceed the sum of $5,000, two dollars for each $1,000 in excess of $5,000 of such penal sum. Every person whose business it is to manufacture tobacco or snuff for himself, or who shall employ others to manufacture tobacco or snuff, whether such manufacture shall be by cutting, pressing, grinding, crushing, or rubbing of any leaf or raw tobacco, or otherwise preparing raw or leaf tobacco or manufactured or partially manufactured tobacco or snuff, or the putting up for use or consumption of scraps, waste, clippings, stems, or deposits of tobacco, resulting from any process of handling tobacco, shall be regarded as a manufacturer of tobacco.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to strike out in line seven hundred and thirty-five the words, "collector of the district." They are unnecessary, as the bond is given to the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PILE. I move to amend by striking out the following:

Where the amount of the penal sum of the bond of such manufacturer, required by this act to be given to the collector of the district, shall exceed the sum of $5,000 (two dollars for each $1,000 in excess of $5,000 of such penal sum).

And by inserting in lieu thereof the following:

When the yearly sales of such manufacturer shall exceed $5,000, two dollars for each additional $1,000.

I offer this for the purpose of inquiring of the chairman of the committee if the provision of the section, as it now stands, is not liable to abuse in this way?

The tax is graduated by the penal sum of the bond. If I remember the general provision of the bill with reference to the bond, it may be increased by the collector, and the collector or the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, together with the collector, has discretionary supervision of these bonds, and may impose a heavy bond on one man and a light bond upon another. If that be true, I can readily see how, for personal purposes, a collector may impose great hardships upon one manufacturer and extend favors to another. Or if the amount of the bond is graduated upon the machines the manufacturers may have, then I think a man should not be required to give bonds for the definite number of machines or presses he may own when he may use them only half the year and not use them the rest of the year, while other manufacturers may use theirs the whole of the year. This tax should be graduated as other taxes of this kind are, upon the amount of business and manufacturing done. If there is any reason for the change of the graduation of this tax from the amount of sales to the amount of the penal bonds that can be given by the commissioner, I shall not press the amendment, but I should like to have the matter explained.

Mr. SCHENCK. The object of this was to fix the special tax in conformity with the provisions in relation to the bonds to be given by manufacturers of tobacco. On page 204 it is provided that the manufacturer of tobacco "shall give a bond in conformity with the provisions of this act, to be approved by the assessor of the district, in the sum of $2,000, with an addition to said sum of $3,000 for each cutting machine kept for use, of $1,000 for each screw-press kept for use in making plug or pressed tobacco, of $5,000 for each hydraulic press kept for use, of $1,000 for each snuff-mill kept for use, and of $1,000 for each hand-mill," &c. So that the bond is regulated by the amount of business that is done, and the special tax is made to conform to the amount of the bond, the bond indicating the amount of business.

Mr. PILE. It may become necessary for the manufacturer to have more presses and more cutting-machines than he can use the entire year.

Mr. SCHENCK. Then he will cancel his bond so far.

Mr. PILE. This provision in regard to the bond applies to the number of machines he has, and not to the number that he uses.

The question was taken on Mr. PILE's amendment; and it was disagreed to.

The next paragraph was read as follows:

Manufacturers of cigars, whose annual sales shall not exceed $5,000, shall each pay ten dollars, and two dollars for each additional $1,000 in excess of $5,000. Every person whose business it is to make or manufacture cigars for himself, or who shall employ others to make or manufacture cigars, shall be regarded as a manufacturer of cigars: Provided, That no special tax receipt shall issue to any manufacturer of cigars until he shall have given the bond required by law.

Mr. SCHENCK. I offer the following amendment from the Committee of Ways and Means:

Page 123, line seven hundred and forty-nine, after the word "and," at the end of the line, insert "when their annual receipts exceed $5,000."

So that it will read:

Manufacturers of cigars whose annual sales shall not exceed $5,000 shall pay ten dollars, and when their annual receipts exceed $5,000, two dollars for each additional $1,000 in excess of $5,000, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER. In line seven hundred and forty-nine I move to strike out "ten" and insert "five" in lieu thereof, so as to make the tax five dollars. I believe there will be no objection to that. Five dollars is what they have had to pay heretofore.

Mr. SCHENCK. That will simply put them on a more favorable footing than any other manufacturers. That is all I have to say.

The amendment was disagreed to.

The next paragraph was read as follows:

Cigar-makers shall each pay one dollar. Every person whose business it is to make cigars for others, either for pay, upon commission, on shares, or otherwise, from material furnished by others, shall be regarded as a cigar-maker. Every cigar-maker employed in the making of cigars in any collection district, other than the district where such special tax receipt shall have been issued to him, shall register his name and residence, without previous demand therefor, with the assistant assessor of the division in which such cigar-makers shall be so employed; and any cigar-maker who shall neglect or refuse to make such registry shall, on conviction thereof, be fined five dollars for each day that such cigar-maker shall so offend by neglecting or refusing to register.

Mr. SCHENCK. On page 123, line seven hundred and fifty-seven, I move to strike out the words "one dollar" and insert "twenty-five cents" in lieu thereof; so that it will read "cigar-makers shall each pay twenty-five cents." I propose, in behalf of the Committee of Ways and Means, to reduce the dollar to twenty-five cents. I know that all around me are a great number of patriotic gentlemen ready to pitch in for the protection of the poor cigar-makers. [Laughter.] Now, the truth is that you cannot keep up a system under which we shall know what cigars are made unless you have a registration of cigar-makers. Most of the cigars are not made in the shops, but are made outside by persons who take the material and return a certain number of cigars, persons who carry their work home with them. The object is to have a registration of the cigar-makers; it is not for the purpose of revenue. The proof of that is to be found in the fact that we propose that the whole of this twenty-five cent fee—for that is what we propose to reduce the tax to—shall be given to the assessor for issuing the certificate. Gentlemen say that it is very hard that a man cannot be employed as a cigar-maker without taking out a certificate as such. So it is probably as compared with other laborers; but we are perfectly satisfied, from the experience of this and every other country, that when you undertake to keep the run of the business of cigar-making you must know who make the cigars.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. Why not let the certificate be issued without expense to the cigar-makers?

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. I would ask the gentleman—

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. SCHENCK. I cannot well yield to and answer more than five gentlemen at one and the same time.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. What is the objection to the present mode of granting permits to cigar-makers, and not imposing a direct tax upon them?

Mr. SCHENCK. That costs fifty cents.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. No; twenty-five cents.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not care what it is. Gentlemen may make it one cent if they please. All that I want to show is that it is no tax, no oppression. I defy any one who has ever attempted to follow this business of cigar-making, to keep the run of it in such a way as to protect the Government against frauds or evasions of the law unless some account is kept of those who are engaged in making cigars for manufacturers?

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. What is the objection to inserting in section one hundred and sixty-three of this bill, in which the duties of these cigar-makers are specified, a provision requiring this registration to be made? As this provision now stands it imposes a direct tax upon the cigar-makers, which I want to avoid. Let it come in as a permit, the same as under the present law.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will tell the gentleman the difficulty about the permit as he calls it. These were originally called permits and licenses; but the Supreme Court decided that you could not grant permits, you could not grant licenses; that it was not within the power of the Congress of the United States to pass laws by which privileges were to be given for the future; but that you might put a special tax upon persons with reference to the business they followed, and attach to that business any condition. And it is in conformity with that decision that the law has been altered. Under the decision of the Supreme Court what used to be called licenses have been entirely abandoned, and we have substituted special taxes upon all persons according to the pursuits in which they are engaged. That has been kept up and sustained for the last two or three years.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. All right; I am satisfied.

Mr. PAINE. It has been said by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means that he proposes to impose this tax of twenty-five cents for the purpose of effecting registration in order to enable the officers of the Government to follow the cigars that are made and tax them. Now, if we impose a tax on these cigar-makers, we will make it an object on their part to elude the registration. As the object is not to secure revenue from the cigar-maker by registration, it seems to me the best plan would be to pay each one of them twenty-five cents in order to induce him to be registered.

Mr. EGGLESTON. I move to amend by striking out the whole paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PILE] has been already recognized to make that motion, but yielded that the paragraph might be perfected. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] to strike out "one dollar" and insert "twenty-five cents," so as to make the first sentence read, "Cigar-makers shall each pay twenty-five cents."

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. PILE. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the first sentence. I proposed to move to strike out this whole paragraph; but from the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] I have concluded that this registration is perhaps necessary. It may be necessary to require these cigar-makers to register; to keep a list of them at the offices of the different assessors; but it certainly seems to me a very small business to impose a tax of twenty-five cents on the cigar-makers for making this registration. If the object is simply their registration and not to make this a source of revenue, then, as the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] has said, that object can be better secured by simply requiring them to register, imposing upon them the payment of no fee for such registration.

I am opposed absolutely to the principle of taxing directly the laborer, even to the extent of one cent. I do not want it to be said that we tax directly the man who earns his bread by his toil. I am unwilling that by our legislation we should impose taxation directly upon the journeyman laborer, the laborer who works in the shop for his daily or weekly wages. I am against the whole principle, and I trust that any provisions founded upon that principle will be stricken from this bill. If there is a necessity for this registration, let the provisions with reference to registration stand, but strike out this pitiful little tax of twenty-five cents or one dollar.

Mr. BECK. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. PILE,] because I think no portion of this paragraph ought to be retained. It proposes to impose a fine of five dollars for each day that a cigar-maker may refuse or neglect to register. This penalty applies to every cigar-maker. I want to say to the committee that in my section of the country, as I suppose in many other localities, these cigar-makers are composed in many instances of boys and girls, old negro men and women, persons who have not the capacity to conform to a requirement of this kind. To fine each of these persons five dollars for every day that they fail to do what many of the most intelligent of them have not the intelligence to understand, seems to me to be too severe. Let us, if necessary, require the manufacturer to furnish a list of the persons in his employ, and fine him if he fails to do so; let us adopt any method by which we can reach a registration through intelligence; but to require boys and girls, old negro men and women—persons who would be paupers but for the fact that they can make cigars—to register under a penalty of five dollars for every day they fail to register, would be, in my judgment, unwise legislation. Every gentleman of this House living in a tobacco-growing region must know that very many of our cigars are made by the class of persons I have mentioned. To impose upon them this penalty of five dollars a day would be utterly ruinous; it would simply fill your jails to no purpose whatever. That is the reason I object to this whole paragraph.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move pro forma to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PILE] so as to strike out, instead of the first sentence, the whole of the first line of the paragraph. I rose a while ago for the purpose of opposing the gentleman's amendment, but was so unfortunate as to be unable to get the recognition of the Chair before another gentleman, who made a speech on the same side, which I do not understand to be a very formidable kind of opposition.

I wish the House distinctly to understand that I care not whether they call this a tax or a permit; I care not whether they charge anything for it so only they shall secure the registration as a sort of a police registration, for that is all it is. If you want to collect the tax upon cigars it is necessary that you should know who are engaged in the manufacture of cigars. The great difficulty is to keep the run of those who make cigars for the manufacturers. The mere maker is not called a manufacturer and is not taxed as a manufacturer, but he who has the capital and employs these actual makers is charged and taxed in this way; and in order to prevent fraud in this, just as in the matter of fraud in whisky between the worm of the still and the distillery warehouse, it seems to have been shown beyond all question, clearly and certainly, we must know where and by whom cigars are made, in order that they may be embraced, and in order their numbers may be ascertained and the tax collected upon them. Now, sir, for this purpose it has been the policy of the law to have them pay for what is called a "permit." We propose the same thing, and call it a special tax. I do not care what you call it; I do not care whether you charge anything or not. We have only charged the cigar-maker enough to pay the assessor for issuing a certificate of registration. He is charged twenty-five cents, which, as the law is now, and as we propose to make it, goes as a compensation to the assessor. We propose simply that the cigar-maker shall pay enough, call it tax or permit, to pay the expenses of this certificate of registration.

Mr. WELKER. I suggest to my colleague to strike out all of this section which requires any tax to be paid at all, and require these cigar-makers to register their names.

Mr. SCHENCK. That is exactly the amendment now pending offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. WELKER. But his amendment strikes out that part in reference to obtaining a register. I want to strike out all that part which provides that they shall be fined. I want to provide that they shall be registered, but that they shall be required to pay nothing. This will obviate all difficulty.

Mr. SCHENCK. In other words, the gentleman will make cigar-makers do certain things, and then strike out the definition of a cigar-maker. We propose to keep up that definition. I know perfectly well what all this means. I have it in my own town, where we make four million cigars. If I were one of these cigar-makers—

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I desire to remind the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, in reference to the fee of twenty-five cents to the assessor for registering cigar-makers, that an amendment was made to strike that out, but action on it was suspended, dependent on the action on this paragraph. If this be stricken out, then the part that relates to the fee to the assessor will also be stricken out. That was the understanding with which we passed from the preceding portion of the bill. Therefore the fee to the assessor ought not to be brought up as a plea why this should be put in this paragraph to pay the assessor.

The question was taken on Mr. SCHENCK's amendment; and it was disagreed to.

Mr. CHURCHILL. I move to strike out the first sentence.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not in order.

Mr. CHURCHILL. I move to strike out the whole paragraph, and insert a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not in order.

The question was taken on Mr. PILE's amendment; and it was rejected, only twenty-four voting in the affirmative.

Mr. EGGLESTON. I move to strike out the whole paragraph; and I am very much obliged to the Committee of Ways and Means for the opportunity to give my views on this paragraph. I have watched this bill as attentively as almost any member who has not participated in getting it up, from the beginning on to this hour. I have read it through. I have tried to get through my brain what it meant, and I have never come to any conclusion until we reached this paragraph of the bill; and that is this, that the committee have abandoned all idea of getting tax on whisky and spirits, and they have at last come down to the poorest class of mechanics to tax them upon their business and occupation.

Mr. SCHENCK. It is the present law.

Mr. EGGLESTON. A more odious tax never was imposed than that under the present law. You ask the assistant assessors in the large cities to go into a cigar-shop, creep up to the crippled soldier, and ask him for his twenty-five cents. These officers tell me they would rather take a half dollar out of their own pocket and put it into the hands of these poor men than be compelled to perform this duty. Under the present law they ask him for twenty-five cents, but the Committee of Ways and Means have proposed to increase it to a dollar.

Mr. ALLISON. My proposition is to make it twenty-five cents.

Mr. EGGLESTON. I know it; but why did you propose it? Because you saw gentlemen on every side demanding it. As my colleague [Mr. SCHENCK] said, it was five against one. Now, this is a small matter for us. My friend from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] says he does not belong to the committee. I thought he did. I say this is a small matter to us, but to these people it is important. And yet it is not so much the dollar or the twenty-five cents as it is the principle. We do not tax the carpenter, nor the shoemaker, nor mechanics of any sort from beginning to end of this bill. You tax nobody except those poor cigar-makers, many of whom are females, many of whom are small girls and boys of ten or twelve years of age. We propose to send these assessors about the cigar-shops to collect this twenty-five cents. Sir, if there is no other way of keeping a record of how many cigars are made in this country I say let the record go. Do not let us have any such means as this provided for making a record.

Mr. MULLINS. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. EGGLESTON. Certainly.

Mr. MULLINS. Is the gentleman engaged in the cigar manufacture? [Laughter.]

Mr. EGGLESTON. I am engaged in no such business. If I was engaged, I will say to the gentleman, in any kind of manufacturing business, I would not vote upon a question affecting that business here one way or the other. I hope that this paragraph will be stricken out. I am satisfied my colleague [Mr. SCHENCK] will wish it had been when he comes to look it over. I hope he will agree now to have it all stricken out.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Chairman, I am happy to know that my colleague has given continual attention to this tax bill. Watching it as it proceeded from page to page through all its great length, and waiting till some grand subject equal to his genius—twenty-five cents on cigars [laughter]—was presented for the consideration of the House, and then his mighty intellect was waked up as he found a subject with which he could grapple. [Laughter.] I congratulate the country and this House that after watching, waiting, hoping, and looking for some occasion which should arouse his intellect so as to assert itself in its full proportions and give the world the entire benefit of all this genius, he has at length reached that which was the proper standard for its measurement. [Laughter.] Sir, I have said nothing about there being five against one on this question. When gentlemen were interrupting me all around, I said that I could not answer five at a time who were appealing to me for the floor. It was a perversion to suggest that I said anything else.

As to this tax I have explained without any demagogism, and, as I thought, clearly to the House, that the committee have not proposed anything except to continue the law with a view to a police regulation which they deem to be necessary in order to know who are engaged in manufacturing cigars and in making cigars for the manufacturer, so as to prevent cigars getting into the market without paying the tax. I said distinctly—and the gentleman might have saved himself much of his comment if he had remembered it—that the committee did not care whether it was one cent, ten cents, twenty-five cents, or a dollar; and I proposed, seeing that gentlemen thought it was in the nature of a tax, because a dollar was mentioned, to bring it down to twenty-five cents, thinking that descending from a dollar downward, if my colleague would only make an effort to rise toward twenty-five cents we might meet somewhere on the way. But my colleague was not willing to meet that compromise, and, with other gentlemen here, voted against reducing it from one dollar to twenty-five cents, so as to have an opportunity, I suppose, afterward of attacking it as a dollar tax. Sir, I do not believe, and I represent a great many of these men, that the cigar makers of the country are especially obliged to those who believe that they are not willing to pay their dollar or fifty cents or twenty-five cents or whatever else the interests of the revenue of the country may require for the purpose of registration in order that the business may fairly and honestly go on in the country. That is a kind of demagogism in which I do not indulge myself, being willing to take the responsibility of doing what I think right, and I do not sympathize with it when gentlemen flash it off in all directions around me.

Now, sir, I hope the House will bear in mind the object for which this is introduced, and if they desire that the assessor or any other officer shall do the duty for nothing, let it be so. It takes only so much, and it is a very small amount, from their receipts. Adopt the substitute suggested by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHURCHILL,] providing that this registration shall be made, and leaving out every charge whatever for it. No matter what the charge is or whether no charge be made, I repeat to the House for their understanding that all this pretense that it is for the purpose of grinding down the poor cigar-makers is a poor, miserable, demagogical pretext, which has no foundation in anything said or proposed by the committee. All that has been proposed by the committee was to secure some sort of regulation by which we might feel sure that our taxes would be collected, without any reference whatever to any idea of raising revenue from this source.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. Before the question is taken on the motion to strike out the paragraph, I propose to perfect it by inserting after the word "shall," in line seven hundred and sixty-seven, the word "knowingly," so that it shall read "who shall knowingly neglect or refuse," &c.

Mr. ALLISON. Nobody objects to that. The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. Again, in line seven hundred and sixty-nine, after the word "so" I move to insert "knowingly."

Mr. ALLISON. No one objects to that. The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BROMWELL. I move to strike out the entire paragraph, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

Every manufacturer of cigars shall register the name and residence of every cigar-maker in his employ with the assistant assessor of the division in which his principal place of business is located, and every manufacturer of cigars who shall fail to make such registry shall, on conviction thereof, be fined five dollars for every day he shall so fail or refuse to register any person employed by him.

Mr. Chairman, as I have drawn this amendment in great haste, I am not entirely certain that it covers every point that it ought to, but I do feel very sure that the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, need not be so very certain about the demagogism in this House. I have heard that word demagogism fall from him several times in the course of this debate, and I will say to him that there is something more than demagogism in the opposition to this paragraph. These penalties are unheard of. They are applied to a class of laborers who are ignorant, as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] has well said. They are to be imposed without previous notice. The assessor is instructed by this law not to tell these persons that they are making themselves liable to a fine of five dollars a day. I say it is a trap, and I say that it is a law which will be as odious as any law that can be found in the tax-book of the United States.

Whether it be demagogical or not, I say that these little vexatious and annoying provisions, especially when they touch private persons are the most odious and the hardest to explain of any laws that can be put upon the statute-book. I think the suggestion of the gentleman from Kentucky was well made, that the law is onerous and uncalled for. I admit the necessity of registration. Either the cigar-makers themselves should register or the manufacturers should register for them; I care not which.

But why shall such penalties be visited upon that class of persons? Suppose one of those ignorant persons works for thirty days before he finds out that there is any such law as this—for the assessor will not inform him of the requirements of the law—that thirty days will amount to a penalty of $150 from which there is no escape, as the assessor possesses no power of compromise. Now, I say it is contrary to all the spirit and genius of our laws.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BROMWELL. Certainly.

Mr. MAYNARD. The gentleman admits, as a part of the general policy, the propriety of having all cigar-makers registered?

Mr. BROMWELL. I do.

Mr. MAYNARD. How does the gentleman propose to enforce that provision if there is no penalty for not doing so?

Mr. BROMWELL. I propose by my amendment to make the manufacturers do it.

Mr. MAYNARD. Suppose a man is not working for any particular manufacturer, but is at work around generally, making cigars.

Mr. BROMWELL. It is very easy to make a provision to suit their case.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to say one word with reference to this provision. I think every gentleman on this floor will admit that there have been great frauds committed in the manufacture of cigars. Those frauds arise not from the fact that these cigar-makers are in the employment of others, but from the fact that they themselves made cigars in small quantities in their garrets or cellars, and then came out upon the streets and disposed of those cigars in small quantities to saloon-keepers and small sellers of cigars. The object of this provision is to ascertain in every city and town the people who are actually engaged in this business of cigar-making.

I agree with my friend from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] that these people who engage in the business of cigar-making are usually an ignorant class of people. Therefore I was in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from West Virginia, [Mr. HUBBARD,] that before we imposed any penalty upon them we should show the existence of knowledge on their part that it was their duty to register themselves. That amendment has been adopted, and is now a part of this bill. Therefore no man can be subjected to any punishment for not registering under this provision, until it is shown that he had knowledge of the fact that this law existed, and that having that knowledge he still refused to register in accordance with it. It seems to me that that obviates the objection made by a great many gentlemen here.

Now, I want to say to my friend from Ohio [Mr. EGGLESTON] that I have heard no man upon this floor more loud in his denunciations of the frauds upon the revenue, which have been committed by distillers, by the whisky ring, as he terms them, and those engaged in the manufacture of tobacco, than he himself has been. And I apprehend that no gentleman here represents a constituency more largely engaged in perpetrating those frauds upon the revenue than the constituency which the gentleman himself represents.

Now, we do not propose by this provision to impose any great penalty or burden upon these poor people who are engaged in making cigars, if they neglect or refuse to comply with the requirement of registration. Long before the gentleman's voice was heard upon the subject upon this floor the Committee of Ways and Means decided to reduce this tax to twenty-five cents. And the words "one dollar" are a misprint in the bill.

Now, if the gentleman thinks that the tax of twenty-five cents is too high, I am willing that it should be reduced to ten cents. The only object, as stated by the chairman, is that the assistant assessor in every district may know the persons who are engaged in the manufacture of cigars, that he may keep the run of their business. These cigar-makers go from the employ of one manufacturer to that of another; hence it is in my judgment impracticable to require the manufacturer to register the names of his employés. To-day the cigar-maker may be employed by a manufacturer, and to-morrow he may buy five or ten dollars' worth of tobacco and going into a garret make cigars on his own account, and the next day he may go into a saloon and sell them.

Now, it is the interest and the duty of every honest manufacturer and of every honest industrious cigar-maker in this country to see to it that this employment shall be a legitimate employment; and any man who is desirous of pursuing this occupation honestly will not object to paying twenty-five cents, and by going to the assistant assessor or upon the demand of that officer giving his name and telling where he is employed as a maker of cigars.

Mr. BECK. Will the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] allow me to call his attention to a single point which I think controls this whole question?

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] has expired.

Mr. CHURCHILL obtained the floor.

Mr. GRISWOLD. If my colleague [Mr. CHURCHILL] will yield to me for a moment, I wish to inquire whether the word "knowingly" has been inserted before "neglect or refuse."

The CHAIRMAN. It has been.

Mr. CHURCHILL. As an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BROMWELL,] I move to amend so as to make the paragraph read as follows:

Every person whose business it is to make cigars for others, either for pay, upon commission, on shares, or otherwise, from material furnished by others, shall be regarded as a cigar-maker. Every cigar-maker shall register his name and residence, without previous demand thereof, with the assistant assessor of the division in which such cigar-maker shall be employed; and any cigar-maker who shall knowingly neglect or refuse to make such registry shall, on conviction thereof, be fined five dollars for each day that he shall so offend by neglecting or refusing to register.

This omits the charge imposed by the paragraph on every cigar-maker, and provides for a registry; but the penalty is incurred only where the party knowingly offends.

The CHAIRMAN. Unless the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BROMWELL] accepts this as a modification of his amendment, it is not in order.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I rise to a question of order. Is it not in order to amend the matter which it is proposed to insert before it is inserted?

The CHAIRMAN. The original text may be amended, but the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois cannot be amended.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. But my point is that it is in order to amend what it is proposed to substitute for the words to be stricken out. When you once get it in it cannot be amended.

The CHAIRMAN. The original text can be amended.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. But the matter to be substituted for it—

The CHAIRMAN. That must be taken as a whole.

The amendment of Mr. BROMWELL was not agreed to.

Mr. CHURCHILL. I now move to amend the paragraph so as to read as follows:

Every person whose business it is to make cigars for others, either for pay, upon commission, on shares, or otherwise, from material furnished by others, shall be regarded as a cigar-maker. Every cigar-maker shall register his name and residence, without previous demand therefor, with the assistant assessor of the division in which such cigar-maker shall be employed; and any cigar-maker who shall knowingly neglect or refuse to make such registry shall, on conviction thereof, be fined five dollars for each day that he shall so offend by neglecting or refusing to register.

Mr. Chairman, I have only to say, in regard to the amendment I have offered, that it dispenses with any sum to be paid by the cigar-makers. It provides for a registration of the cigar-makers, the great point desired to be secured by the committee in the proposition they have here made in their bill. It also inserts the word "knowingly," so the cigar-maker shall not be liable to the penalty unless he has knowingly offended against the law.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I move to amend the substitute by striking out after the words "and any" and to insert as follows:

Manufacturer of cigars who shall employ a cigar-maker, who shall neglect or refuse to make such registration shall, upon conviction, be fined five dollars for each day that such cigar-maker so offending in neglecting or refusing to register shall be employed by him.

Mr. LOGAN. I wish to ask the gentleman a question. Was that amendment agreed to in the committee?

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. No, sir; I offer it independently.

Mr. BARNES. I rise to oppose the amendment. I have heard no objection on the part of any gentleman upon this floor to the object proposed in this section, the registration of cigar-makers. While we pass this paragraph in a way to understand it, that it shall be for the particular object of registration—and they do say so—yet, sir, to levy any tax of any amount on the laborers who are not in this law, those who are to come after us, looking at this paragraph, will say that it levies a tax directly upon one class of laborers. Therefore I am opposed to being required to single out any class of producers and leave them subject to a tax. However desirable it may be to produce this registration, it is more desirable that there should be no record of an effort of this kind which should carry a taint upon the laborer. The House understands it. If the Committee of Ways and Means consent to strike out all but the registration provision I see no objection to it. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BECK. I desire to say that I have a substitute which I think will meet the ideas of the chairman of the committee. It is as follows:

Each manufacturer of cigars shall register with the assistant assessor of his district the name and sex of all persons employed by him in the manufacture of cigars, and shall, from time to time, report the changes in his employes, and the number of cigars made by each; and failure either so to register his employes, or to give a true account of the cigars manufactured by each, shall subject him to a fine of ten dollars for each offense.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move by unanimous consent that all further debate on this paragraph be terminated.

There was no objection; and it was ordered accordingly.

The amendment of Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts, was agreed to; and then Mr. CHURCHILL's substitute, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. EGGLESTON. I now withdraw the motion to strike out the paragraph.

The Clerk read the next paragraph, as follows:

Manufacturers, not otherwise charged with a special tax, shall each pay ten dollars; and all manufacturers, whose annual sales exceed $5,000, (except those otherwise provided for, or those on whose products a specific tax is imposed,) shall pay two dollars for each additional $1,000 on the amount of their sales in excess of $5,000. Every person who shall manufacture by hand or machinery, in whole or in part, any goods, wares, or merchandise, and whose annual sales of such products shall exceed $5,000, or who shall manufacture or prepare for sale any article or compound on which a specific tax is not imposed, or who shall put up for sale in packages, with his own name or trade-mark thereon, any article or compound on which a specific tax is not imposed, shall be regarded as a manufacturer. But in making the assessment of tax a deduction shall be allowed of all sales included in the return of any manufacturer, which shall be shown to have been made by or through any authorized agent of such manufacturer, such agent having included such sales in the return made by him to the assessor or assistant assessor of the district in which he is doing business, and having paid the tax thereon.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to strike out of the paragraph all after the word "manufacturers," in line seven hundred and ninety-two, down to the end of the same, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

Whose annual sales exceed $5,000 shall each pay ten dollars, and if no specific or stamp tax is imposed on their products, shall pay in addition two dollars for each $1,000 of sales in excess of $5,000. And manufacturers' returns shall include all sales made in general for the account of the manufacturer. Every person who shall manufacture by hand or machinery, in whole or in part, any goods, wares, or merchandise, or who shall manufacture or prepare for sale any article or compound on which a specific or stamp tax is not imposed, or who shall put up for sale in packages with his own name or trade-mark thereon any article or compound on which a specific or stamp tax is not imposed, shall be regarded as a manufacturer.

Mr. SPALDING. I move to amend by adding this as a proviso:

Provided, That no person shall be regarded as a manufacturer who simply makes butter and cheese, or either of them, for his own consumption or for market.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I call for a division.

Mr. SPALDING. Too late.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I rose in time.

Mr. SCHENCK. Would it be proper to ask the attention of my colleague to this subject in another part of the bill, section ninety-five?

Mr. SPALDING. I understand that perfectly well.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I withdraw the demand for a division.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask for a division.

Mr. SPALDING. That will not answer. We will take a vote in the House.

Mr. ELIOT. I propose to amend by adding after the provision which was just inserted the following:

But millers whose business is to grind corn or grain in windmills, whose annual profits do not exceed $1,000, shall not be subject to tax.

Mr. SCHENCK. Why?

Mr. ELIOT. Simply because that is an interest I desire to protect. [Laughter.] I wish to say that the object of this amendment is to protect a class of very small operatives who are known as millers, engaged in running windmills in different parts of the country, whose whole profits do not run up to more than four or five hundred dollars a year, and much more frequently not half of that sum. In some cases it is less than $100. They have been subject to a tax of ten dollars, and I suppose would be subject to it under this bill, although I do not apprehend that they come within the range of the class whom it is intended to tax by the committee that reported this bill.

The chairman of the committee asks me why I exempt windmills. I answer that it is to meet this class of cases. If there are others who stand in the same category I think he will agree with me that they ought to be exempted. It is a very small interest, and the revenue would hardly be much enlarged by having this tax levied. Sir, I have on my table a letter from parties who are engaged in this business, who say that in the community where they live there are several mills the millers of which receive less than fifty dollars a year for their services, and out of this they are compelled to pay a tax under the present law of ten dollars. I suppose they will have to pay it under the provisions of this bill. I think it is wrong.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. Allow me to move an amendment by adding mills moving by water raised by hydraulic rams. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCHENCK. As to the relative claim of wind, water, and steam, I suppose anybody who has listened to our debate this evening will well understand that windmills are to have the preference. [Laughter.] It is a little singular that gentlemen want to bring their two, three, or four hundred dollar affairs under every bill which we propose, when we have provided that no manufacturer shall be taxed anything whose annual sales do not exceed $5,000.

Mr. ELIOT. I beg pardon—

Mr. SCHENCK. And I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. ELIOT. If the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means is right, I will yield, but I think he will see—

Mr. SCHENCK. In the first place, if the gentleman will look at the bill as it is reported, he will find that it provides that "manufacturers, not otherwise charged with a special tax, shall each pay ten dollars; and all manufacturers whose annual sales exceed $5,000 (except those otherwise provided for, or those on whose products a specific tax is imposed) shall pay two dollars for each additional $1,000 on the amount of their sales in excess of $5,000. Every person who shall manufacture by hand or machinery, in whole or in part, any goods, wares, or merchandise, and whose annual sales of such products shall exceed $5,000."

Mr. ELIOT. Go on, sir.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will; "or who shall manufacture or prepare for sale any article or compound on which a specific tax is not imposed."

Mr. ELIOT. Exactly; that meets this case.

Mr. SCHENCK. Not at all.

Mr. ELIOT. There is no specific tax imposed on grain.

Mr. SCHENCK. Will the gentleman allow me to finish my sentence?

Mr. ELIOT. Oh, yes.

Mr. SCHENCK. That was the bill as it stood. It was complained, however, that that definition of a manufacturer as being one whose sales exceeded $5,000 did not make it as clear as it would be if the $5,000 clause were put in the beginning of the text, and, therefore, to make it clear beyond all doubt, according to the intention of the committee, I was directed to propose an amendment which is now pending and before you, and I will ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. Now, that is the proposition made by the committee with the amendment of my colleague, [Mr. SPALDING.] What is it? Why, that the manufacturers who are to pay ten dollars are to be only those whose annual sales exceed $5,000. To make it clear beyond all question, the committee agreed to transpose the language in such a way as to express it in that manner, that the ten dollar tax does not apply to anybody unless his annual sales exceed $5,000. Then they go further, and say that in those cases where there is no other provision in regard to the tax, as there is in the case of tobacco, distilled spirits, and so on, there shall be upon sales above a certain amount two tenths of one per cent. That is the whole of it.

Mr. ELIOT. The gentleman from Ohio has taken all of my five minutes.

Mr. SCHENCK. If that is the case I will give the gentleman mine.

Mr. ELIOT. I wish to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that in the amended paragraph the same language is used that is contained in page 124 of the bill, in this respect: that it is provided that—

Every person who shall manufacture by hand or machinery, in whole or in part, any goods, wares, or merchandise, and whose annual sales of such products—

Mr. SCHENCK. That is stricken out.

Mr. ELIOT. This is still in the paragraph:

And whose annual sales of such products shall exceed $5,000, or who shall manufacture or prepare for sale any article or compound on which a specific tax is not imposed, or who shall put up for sale in packages with his own name or trade-mark thereon, any article or compound on which a specific tax is not imposed shall be regarded as a manufacturer.

That language is contained in the gentleman's amendment, and there is no limit in this part of the amendment to the $5,000. The definition of a manufacturer is threefold.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman will find that the manufacturer whose sales amount to more than $5,000 is to pay the tax. He is to pay nothing unless, being a manufacturer, his annual sales exceed $5,000.

Mr. ELIOT. Then I understand the gentleman to mean that the amendment which I offer is not called for because this class of persons would not be subject to tax.

Mr. SCHENCK. They are omitted entirely.

Mr. ELIOT. Then, of course, I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. FERRY. I move to amend the substitute by inserting after the word "dollars" the words "except unmanufactured lumber and breadstuffs." My object is to exempt from taxation "unmanufactured lumber and breadstuffs," in harmony with the legislation so recently passed by both Houses of Congress, and for several weeks the law of the land. I am apprehensive that the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means has overlooked that fact, since the object of the Committee of Ways and Means is stated to be to lessen the burden of taxation upon the poorer classes. I think there will be no objection offered by the committee to my amendment, but that they will accept it as an oversight on their part.

Mr. WELKER. What does the gentleman mean by unmanufactured lumber?

Mr. FERRY. I have employed the same phraseology that was employed when this subject was before Congress when the recent law was under consideration. In other words, I propose to exempt from taxation lumber used as such. The better quality of lumber is, more or less, manufactured and merged into some other article, and so designated as an article of merchandise. That, however, is not included in the proposed amendment. My amendment relates mostly to the lumber used by the poorer classes of our people.

Mr. PAINE. Is not the gentleman willing to include in his amendment fuel, clothing, and lager beer?

A MEMBER. And hoop-poles. [Laughter.]

Mr. FERRY. I am willing to accept any article that will equally tend to lighten the burdens of the masses of the people; but failing to get all I hold to a part rather than lose the whole. The gentleman has cooperated with others in framing the provision in reference to lager beer, and I have no disposition to disturb his adjustment of that article which he names.

Mr. WELKER. Will the gentleman allow me to put in his amendment "grindstones?" There is a large interest of that kind in my district.

Mr. FERRY. The gentleman may move that amendment if he desires. I have no "axes to grind," and will not interfere with the turning of his own grindstones.

Mr. MULLINS. I wish it would be turned, for I have several small axes I want to have ground. [Laughter.]

Mr. FERRY. I am not to be diverted from the object I have in view, that is, the relieving from taxation the prime articles of breadstuffs and lumber as far as possible. Let us give as far as we can the poor man a freehold, free shelter, and free food. And then with a free ballot, a free Government, and free competition with the Powers of the earth, I would be willing to let him and the nation make their own way as they can in the world.

Mr. MAYNARD. Would the gentleman be willing to give him free whisky with his free ballot on the day of election?

Mr. FERRY. I will allow the gentleman to determine that matter when election day comes.

Mr. SCHENCK. This is our old friend from the Northwest. The gentleman proposes, what was adopted in the bill passed in March last, to exempt breadstuffs and unmanufactured lumber.

If I understand the gentleman aright, there is a kind of association up on the northwestern lakes somewhat after the character of the Young Men's Christian Association, or the great sanitary society which existed during the war, which association has nothing at heart so much as the taking care of the poor man, and providing him with shelter from the inclemencies of the season and from the peltings of the pitiless storm. If that be so, I do not know but what we ought to look out for these persons as well as those who are engaged in the business and speculation of manufacturing breadstuffs, who in engaging in that speculation of course have no desire except to fill the belly of the poor man. If that be so, then that is a reason for this exemption.

But if, on the other hand, those men engage in the lumber trade and in the breadstuff trade, in order to make money like other citizens who engage in other trades, then I see no reason why they should not pay a tax upon the capital they employ and the profits they make like other manufacturers. I received a letter from a gentleman in Milwaukee some time ago who is engaged very largely in the manufacture of leather. He said his attention had been attracted by this exemption of the lumber business. And then he went on to say, in substance, this: "It may be that lumber is an article that the poor man purchases. But I do not so understand it, nor do we in this neighborhood so understand it. We generally find those engaged in the lumber business to be men of very considerable means and carrying on a large business. As to the lumber they manufacture affording shelter to the poor man, that shelter is generally obtained by hiring houses from the rich men who build them. So that really those who purchase the lumber are not the poor men who live in the houses, but the rich men who buy or build the houses and afterward rent them at high rates to the poor man. But the manufacturer of leather—an article which must enter into almost all the common pursuits and uses of life, not only in the shoes which every man must wear, but in a thousand other ways—I should feel ashamed if I were not willing to contribute for the support of the Government this small tax that you have imposed upon the article I manufacture—a tax of only two tenths of one per cent. instead of two and a half, three, and five per cent., which we were obliged to pay before last March. But if you let off the lumberman, I ask why, in the name of reason and justice, you should not let off those who deal in leather as I do." And the same might be said of a thousand other branches of industry.

The truth is, Mr. Chairman, this is not a question as to who uses the articles or how it is used; it is a question about the taxation of those who are employing their capital and making profit; and with all due deference to my friend here from the Northwest, [Mr. FERRY,] I do not believe that the man who invests his capital in the lumber trade or the lumber manufacture thinks anything more of the poor man than does he who makes cloth or leather or anything else.

Mr. BLAINE. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. I desire to discuss briefly the amendment which the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means so vigorously opposes. And in the first place, let me say that during the entire war, when we were seeking everything on the earth, and in the skies, and in the waters under the earth, out of which taxation could be wrung, it never entered into the conception of Congress to tax breadstuffs—never. During the most pressing exigencies of the terrible contest in which we were engaged, neither breadstuffs nor lumber ever became the subject of one penny of taxtion. What was the reason of this? Let me tell my friend from Ohio that it was not because of the influence of the rich grain-dealers at Chicago or Toledo or Milwaukee. It was because, if anything be universal, breadstuffs are universal; for they constitute literally "the staff of life." If you impose on them a tax ever so small in amount it will be made a pretext by the very speculators of whom gentlemen talk for adding an appreciable amount to the cost of a barrel of flour. I do beseech this House not to sanction the principle of subjecting such an article to taxation for the sake of the paltry amount that is to be gained from this source.

Mr. WELKER. Does the gentleman expect to secure an exemption for lumber by advocating an exemption for breadstuffs? [Laughter.]

Mr. BLAINE. I am referring to breadstuffs, because it illustrates a principle. I beseech this House not to sanction a tax on breadstuffs which will simply build up a mountain of prejudice for the sake of a mole-hill of revenue.

But, sir, I have said enough on that point. Now, as to the article of lumber, I again remind the House that there has never been a tax upon this article. The gentleman from Ohio may talk of this question as he pleases; but I say that wherever the western frontiersman undertakes to make for himself a home, to till the soil, to carry on the business of life, he needs lumber for his cabin; he needs lumber for his fence; he needs lumber for his wagon or cart; he needs lumber for his plow; he needs lumber for almost every purpose in his daily life.

Mr. PAINE. Does he not need clothing also?

Mr. BLAINE. I ask the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means to tell me why it is that these articles have never been taxed heretofore?

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. Does the gentleman mean to say they have never been taxed?

Mr. BLAINE. I do.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. Were not the manufacturers of wood taxed? Is not lumber wood?

Mr. BLAINE. Not at all; and I am surprised that a gentleman who lives so near Maine as the gentleman from Massachusetts should be so ignorant of what lumber is.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. Will my friend allow me to ask whether the tax was not upon lumber, manufactured or unmanufactured?

Mr. BLAINE. I am not answerable for the singular verbiage incorporated in the act of March, which excepted the manufacture of lumber and breadstuffs. The difference between manufactured and unmanufactured lumber is known to everybody, or ought to be known to everybody who attempts to draw the act. Boards, joists, work that comes from the saw-mill, (for I use the generic phrase.) is lumber. Where it goes through the planing-mill for finer purposes it is not classed as lumber, or if classed at all, as in the reciprocity treaty, it is called manufactured lumber, not unmanufactured lumber. The planing-mill is distinct from the saw-mill.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SCHENCK. What is the amendment?

Mr. BLAINE. I withdraw it.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to add "leather."

Mr. Chairman, we are testing a principle, and I am glad it is presented to the committee to be decided. I repeat that the proposition made by the committee, the intention of the law, is to meet and tax capital employed, and thus reach the profits of that capital, and make such profits contribute a part to the support of the Government. And I claim all attempts at exemption, not on account of the capitalist, but another, and because of the particular things in which he deals and the prejudice to be excited in favor of them, because they are used by the mass of the people of the country, is aside from the true question.

Sir, I probably represent more flour-mills than any twenty of these gentlemen. I have not consulted with the millers of my town, of whom there are vast numbers, for that is our principal business, nor have they indicated their desire to me. Yet if I undertook to say for them, while all other manufacturers of the country are on sales above $5,000, paying nothing below that, paying ten dollars special tax and two tenths of one per cent. as a small contribution toward the support of the Government, that they should be exempted, they would be ashamed of themselves if they did not contribute two tenths of their sales among the rest. It will amount to two cents on the average value of a barrel of flour in my town, about ten dollars, and it will not make a difference of two cents to any man who consumes a barrel of flour. They know it and I know it. We all know it. It will not be an appreciable difference, but when applied to other manufactures it will amount to a great deal to the Government.

The gentleman says wood, lumber; that lumber enters into the needs of every man more than anything else except these breadstuffs, which fill him internally. Look at what the gentleman wears. There is his shirt, there is his hat, there are his shoes, there are his stockings, there are the buttons which fasten the whole together; all these seem to be necessities which we carry around with us, and yet he has never known of these to be exempt. It is wood, lumber which helps to build the house of the poor man. It helps to build the house ordinarily built by the speculator or builder and hired to the poor man at a high rate. The poor man is not a man who deals in lumber.

Now, in regard to breadstuffs it is different. If there is anything which appeals for exemption it is breadstuffs, but representing breadstuffs to the extent I do I make no appeal for them. I repeat, sir, that the millers whom I in large numbers represent would be ashamed not to give two tenths of one per cent. on sales above $5,000 to support the Government. Everything else, however, is to be set aside for this particular article.

It is a part of that system by which when, two years ago, we had up what was called the Morrill bill, one gentleman proposed to except rakes, another hoes, another reapers, and another something else, when in fact the people did not get these things one cent cheaper, but it only went to enhance in some small degree the profits of the makers of agricultural implements, who invested their capital in the business, not with the view of making bread to feed the poor, but because they found that investing it in that business was about the most profitable way they could employ it. So it is with the lumber and with the minerals, and with all these other things. I wish upon general principle to tax the employment of capital fairly and evenly all around, except that when we come to particular articles of luxury we should increase the tax upon them, not for the reason that there is anything wrong in those who manufacture these articles of luxury, but because they are manufacturing articles which, if we do increase the value by a very heavy tax upon them, will only take that much out of the pockets of the consumers, who are a small class, of luxurious habits. That is the only ground upon which I would make a distinction at all. As to drawing a distinction between clothing and shelter, between the boards on a man's fence and the pantaloons on his — [Laughter.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. As far as this question of lumber is concerned, though I believe many members of this House are interested directly or indirectly in its manufacture, yet I doubt whether there are three members in the House who believe there is any reason why it should be exempted. The same reasons apply to various other necessities of life that apply to lumber or breadstuffs, and in this little tax which is proposed to be put upon it I hope there will be no exemption. There are few persons who are more interested than I am in this question. But when the committee proposes to put on a small tax, to say that there is any argument which will apply to lumber that will not apply to other necessities of life is a mistake, and I think every individual who is connected with the business knows it and is willing to acknowledge it. Some individuals may be anxious to please their constituents, but when you examine the question, and apply it, as was said by this committee, there is no reason why this article should be exempt which does not apply to other necessities.

Mr. SCHENCK. Do I understand the gentleman himself to be a large dealer in lumber?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. Yes, sir.

Mr. MULLINS. And here is another one in the same class.

Mr. PILE. Mr. Chairman, I believe there is no city in the United States that manufactures so much flour as St. Louis. I know a large number of manufacturers of flour in that city, and they are as able and as willing to pay the regular tax that is imposed upon other manufacturers as any class of men in the country. I can see no reason for their exemption, and I hope the tax will be imposed upon them.

Mr. FERRY. I rise to oppose the amendment offered by the chairman of the committee. I wish to be understood upon this question. I may be pardoned for saying that I moved this amendment in the first instance in the committee of conference. My phraseology then was not as I have sent it up now to the Chair. I have conformed it to the phraseology adopted on that occasion. My amendment was simply "lumber and breadstuffs," but there were others of the committee who deemed it best that the term "manufactured" should be used, and therefore I have so shaped it now for the purpose of harmonizing with the existing law.

Now, in response to the gentleman who said he was interested in the manufacture of lumber, [Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts,] I do not disguise the fact that I, too, am interested, and I will stand with that gentleman so far as any interest I have in taxing it to the fullest extent is concerned. But I represent a constituency who are largely engaged in this interest, and I still press before the committee this point, that the manufacture of lumber and breadstuffs has never been taxed.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. The gentleman will allow me to call his attention to the bill passed March 2, 1867. Boards, shingles, laths, and other manufactured lumber were expressly put into that bill to exempt them thereafter from tax.

Mr. BLAINE. That was merely to exclude a conclusion, and not because they had ever been taxed before.

Mr. FERRY. I state understandingly in this matter, that during the whole war the manufacture of lumber never was taxed. Sales of lumber by dealers have been taxed, and I am not here to urge an exemption from tax of sales of lumber, for that has been a policy of the Government, but my point is that manufacturers of lumber were never taxed. The argument used for the exemption from taxation of the manufacture of lumber was that those who engaged in the interest entered into wild and unknown sections of the country, invited capital and employed labor there, and contended with the elements of nature, and therefore they ought to be exempted, and they were exempted; upon their lands, logs, mills, and working property, they were taxed enough; but when the lumber is carried to market and then offered for sale by themselves or others as dealers, they have to pay the same tax as is imposed on other dealers in other articles.

The objection raised by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means is, that if we exempt this from taxation it is only putting money into the pockets of the capitalists and builders of houses who compel poor men to pay high rents for them. The gentleman must see that the more tax you impose on the lumber that enters into the construction of houses the more rent must necessarily be imposed on the poor men who occupy those dwellings, and the object of my amendment is so to reduce the price of lumber as to enable the poor man to put up his own shanty or dwelling, or lessen rentals where he is unable to build for himself.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I would ask the gentleman if a tax upon the windows and doors that go into the poor man's dwelling would not raise the price just as much?

Mr. FERRY. I know it would, but I take the ground that lumber was never taxed before; that this is initiating a new system of taxation, and therefore I oppose it. I state frankly that if lumber had ever been taxed in its manufacture, I would not urge here, nor have been before the committee of conference advocating, its exemption; but I say that it has been exempted during the war when we wanted all the taxes we could possibly raise, and I say that for the same reasons now as then this manufacture should be exempt from taxation. It is for that reason I press this question before the committee.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FERRY. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. The gentleman speaks of taxing the manufacture of lumber. I would ask him how the manufactures of lumber are taxed? Under this paragraph the tax is simply confined to sales.

Mr. FERRY. It is a tax on the manufacture of lumber, and not on its sales. When the same parties are manufacturers and dealers they ought not to pay taxes twice, which would be the case if taxed on manufactures as they are now taxed on sales as dealers.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. No, on the amount of sales.

Mr. SCHENCK. Like all other manufacturers.

Mr. FERRY. I understand the difference. They are taxed where the lumber is manufactured, and then when it is carried to lumberyards and sold it is taxed again. My purpose is to interfere with the tax on the manufacture alone. I am opposed to it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask that by unanimous consent debate may be closed on this paragraph.

Mr. BLAINE. Before that is done, I desire to ask the gentleman one question.

Mr. HIGBY. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. POMEROY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 1060) to reduce into one act and to amend the laws relating to internal taxes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at ten o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

Ordered, that Benjamin Tilley have leave to withdraw his petition and papers from the files of the Senate.

Mr. DRAKE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Lieutenant Henry A. Bartlett, of the Marine corps, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the petition of Messrs. Sweeny and Baugh, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also from the same committee to whom was referred the petition of George Sibbald, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 505) to amend an act entitled "An act concerning the registering or recording of ships or vessels," reported it without amendment.

Mr. HOWE, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 722) for the relief of Sally C. Northrop, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the Committee on Claims to whom was referred the petition of Matthias Harris, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Commerce to whom was referred the petition of citizens of Cambridge, Maryland, reported a bill (S. No. 533) to establish Cambridge in the State of Maryland, a port of delivery; which was read and passed to a second reading.

Mr. HOWARD, from the Committee on Claims to whom was referred the memorial of William Pitcher and Axel Hayford, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee to whom was referred the petition of Margaret A. Russell, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by Mr. SUMNER, on the 18th of March, to print extra copies of the President's message and documents relating to the joint occupation of San Juan island reported it without amendment; and the resolution was considered and agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by Mr. SHERMAN on the 9th instant, to print additional copies of the amended bill relating to international coinage, with the reports thereon, and the report of Samuel B. Ruggles, commissioner to the Paris monetary conference, reported it without amendment; and the resolution was considered and agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HARLAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 532) to incorporate the Uniontown and Washington City Railroad Company, in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STEWART asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 534) relating to contested elections in the city of Washington, District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

CORPS BADGES.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate take up joint resolution No. 93, granting permission to officers and soldiers to wear the badge of the corps in which they served during the rebellion. I suppose nobody will oppose it.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. R. No. 93) granting permission to officers and soldiers to wear the badge of the corps in which they served during the rebellion.

It provides that all who served as officers, non-commissioned officers, privates, or other enlisted men in the regular Army, volunteer, or militia forces of the United States during the war of the rebellion, and have been honorably discharged from or still remain in the service shall be entitled to wear, on occasions of ceremony, the distinctive Army badge ordered for or adopted by the Army corps and division, respectively, in which they served.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EZRA CARTER, JR.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move that the Senate take up for consideration Senate bill No. 353.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 353) to authorize the accounting officers of the Treasury to adjust the accounts of Ezra Carter, jr., late collector of customs at Portland, Maine, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It is an authorization to the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department to settle and adjust the accounts of Ezra Carter, jr., late collector of customs at Portland, Maine, in which the vouchers have been destroyed by fire, upon equitable principles, and allow such credits as shall seem just and reasonable from the best evidence the nature of the case will admit; but the sum so to be allowed is not to exceed $895 90, by reason of the loss and destruction of his vouchers.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONTRACTORS FOR IRON-CLAD VESSELS.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move to take up the bill which has been considered by the Senate two or three days, and I suppose will not occupy much time. I allude to Senate bill No. 307.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am very anxious to-day—I have postponed it a long time—to take up Senate bill No. 440, making some amendments to the banking law, which ought to be acted on. It is a bill of general importance, and I trust the Senate will allow it to be taken up. I do not wish to interfere with the passage of the bill of the Senator from Indiana; but this is a matter of high public importance, which ought to be acted upon, and I hope it will be acted on in a short time, so that the bill may be sent to the House of Representatives.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The bill of the Senator from Ohio comes up regularly in the business of the Senate, while this bill has been considered in the morning hour.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I will state that at one o'clock, whatever is pending, I will move that the bill I have alluded to be taken up, so that it may be disposed of, and either be defeated or sent to the House to-day.

Mr. SUMNER. I desire to make a motion which may have some influence on the order of business to-day, a privileged motion which I wish to have entered, to reconsider the vote on the final passage of the bill for the admission of the rebel States last evening.

Mr. CONNESS. That is not in order now.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Can that motion be made while my motion is pending? I do not wish to object to it, however.

Mr. SUMNER. It can be entered now; that is all I ask to do now.

Mr. CONNESS. Entering a motion is making a motion. It cannot be entered unless it is made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion cannot now be made unless than by unanimous consent, as there is another matter pending before the Senate.

Mr. SUMNER. I beg the Chair's pardon. I think a motion to reconsider can be entered.

Mr. CONNESS. I object to that.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I have no objection to entering the motion.

Mr. SUMNER. The entering of a motion to reconsider is always in order.

Mr. CONNESS. Well, Mr. President, I rise to a question of order. I say no motion can be entered unless it is first made. That is my point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts makes a motion to reconsider, and wants that entered on the Journal.

Mr. CONNESS. He had not the floor to make that motion. It was not made in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is true. The Senator from Indiana moves to take up Senate bill 307, for the relief of certain Government contractors. The question is on taking it up for consideration.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 307) for the relief of certain Government contractors, the question pending being on the amendment of Mr. Howe to the amendment of Mr. HENDRICKS.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask that both amendments be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] moves to insert at the end of the bill:

Which shall be full discharge of all claims against the United States on account of the vessels upon which the board made the allowance as their report under the act of March 2, 1867.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] proposes to amend the amendment by substituting for it:

Which payments respectively shall be in full discharge of all claims of the persons to whom such payments shall be made, which have been presented under said act, and of all claims arising out of the matters in connection with which the services and damages so claimed for arose.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I simply wish to say that I hope the amendment to the amendment will not be agreed to. I am satisfied that it would operate unjustly, and that the amendment I propose amply secures the Government.

Mr. HOWE. I offered this amendment to the amendment, and have a word further to say in support of it. The claimants who are named in the bill, it seems, made claims upon different pieces of work. The Navy Department examined the claims as supported by testimony in reference to each piece, and awarded damages on some items and disallowed the claim on others. The amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana proposes in effect to abide by the judgment of the Navy Department in reference to the items where the judgment was favorable to the claim, but to ignore it so far as it bears upon the items where the judgment or the award was unfavorable to the claim. The amendment which I move proposes to abide by the judgment so far as it bears upon the claimants or affects the claimants named in the bill. Manifestly, it seems to me that this is all the claimants each would ask. They presented against the Government a claim consisting of several items. The bill of particulars, so to speak, contains several items. The Navy Department allowed some of the items in the bill and disallowed others. The claimants say that they will accept the award of the items which were allowed, but they ask leave to sue the Government again in the Court of Claims upon the items which were disallowed. It does seem to me that this would be an extraordinary act on the part of the Government. I must insist upon it that these claimants should either waive this award altogether and go into the Court of Claims, which stands wide open to them, and there maintain their suit for the whole amount.

Mr. DRAKE. I suggest to the Senator that the court does not stand wide open to them unless we open the door by legislation.

Mr. HOWE. This claim arises on contract. What is the difficulty of their going in there? I suppose the court was created for that express purpose. But if there needs legislation to enable them to go to the Court of Claims, that legislation can be had; and if they are going there for any part of the claim it seems to me they should go for the whole. I am willing that they shall take this award if they will take it and be content with it; I am willing that they shall go to the Court of Claims if they will go to the Court of Claims for the whole of their account; but I do not think it is fair to ask us to pay a part of their accounts, which the Navy Department has found to be just, and go to the Court of Claims to recover that portion of it which the Navy Department has found to be unjust.

Mr. CRAGIN. Mr. President, I hope that this amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin will not be adopted. The bill now under consideration proceeds upon the idea that this board of examination has reported in favor of certain claimants the amount which the vessels cost them in addition to what they have received, in consequence of the delay and action of the Government; simply that, and no more. There is another bill pending before the Senate, that came from the same committee, authorizing these and other claimants to go to the Court of Claims with their claims. The amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin would apply to that bill; or he could go against that bill wholly and reach his point; but so far as this particular bill is concerned, his amendment, in my judgment, is not pertinent. It is not possible for these claimants to receive any thing more from the Government unless the Government in some way authorizes them to receive it, or puts them in a position to go to the Court of Claims. What is claimed in this bill is simply what is their due arising from the action of the Government. It is true that they claim more. They claim that in justice, in equity, they should be paid by the Government the dollars that they have expended in building these vessels; that they should be paid what the vessels have actually cost them. This bill, however, does not provide for any such thing; it provides for paying them simply what it has cost them by the delay and action of the Government; pure, simple justice and no more. Beyond that, they claim that they ought to be paid more; but they do not ask it in this bill, and they cannot get it unless Congress in some way comes to their relief. When we come to the other bill which proposes to allow them to go to the Court of Claims, the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin would be in order. It is in order now, of course; but it would be pertinent then.

It seems to me that this bill ought to pass just as it is; and then if the Senate think the other bill ought not to pass, let them come to that conclusion or the amendment will be proper there; but to ingraft this amendment upon this bill would be unjust. Take, for instance, the case of Secor & Co. By this bill they are allowed about one hundred and fifteen thousand dollars on three vessels. There are three or four more vessels that they built on which they lost large amounts of money. They ask that they may be allowed to go with the other contractors to the Court of Claims for these other vessels; but as I understand it, this amendment, if adopted, would entirely cut them off from that. Their claim on the other vessels, not included in this report and this bill, is just as equitable as the claim of any other contractors. I hope the amendment to the amendment will not be adopted.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS.]

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

REPRESENTATION OF SOUTHERN STATES.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I now move the reconsideration of the bill passed last evening with regard to the rebel States.

Mr. DRAKE. I want to make an appeal to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator will allow the motion to be put, and then he can make his appeal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon reconsidering the vote by which House bill No. 1058 was passed.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move to lay that motion on the table; and on that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. YATES. I ask the Senator to withdraw his motion, as I wish to make some remarks.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will do so.

Mr. SHERMAN. The only purpose of this motion, as I understand, is to allow the Senator from Illinois [Mr. YATES] to make a speech. I think we cut him off pretty harshly last night, and I am disposed to give him the opportunity to be heard now.

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly; I withdraw the motion with pleasure under those circumstances.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon reconsidering the vote by which the bill (H. R. No. 1058) to admit the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, Alabama, and Florida to representation in Congress, was passed.

Mr. YATES proceeded to address the Senate. [See Appendix.]

Mr. SUMNER. If there is no objection, I will now withdraw the motion for a reconsideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is withdrawn.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up House bill No. 598, to continue the Bureau for the relief of Freedmen and Refugees, and for other purposes.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will allow me to call up the banking bill, which I think will not occupy much time. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] desires to offer an amendment to it. I do not wish to discuss it. It has been up three times. It is a Senate bill, and if it is to be passed at all, it ought to be passed to-day. The Senator from Pennsylvania wishes to strike out one section of the bill, and I am perfectly willing to take the question on that amendment without debate.

Mr. RAMSEY. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. YATES] gave notice last evening that he would move to proceed to the consideration of the bill for the admission of Colorado to-day.

Mr. YATES. I move—

Mr. WILSON. I have the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts has the floor.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator from Illinois has occupied the floor for a considerable time to-day, and I desire now to call up the bill to continue the Bureau for the relief of Freedmen and Refugees, and for other purposes.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is a House bill.

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir; and it is very important that it should be passed. The bureau expires in a few days. This bill ought to have been passed before, but I have yielded again and again to other Senators. I do not believe it will take any time. I should like to have it disposed of to-day, if possible.

Mr. POMEROY. It must be passed before the 1st of July, or else the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau will be obliged to close the office on that day.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not want to antagonize any bill. The bill that I speak of is one in which every Senator is as much interested as myself. It relates to abuses in the banking system which ought to be corrected.

Mr. WILSON. I know that. I agree with the Senator on that subject; but I have moved to take up this bill; it is important to pass it as soon as possible; and I think we can dispose of it in a short time.

Mr. YATES. I thought I had an understanding with the Senator from Massachusetts this morning, that I was to be allowed to call up the Colorado bill, which will probably take but a short time and not lead to much debate. I hope we shall take up that bill.

Mr. WILSON. We can pass the bureau bill in half an hour or so.

Mr. YATES. I will state, also, that I submitted a motion to take up the Colorado bill last evening.

Mr. RAMSEY. And that motion was pending when the Senate adjourned.

Mr. YATES. Besides, it is a bill germane to the bills we have been considering—a bill for the admission of a State. I think it will take but a short time to pass it; there is very little objection to it; and I hope the Senator will allow me to call it up. It cannot take a long time to consider it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts withdraw his motion?

Mr. WILSON. I should be very glad to have a vote taken on the bureau bill to-day.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then stick to it, or I shall insist upon mine.

Mr. YATES. I submitted a motion to take up the Colorado bill last evening.

Mr. WILSON. I do not wish to take up any of the time of the Senate in regard to the order of business. I supposed that the Colorado bill would come up the first thing this morning, and be disposed of in probably an hour, and that this bureau bill would be then taken up. I have been begging and pleading here for a week to have this bill considered. I will now yield to the Senator from Illinois; but I give notice that I shall move to take up this bill to-morrow at one o'clock, and shall antagonize it against any other measure that may be before the Senate.

Mr. YATES. Now, I move to take up Senate bill No. 11.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts withdraws his motion, and the Senator from Illinois moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill mentioned by him, for the admission of Colorado into the Union.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think I had the floor first in prior order to the Senator from Illinois, and I shall ask a vote of the Senate on the question of taking up the Colorado bill, a matter of no moment, no great pressure, so that if that motion does not prevail we may take up a bill which I say to the Senate ought to be acted on one way or the other and sent to the other House, in order to give them time to consider it and act upon it. I hope the Senate will not now take up the Colorado bill, which will lead to another political discussion. It has always been opposed here, and always opposed with great violence. I shall vote for the admission of Colorado whenever it is presented to us; but I am utterly opposed to taking it up to-day, unless we can first have action on some other bills that are more pressing. The Senator from Illinois has occupied the attention of the Senate on another bill from his committee recently, while the Committee on Finance, which is generally supposed to have matters of public importance, has not been able to get the floor now for three months in regard to any vital measure that is before the Senate from that committee. If I recollect aright, the Committee on Finance has not occupied the attention of the Senate since the funding bill was under debate in February or March last, and there are one or two bills vitally important from that committee that ought to be considered. Under the circumstances, I think the Senate ought to refuse to take up the Colorado bill.

Mr. YATES. If I had any idea that this bill would take much time I would not press it; but it is a bill for the admission of a State; in the nature of a privileged question, at all events. I am sorry that the Senator refers to my having occupied time. I think, on this question of the admission of States, he has occupied ten times as much as I have.

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not speak of the Senator occupying time. I said that his committee had occupied time with another bill.

Mr. YATES. I thought you alluded to my speaking to-day.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; I referred to the bill for the organization of the Territory of Wyoming. I said that the Committee on Territories had occupied the attention of the Senate, while the Committee on Finance had not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on taking up the bill mentioned by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope we shall take up the bill proposed by the Senator from Ohio. This bill for the admission of Colorado cannot be disposed of in less than a week after we take it up. Everybody knows that we shall have all these speeches made over again upon it, every one of them; and I think we had better dispose of the business of the country that is pressing upon us. It is entirely out of the question that we can pass the Colorado bill in a day or two.

Mr. YATES. As my friends do not seem to agree with me in this matter, I will yield the floor to the Senator from Massachusetts, who yielded it to me.

Mr. SHERMAN. He has agreed to take up his bill to-morrow.

Mr. WILSON. I gave the floor to the Senator from Illinois, giving notice that I should submit my motion to-morrow, at all events.

Mr. SHERMAN. I believe, then, that the Senator withdraws his motion.

Mr. YATES. If the Senator from Massachusetts desires to take up his bill, I will yield to him; but otherwise I shall antagonize my bill with any other that may be proposed.

Mr. WILSON. I move, then, to take up House bill No. 598.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois withdraw his motion.

Mr. YATES. Yes, sir; and I give notice that I shall renew it to-morrow.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. WILLIAM G. MOORE, his Secretary, announced that the President had this day approved and signed the following bills:

An act (S. No. 339) granting a pension to Sarah Webb, widow of William R. Webb, and her minor children;

An act (S. No. 319) granting a pension to Bridget W. McGrorty, and the minor children of William B. McGrorty; and

An act (S. No. 419) granting a pension to Mary Atkinson.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 601) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1869.

The message further announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 366) to incorporate the National Hotel Company of Washington city, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

Mr. WILSON. I now move to take up House bill No. 598.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 598) to continue the Bureau for the relief of Freedmen and Refugees, and for other purposes.

Mr. WILSON. The bill has heretofore been read through and amended.

The bill was reported to the Senate, as amended, and the amendment made us in Committee of the Whole, was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. It was read the third time.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask for the reading of the bill. I have not a copy of it before me, and I should like to hear it read as it stands amended.

The CHIEF CLERK read the bill, as amended, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the act entitled "An act to establish a Bureau for the relief of Freedmen and Refugees," approved March 3, 1865, and the act entitled "An act to continue in force and to amend 'An act to establish a Bureau for the relief of Freedmen and Refugees, and for other purposes,'" passed on the 16th of July, A. D., 1866, shall continue in force for the term of one year from and after the 16th of July, in the year 1868, excepting so far as the same shall be herein modified. And the Secretary of War is hereby directed to reestablish said bureau where the same has been wholly or in part discontinued: Provided, He shall be satisfied that the personal safety of freedmen shall require it.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War to discontinue the operations of the bureau in any State whenever such State shall be fully restored in its constitutional relations with the Government of the United States, and shall be duly represented in the Congress of the United States, unless upon advising with the Commissioner of the bureau, and upon full consideration of the condition of freedmen's affairs in such State, the Secretary of War shall be of opinion that the further continuance of the bureau shall be necessary: Provided, however, That the educational division of said bureau shall not be affected, or in any way interfered with, until such State shall have made suitable provision for the education of the children of freedmen within said State.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That unexpended balances in the hands of the Commissioner, not required otherwise for the due execution of the law, may be, in the discretion of the Commissioner, applied for the education of freedmen and refugees, subject to the provisions of law applicable thereto.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That officers of the Veteran Reserve corps or of the volunteer service, now on duty in the Freedmen's Bureau as assistant commissioners, agents, medical officers, or in other capacities, who have been or may be mustered out of service, may be retained by the Commissioner, when the same shall be required for the proper execution of the laws, as officers of the bureau, upon such duty and with the same pay, compensation, and all allowances, from the date of their appointment as now provided by law for their respective grades and duties at the dates of their muster-out and discharge; and such officers so retained shall have, respectively, the same authority and jurisdiction as now conferred upon "officers of the bureau" by act of Congress passed on the 16th day of July, in the year 1865.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner is hereby empowered to sell for cash, or by installments with ample security, school buildings and other buildings constructed for refugees and freedmen by the bureau, to the associations, corporate bodies, or trustees who now use them for purposes of education or relief of want, under suitable guarantees that the purposes for which such buildings were constructed shall be observed: Provided, That all funds derived therefrom shall be returned to the bureau appropriation and accounted for to the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I do not intend to discuss this bill at any length. I have heretofore felt it to be my duty to say to the Senate what I thought it proper to submit against the system established by this legislation. The offensive features of that system, its inroads upon our theory of government, its disregard of constitutional provisions, its burdens upon a heavily-taxed people, I have heretofore considered in the presence of the Senate, and I do not now feel myself required to repeat the arguments which I then made against the system.

It is, however, proposed to continue this bureau for another year. I think the continuance of this system for another year will be a disappointment to the people. It was understood that shortly after the close of the war, these freedmen having been made free, the special charge and support of them should be taken from the General Government and from the tax-payers of the nation, and that they would be expected to provide for themselves. The time came around when the original bill establishing the bureau expired and it would have ceased to exist. Then a special law was passed for its continuance for two years. The people to some extent acquiesced in that continuance, hoping, expecting that the bureau would cease to be a burden to them at the time mentioned in the law.

But now, three years after the close of the war, three years after it is claimed that these people became free, it is proposed to continue this bureau for yet another year. For one year these colored people have been regarded by Congress as competent to take charge of the governments of ten States, and, by the policy of Congress, competent, as a balance in the political power of the country, to decide the next presidential election; competent, by the disfranchisement of a large body of the white people, to take the exclusive control of ten States; competent to frame constitutions of government for those States; competent to enact the laws which shall govern the interests of the people of those States in every respect; and yet, after Congress has made that declaration, it is proposed for still another year to continue over them this system of guardianship and special government, which rests for its support upon the proposition that they are not capable of providing for and taking care of themselves. A race that has been made free and elevated to political power, elevated to political control in ten States; a race upon which has been conferred the exclusive power of governing ten States by the disfranchisement of a portion of the white people; a race that it is claimed is competent to decide the next presidential election by holding the balance of political power, is still to be specially provided for by a system of special protection, of special guardianship, and of special support; and this as a burden upon a Treasury already burdened; this as a burden upon the tax-payers of the country who now groan under the loads they have to carry!

My attention was called a day or two since to the character of the convention in South Carolina that has formed a constitution for that State, the character of its colored membership, the power in the convention if I may so express it. There, without any considerable responsibility for the finances of that State, contributing comparatively nothing, they declare in a convention what shall be the burdens upon the white race; they fix the form of government for the white people; they decide what shall be the laws for the white people; and you recognize it. You declare that by a bill passed yesterday, to be the form of government for the people of South Carolina. But yesterday you indorsed the system of government that the colored people of the South have established for those States. You say that the wisdom of the negro race has been quite sufficient, inasmuch as that race controlled the election of delegates to the conventions to decide the political fortunes of one third of this country; and to-day you propose to declare these same people not competent and not capable of taking care of themselves; and to say that the Treasury of this country must maintain in all the States of the South for still another year officers in the States, in the counties, and perhaps in the parishes and townships, unknown to the Constitution, unknown to the former legislation of the country, as special guardians of these people.

It need not be repeated, because the people have ceased to believe it, that the white men are oppressing these colored persons. It has been repeated ad nauseam in the Senate and in the House that murders are of daily occurrence; that outrages upon the negroes are being constantly perpetrated; but the people have ceased to believe this. They know it is not true. They know that in the southern States now, States that are governed to-day by the iron power of military force, there is less of violence and disturbance than in some of the northern States, particularly upon this race; so that that argument ceases to have weight with the people. At last the people of the North have come to understand much of the facts on this subject. The people of the North know that you have placed the white race under the negro race; that the white race is to-day the dependent and subordinate race at the South; and you can no longer use the argument to the people of the North, for they will not believe it, inasmuch as it is not true, and they have come to look upon things as they are—they will not believe that this system is longer necessary for the protection of the colored race. Rather they will believe that some protection is necessary for the white race. It was but last week, I believe, that I read to the Senate an extract from one of the Republican papers published in this city, to the effect that five white men in one particular neighborhood adjoining the city of Selma, Alabama, had been murdered, and not one arrest has been made. No notice had been taken of that outrage, nor was it spoken of. Why, sir, I called the attention of the Senate to a decision of a court-martial in Alabama, by which five or seven white men were banished—banished from the country to a horrible island. These are the outrages that are now attracting the attention of the people at the North.

But, sir, I do not intend to discuss that subject. I merely intended to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that yesterday we passed a bill which rests for its support upon the proposition that the colored race of the South are competent to take charge of the affairs of this Government; that they are competent, not only to govern the States of the South, but to control, as a balance, in the political power of the country, the selection of President and Vice President of the United States; and to-day you propose to put them under a special guardianship; and this at the expense and cost of a heavily taxed people. My own judgment is that it is the interest of both races that each shall look to their own industry and enterprise for their prosperity. If you make the colored people dependent upon the Treasury of the nation, they will never depend upon that effort and enterprise and industry which are indispensable to the elevation of any people. I believe this system is hurtful to the negro, while I know it is oppressive and cruel to the white man. This bureau is to be continued for another year. Of course it will be disavowed, but I think myself that a special work is to be performed by this bureau. It is expected that the bill which passed the Senate yesterday will soon become a law, and that the citizens of the southern States will be restored to representation in Congress, and under it to their vote in November. Then there will be no pretext, as you say, for the continuance of the military force; then you cannot by the appointment of generals, control the election-boards; then by the military you cannot control the elections in the South; and you fear to leave it as a contest between the intelligence and moral force of the white race and the colored race in the elections; and so this bureau is to be continued. In every county and neighborhood, if possible, there is to be a paid agent, who, for the rest of this season and until after the November elections, is to be the special partisan of a political party to see to the elections, organize the forces, and as far as possible control the elections.

My opinion, Mr. President, is that it will be the judgment of the men of the North, who are now thinking very coolly and deliberately upon these matters, that this bureau is to be continued, not for the purpose of taking care of a race that your law has placed in supremacy and in power over the white race, but for the purpose of managing, manipulating, and controlling the elections that are to take place in these States of the South. That is my judgment as to the purpose of the continuance of this bureau. The soldiery being withdrawn, there will not be paid agents to represent a political party in the South any longer unless this bureau be continued. Continue that, and you have your active, paid, energetic agents to represent the interests of a political party in the South; the men who are to continue the loyal leagues, to keep the negroes in organization as against the white race.

Mr. President, if the negro is to have the right of voting in the southern States, it is the true policy that this strife of race shall be discouraged. Instead of pursuing that policy, you propose to continue a bureau there to take special charge of the colored people, to take charge of them in making provision for them, in supporting them, in seeing to their personal conduct, in controlling their contracts, in controlling the execution and enforcement of their contracts, and also in organizing them through the loyal leagues into a political party in your support. This bureau must be continued for that, although it shall cost the people of the North millions of dollars. If they be industrious, why is it that three years after the war has closed a special provision must be made for them?

Mr. President, I have referred to the points to which I felt it to be my duty to allude. This bill, of course, will pass. I do not make any argument against it in the hope that it will be defeated. The time will come, in my judgment, when the people of the North will discontinue such things, and return, and that before very long, to the old-fashioned system of government in this country, of equal, just, fair laws for all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I did not understand precisely what my friend from Indiana meant in what he said about the negroes voting, whether he is in favor of suffrage being extended to the blacks in the southern States or opposed to it. I should like a little explanation on that point.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator from Vermont had no occasion to understand me in any respect on that subject, for I was not discussing that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend is mistaken. He referred to the question, and said if the negroes were to be permitted to vote, then it ought to be so and so; and I did not apprehend whether he was in favor of the proposition that they should be permitted to vote or against it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I referred to the fact rather emphatically that you have disfranchised a very large body of the white people of the South, and by the bill which you passed yesterday, and which it is supposed will become a law, you expect to count the votes of the colored people at the next presidential election. This is a balance of political power that may control the next election; and I undertook to show that it was important for party ends that there should be a paid body organized throughout these States to control that vote, to make it sure.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am still so obtuse as to be unable to ascertain yet whether my friend is in favor of negro suffrage in the South or opposed to it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I suppose the Senator is in no difficulty to understand exactly what I was saying.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; no difficulty in understanding what you were saying, but a great deal of difficulty in understanding what you mean on the question whether negroes ought to be permitted to vote or ought not.

Mr. HENDRICKS. There is no difficulty in understanding what I mean if the Senator understands what I say.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I understand what the Senator says, and that is, he thinks the rebels ought to be permitted to vote. He finds fault with our disfranchising men who added to the guilt of rebellion, perjury in violating their oaths to support the Constitution of the United States; but I fail yet to have him explain to me whether this other class of persons whom he is so desirous of being let alone ought to be intrusted with that franchise with the rebels or without them. Upon that point he seems a little shady.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, in the State of Indiana, as a citizen, I expect to oppose the enfranchisement of the negro. In the State of Indiana we claim the right to control it; and as Ohio has decided, as Kansas has decided, as other States have decided, Indiana, in my judgment, will stand by that position. In the southern States, in my opinion, it should be left to the political community, as organized in those States, to decide the question of suffrage. In my judgment, it is not a question for congressional debate; it is a question for decision in each State, who shall vote and who shall not vote. I was not discussing my own preferences. I was discussing the conduct of the party of which the Senator from Vermont is a distinguished member, in excluding from the ballot-box a large body of white people, enough so as that when you enfranchise the negroes of the South, you give them the political power of those States, and then it becomes necessary to have an organized band of men to control their votes through the loyal leagues and otherwise; and I expressed the opinion that that is the real purpose of this legislation. Does the Senator agree with me upon that point?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am still in confusion, Mr. President. My friend says that he wishes to leave it to these political communities in the South to decide whether the negroes shall vote or not. I wish him to tell me what he means by the political community in the South. Does he mean the men who were engaged in the rebellion? Are they to decide whether their emancipated slaves shall be permitted to vote or not, or does he mean the community to whom the laws of Congress have intrusted the privilege of exercising political power; that is to say, all white men who have not committed perjury against the Government and all black men who are citizens, being over twenty-one years of age? Will he explain that to me?

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator need not ask for my opinion on that subject, for I think every vote I have ever given has illustrated that opinion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Well, what is it?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not believe that Congress has any right to disfranchise any white man in the southern States and to enfranchise any negro for the purpose of giving the political power into the hands of the colored race.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That does not answer the question. My friend is still evasive. I must cross-examine him a little further. Suppose we grant that for the sake of the argument, and agree that the southern communities are to decide; does he mean to have that question decided by the men who were engaged in rebellion and the other white men, excluding the blacks from a voice in that decision, or does he mean to leave it to the whole body of the community?

Mr. HENDRICKS. In my judgment it must be left to the men who are authorized to decide it under the laws and the constitutions of the States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What laws and what constitutions?

Mr. HENDRICKS. The constitutions and laws in force. The Senator knows very well that I hold the doctrine that the constitutions of the States came down through the rebellion, that there was no power in the rebellion to destroy a State government, to destroy a State constitution, that those acts of the southern States were void which were in aid of the rebellion, that the constitutions came down through the rebellion, and that those constitutions define the political community of each State.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is perfectly satisfactory. We now have my friend from Indiana, and of course his party, standing upon this simple platform, which I, for one, am willing the whole country should know; and that is, that the political power in the South still rightfully and constitutionally resides in the very men who engaged in rebellion, and nobody else; that is to say, in the white men of the South, those who were authorized in 1860 to exercise political power, excluding everybody else. He and his party, therefore, wish to turn over these communities that we have wrested out of rebellion into the very hands of the rebels themselves and nobody else, and to leave this black race at their mercy. I am willing to meet him even in Indiana on that question.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I should be very happy to see the Senator from Vermont in Indiana. [Laughter.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will go there about the time of the gubernatorial election. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENDRICKS. At any time that it will be convenient for him to visit that State it will give me pleasure to meet him.

Mr. DRAKE. If the honorable Senator from Indiana will allow me a word, I would be obliged if he would answer a question.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Certainly.

Mr. DRAKE. The Senator from Indiana has several times in the course of his remarks this morning referred to a fact which has been repeatedly referred to in like manner by gentlemen on that side of the Chamber, to wit, as he states it, that we disfranchise enough of the white race there to give the balance of power or predominance to the black race. Will the Senator from Indiana be so kind as to state whether he has ever investigated the question of the number of white men that are disfranchised in the manner that he speaks of? If he has, will he be so kind as to state what is the result of his investigations? If he has investigated it I am free to say that I shall attach a good deal of importance to the result of that investigation so far as he is concerned.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I believe I am too modest to repeat myself as authority in the Senate. On the 30th of January last I had occasion to discuss these questions, and to discuss the particular question to which the Senator now refers; and if the Senator will regard it as not offensive, I would refer him to my remarks upon that occasion in answer to his inquiry.

Mr. DRAKE. Will the Senator, then, allow me one other word before I sit down?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Certainly.

Mr. DRAKE. The constitutional amendment disfranchises nobody in the southern States but those who had before engaging in rebellion taken an oath of allegiance to the United States in order to hold office and afterward engaged in rebellion. Now, sir, I am enabled to state on that point that there resides in the State of Ohio a gentleman of national reputation, the commissioner of statistics of that State, a statistician who is probably without a superior in this country. I refer to Edward D. Mansfield, doubtless well known by reputation, if not personally, to the honorable Senator from Indiana. He has investigated this subject, and I would say, that after his investigation has been made, I presume no better investigation could be made, except by an actual polling of the inhabitants of these southern States; and he estimates that the whole number disfranchised by the constitutional amendment in all the ten rebel States does not, and cannot in the nature of the case, exceed forty thousand.

Now, sir, if the honorable Senator from Indiana has ever investigated that subject, and can arrive at a better conclusion than that, I should like to know it from him; because if that be anything like the fact of the case—and any one can judge of that by just remembering the terms of the amendment and the scope of it over those States—then it takes away the very foundation of fact upon which the remarks of the Senator from Indiana on that subject go, and the remarks made by his political associates. It is impossible, if there are only forty thousand men in the whole ten rebel States that are disfranchised by our action here, that the effect of that disfranchisement, coupled with the enfranchisement of the negro, should be that which the Senator and his political associates describe it to be.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And that is only from holding office by the amendment, not from voting.

Mr. DRAKE. Yes, sir; exactly. There is a point still further, that they are not disfranchised from voting; they are only disfranchised from holding office. These two facts being taken into consideration, that only forty thousand of them are disfranchised for any purpose, and none of them barred from going to the polls in those States and voting, I do not exactly see how the position which the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber are so fond of ringing the changes upon can really be a tenable one before the country, or can amount to anything in the political canvass on which they are now entering.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will ask the Senator from Missouri whether he understands the amendment known as the fourteenth article to have been adopted?

Mr. DRAKE. I have heretofore stated, as my individual opinion, that it is not adopted, and, therefore, that there is at present no disfranchisement, except by our act of Congress, and that extends only to the formation of these governments.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Exactly so, Mr. President. Therefore it is not important to consider what persons will be disfranchised under that amendment. It is only important to consider what persons you have disfranchised in your reconstruction policy by the laws of Congress. By those laws, as I now recollect, you disfranchised not those only who took an oath in accepting an office, but all who at any time heretofore held an office under the Government of the United States or of any State and participated in the rebellion. I think the act of Congress waived in its disfranchisement the condition that the party should have taken the oath which is mentioned under the amendment known as the fourteenth article.

But, Mr. President, I do not believe at all in the estimate to which the Senator from Missouri refers. It is necessarily but a matter of opinion as to the number of persons that are disfranchised. You take the southern States and guess as you can how many persons there are in those States who have ever held an office and who participated in the rebellion. I cannot very well guess, because there are no statistics that enable me to form an opinion; and the person in Ohio to whom the Senator from Missouri refers can have no facts upon which to base an opinion, because there are no statistics that show the number of persons now alive who held office in the southern States and who participated in the rebellion.

Some two weeks ago I had a conversation with a very distinguished gentleman from Alabama, and he expressed the opinion to me that in that State alone the act of Congress disfranchised in this reorganization from twenty-five to thirty thousand persons. He is a citizen of that State, a gentleman prominently connected with public affairs, and a gentleman in whose opinion I have great confidence. He expressed the opinion to me that in that State alone the exclusion of white persons would be twenty-five or thirty thousand.

I have heard the opinion expressed—how far I rely upon it it is not necessary for me to say; not with entire confidence, because it is but an opinion—that in all the southern States the disfranchisement amounted to three hundred thousand persons. But the result of the elections in the southern States has shown, we know the fact, that the one race has the power, and that the other race is stripped of power. It is apparent, plain, palpable; and now, my argument was that it is necessary for political results to control the votes in November of these colored people to maintain the organization which has been brought about through the loyal leagues and otherwise; and to do that it is necessary to have this paid band of partisans which this bureau will continue.

The Senator from Vermont has expressed, to his own satisfaction, what he supposes to be my views. I do not accept of his statement of my views. I choose to state them myself. Mr. President, I have opposed this policy on the part of Congress of regulating suffrage in the States. I do not think that in a northern State, or a southern State either, Congress has the power under the Constitution to say who shall vote for or against a State constitution, and who in the southern States shall vote for or against a candidate for Governor. I think it is expressly given in the Constitution to the State government to define the right of suffrage, and that it was a usurpation on the part of Congress to declare who should be the electors of members of the Legislature in the different States; for I think it is expressly in the Constitution left to the States to decide for themselves.

In the State in which I live my voice has been, and I have no doubt it will continue to be, against the enfranchisement of the colored people. I am in favor, in the State of Indiana, of governing, as we have in times past, through the power, the voice, the judgment, the patriotism of the white race. If in any other State the negro becomes enfranchised by the act properly of the State government, it is satisfactory to me. I have no war to make against Massachusetts because she allows the colored people to vote. It was her judgment. It is her will and pleasure under the Constitution of the United States. She has the right so to decide. I make no war against it. I have no objection that in the State of New York a qualified suffrage is given to the colored man; for it is the business of New York to decide that question for herself. So in Indiana; we will decide it in that State according to the pleasure of the white people. In every State I claim the same is the constitutional rule; that there can be no condition of affairs that gives to Congress the power of declaring who shall be a voter for a member of the most popular branch of the Legislature, for the reason that the Constitution in express words leaves that to the decision of the State government.

Mr. President, I have said more upon this bill than I intended. I will close by repeating that the continuance of this bureau upon the pretexts that are now set up, pretexts that were dissipated in the most emphatic manner by the vote of yesterday, the continuance of this burden upon the people of the country in the present condition of their finances and their business will be a grievous disappointment, and I think it is not justified by any political necessity whatever.

Mr. DRAKE. Mr. President, I think we have got the position of the honorable Senator from Indiana pretty well defined in this matter. I think he has taken a large stride this morning toward making himself a very acceptable candidate of the Democracy for the Presidency. I do not know that they could ask much more of him. He says that we have disfranchised in the rebel States three hundred thousand white men, and enfranchised all the negroes, and thereby we have got the power in those States. Sir, it is a very well-known fact to the Senate and to the country, for which we need not appeal to the Congressional Globe or to the Journals of the Senate, that the Senator from Indiana voted against all the bills that have been passed here which effected this supposed disfranchisement of three hundred thousand men. It is another well-known fact that the supposed three hundred thousand were disfranchised for no other cause than that they had been engaged in the rebellion, and had done all they could to destroy the Government of the United States.

Now, sir, put this and that together, and it is very manifest that the Senator from Indiana voted against all those bills effecting that disfranchisement, with the idea in his mind that if the bills were not passed the control and the power of those States would be in the hands of those very three hundred thousand rebels and their associates in that country who sympathize with them.

That is the first step. He is in direct sympathy with that band of disfranchised rebels to the extent that he would not have them disfranchised because of their rebellion. Why? Because every man of them is a good Democratic voter if he can get to the polls, and the honorable Senator may, before he is a month older, stand in a position where he would like very well to have their votes.

But, sir, there is a very wide difference between the honorable Senator and his associates on that side of the Chamber and the gentlemen on this side; and it consists in this: that while we would disfranchise rebels for crime against their country, that the governments of those ten States may pass into the hands of loyal men, he would disfranchise the hundreds of thousands of loyal men there to put those governments in the hands of rebels, and do it for no reason on earth but that the loyal man's skin is black and the rebel's skin is white.

Very well, Mr. President, if the honorable Senator is satisfied with his position on this subject I am; and all that remains to be said about it is, that whether it be the honorable Senator from Indiana or any other gentleman of his party that is to become the standard-bearer of that party, which would trample under foot the loyal defenders and friends of the country because their skins are black, and put over them the traitors of the country because their skins are white, he will find that the verdict of the nation will not be quite as unanimous in favor of the proposition as he seems now to think it probably will be.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Before the Senator from Missouri takes his seat, if he would allow me, I should like to ask him one question.

Mr. DRAKE. Certainly.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I understand him very distinctly to hold that the colored people of the South ought to have the right of voting. Does he believe the same in regard to the northern States? Ought the colored people to be disfranchised in the State of Indiana, in his judgment?

Mr. DRAKE. Beyond all question, sir; over the whole length and breadth of the land there ought to be a universal enfranchisement of them.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I understand that the Democratic party of this country are opposed to the reconstruction measures adopted yesterday, and we have been told that they intend to effect a reform of them when they get into power, to have them reversed and things put back to the condition that they have been in. Now, I should like information as to how it is proposed to accomplish that end in order that the country may understand the issue properly. Does that party, do the opponents of these measures, purpose to have Congress interfere with suffrage in the States, and, thereby, according to my opinion, go contrary to the Constitution and thereby go contrary to all their declarations in the past? Universal suffrage being established a fixed fact, as it will be in thirty days, how do they propose to effect their reform? Do they mean to become the advocates of the doctrine that the right to regulate suffrage is with Congress, and not with the States, and have Congress pass laws excluding from suffrage the colored people? There is no other way in which it can be effected in the States. Those who have got the suffrage will hold to the suffrage; and if the Democratic party propose to adopt such a measure as I have suggested to carry out their purpose of excluding men from suffrage, they propose to involve this country in more trouble and to bring upon it greater evils than, I was going to say, it has yet passed through. I believe that this whole country will adopt the motto of the leader of the great party of liberty and raise the cry, "Let us now have peace."

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] assumes to speak for the people—to tell the Senate what the northern people think, how they feel, and how they will act. It has come to be the habit of that Senator to remind his associates here of the feelings, sentiments, purposes of the people. In view of the events of the past eight years, of the predictions of the Senator and his associates, and of the results, I think he should be a little more cautious in assuming to speak for the people of the loyal States. In the immediate future, as in the past eight years, the friends of the unity of the Republic and the liberties of all the people will see that their great work goes on till it is completely achieved.

The Senator tells us we have admitted these seven rebel States so that the negroes may determine the result of the coming presidential election. Does not the Senator know that Congress, more than one year ago, presented the terms and conditions of reconstruction to the people of the rebel States? Does he not know that the people of six of those States have complied with those terms and conditions? Are they not here demanding admission? Are we not bound by our plighted faith to promptly admit them to representation and to the rights of local self-government? The purpose of Congress was to reconstruct the country on the basis of loyalty and equality of rights and privileges. We but redeem our pledges and obey the will of the people in welcoming the erring sister States to their practical relations. I bid them welcome to the rights and blessings of the Union. I defy any party to undo what has been done—to turn their representatives out of these Chambers. If the Senator from Indiana can see nothing but partisan purposes in the restoration of these States; if he can see nothing but an effort to control the coming election by the negro vote, I am sorry for his blindness. I assure him that I do not expect to carry all of these reconstructed Commonwealths, and that I do expect to carry at least twenty of the twenty-seven States represented in this Chamber for the great captain selected to lead the nation to the crowning victory for patriotism, liberty, justice, and peace.

Sir, the honorable Senator speaks of the "burden" imposed upon the country by the Freedmen's Bureau. Burden put upon the country by the Freedmen's Bureau! Sir, I state it as my deliberate opinion that the Freedmen's Bureau has not put the burden of one dollar upon the Treasury of the United States. No, sir; not the first dollar. When the war closed there were three and a half million freedmen in the ten rebel States not represented here. They were without lands, without houses, without property. They had toiled for masters; so had their fathers for generations. The fruits of their unrequited toil had been swept away in the fire and smoke of civil war. The slave was free, but the master was reduced to poverty; master and slave distrusted each other; neither fully comprehended the situation; disorganization rested upon the productive interests of the South. Then, when industry was paralyzed, when chaos reigned, the Freedmen's Bureau was organized. It carried aid to the suffering, brought the old masters and the emancipated bondmen into new relations, organized labor, gave protection and security, and established order. The intervention of the bureau added tens of millions of dollars to the wealth of the nation; and God alone can measure the benefits it conferred upon the race passing from the system of slave labor to the system of free labor.

Up to the 1st of January, 1868, the bureau, at an expense to the Treasury of the United States of $3,847,000, had, in two and a half years, so aided in the organization of labor that the nation had exported $300,000,000 of cotton, and raised in taxes on cotton nearly forty million dollars.

For every dollar drawn from the Treasury to support the Freedmen's Bureau, ten dollars at least have been added to the productive industry of the country. More money has been put into the Treasury of the United States from the tax on cotton, through the labors and power of the bureau, than has been drawn from the Treasury in support of the bureau. Financially the Freedmen's Bureau has been a grand success; an element of incalculable value in the productive powers of the nation.

As a measure of humanity, of relief for the dependent, the bureau has achieved a mighty work. Up to the 1st day of January, 1868, eighteen million rations had been issued to freedmen, and five million rations to white persons. Mr. ELIOT, chairman of the House Committee on the Freedmen's Bureau—a gentleman who has given much attention to the subject—states in his report, which I commend to the attention of the Senator from Indiana, that—

"Before the close of the war large numbers of people of all classes had been driven from their homes, and were utterly destitute. Many hung about the camps of our armies, and picked up such scanty means of living as their situation afforded. Commanding officers were obliged to issue rations from the commissariat to save multitudes from starving. And when this bureau was established it assumed the care of all these collections of dependent paupers. At first no other humane course was possible but to continue the issue of rations until order could be restored, and a general return to industrial pursuits could be effected. But stringent orders were issued to 'observe great discrimination in administering relief, so as to include none that are not absolutely necessitous and destitute.' The exact number of persons relieved by military commanders in the first months of confusion subsequent to the cessation of the hostilities cannot be ascertained, but the issues were large. Even as late as August, 1865, the commissary general makes the total 145,120 persons. But in September, when the bureau had become organized, and the condition of applicants was more carefully scrutinized, the number was reduced to 74,951; a very large number of these only receiving half rations. From that date the issues steadily decreased, so that the average number per day for the year ending September 1, 1866, was 29,819, and for the year ending September 1, 1867, the daily average was 11,658 throughout all the southern States. These rations were given only to the sick, the infirm, and orphans, the classes who in all communities must be cared for by some kind of public charity.

In addition, however, to this regular relief furnished through the bureau, Congress authorized, in March, 1867, a general issue of provisions 'to prevent starvation and extreme want in those southern and southwestern States, where a failure of the crops and other causes have occasioned widespread destitution. Under this act corn and meat were distributed to 58,343 persons daily for a period of four months, at a cost of about ten dollars each per month.

"Thus, through the agency of the bureau, the poverty and want of the South were in great measure relieved and much suffering prevented."

To the cause of education the bureau has been of infinite value. Acting in coöperation with societies and humane persons in the loyal States, it has aided in organizing thirty-seven hundred schools, in which are taught two hundred and thirty-eight thousand scholars. It is believed that more than half a million of freedmen have been taught to read. Such results must be gratifying to every generous and patriotic mind. It has the blessings and prayers of humane and Christian men, and, in spite of the prophetic avowals of the Senator from Indiana, it will continue to be dear to the people, who wish to lift up our country by elevating all our people.

This much abused bureau has, at little cost, done more for the administration of justice, for the maintenance of order, for the security of person, liberty, and property, than an army costing tens of millions of dollars. It is estimated that more than one hundred thousand cases have been tried and determined by the agents of the bureau. To this tribunal the freedman has turned for protection, for justice, for security. To this tribunal the employer has resorted to enforce contracts against delinquents, and to find protection against the lawless.

It is proposed, Mr. President, to continue this beneficent instrumentality one year longer. No appropriation will be required for its support. It has been in operation three years, and for its support $10,780,000 have been appropriated. More than six million dollars of this appropriation was on hand on the first of the year. General Howard, the ever faithful head of the bureau, asks Congress to continue for another year this work, that has accomplished so much for charity, for order, for justice, for development. General Howard says:

"After having carefully canvassed the whole field, and considered the liabilities to oppression and want likely to arise from a too early withdrawal of the protecting arm of the General Government from those who have been distinctively loyal, I have come to the settled conclusion that it would be wise to continue this bureau for at least one year longer than I previously recommended; to continue it till matters settle; till the new governments shall be not only established, but in practical operation, and be able and willing to afford the protection and the relief which the United States Government has rendered, and is now rendering, through its instrumentality."

Sir, I close by invoking the favorable action of Congress for this bill continuing the bureau for another year, and by asking for it the considerate judgment of the people who embrace in their affections the whole country and the interests of all, especially of the poor and the weak. Sir, I have faith that the Christian people of the North, who have not forgotten the words of our Divine Master, "Ye have the poor always with ye," will sanction the continuance for another year of an instrumentality that has contributed so much to carry the nation through the trials and dangers that encompassed it in passing from slavery to freedom, from civil war to enduring peace. When I think of the measureless good the Freedmen's Bureau has achieved for our country, for the cause of freedom, justice, and humanity, for moral, intellectual, and material development, I am led to recognize the agency of a Power higher than man's power in its creation. Ages hence its influences for good will be felt, and those who come after us will recognize those influences if we do not. In coming days, when the rebellious South shall be lifted up out of the depths into which slavery and civil strife plunged her, she, too, will acknowledge and bless the instrumentality of the now hated and derided Bureau of Freedmen and Refugees.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. Mr. President, I am not inclined to find fault with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] for the views which he has expressed on this subject, for I think his position is a very natural one. It seems that there is a little conflict at this time among the Democratic magnates. The present Chief Justice, I remember, said soon after the close of the war that the right to reorganize State governments in the rebel States reverted to the loyal people in those States. The Senator who is also, as well as the Chief Justice, now of the prominent gentlemen spoken of as candidates of the Democratic party, takes this view: that the right to reorganize governments in those States reverted to the rebel leaders when the war was put down. It seems they stand at the opposite poles in this matter of reorganization. Now, I apprehend that the efforts of the Senator from Indiana are directed to this point: to prevent a threatened defection of the Democratic party. He is afraid that the whole party are going to drift over to the position occupied by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] and it is only natural and proper that he should attempt to stay the tide which is sweeping his party, as he may think, to destruction.

I do not wish to do the Senator any injustice, but he said a few moments since that the governments of the southern States did not perish during the struggle through which we have passed, that they survived the war. If that is his position he must necessarily take the ground that the governments which were organized in the southern States by Johnson were illegal governments, that they had no legitimate existence; and he stands to-day precisely where his friend from Kentucky [Mr. DAVIS] stood yesterday when he took the position that the Johnson governments were illegal and unauthorized by law or Constitution. If that is his position he ought to have condemned those governments as well as condemn the governments which have been organized under the congressional plan of reconstruction. His position leads him necessarily to the doctrine that governments should have been reorganized in the rebel States by the leading rebels, by the very men who in South Carolina and Georgia and Alabama, and the other States which went into secession, could vote before the war; and they are the men who went into the rebellion, who led the rebellion, who fought in the rebel armies. That, sir, is his position, and he ought to defend it to be logical here to-day.

But he took one other position which I could not comprehend. He said that the purpose of the continuance of this Freedmen's Bureau was to organize or keep in existence the Union leagues among the colored men, so that they might vote properly in the fall elections. Suppose that is the object. I do not presume the gentleman would pretend to say that that work would be any part of the official duties of the agents of this bureau; it would be outside work, extra duty which they would take upon themselves. Now, if the colored gentlemen to whom we have given the right to vote are inclined to vote the Republican ticket, is there any special reason why they should not be organized into Union leagues? Is there anything wrong, politically or morally, in the Democrats of this country organizing into a Democratic party and maintaining that organization, keeping it efficient. If there is no wrong in that, there is no wrong in having the loyal men of the South, black and white, organized into Union leagues or any other leagues in order to support liberty and loyalty at the South; and it matters little who do it. It may be done by the agents of this bureau or by anybody else. They have just as good a right to their political opinions and to exercise their political rights as anybody else.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I did not intend to add another word to what I said on this bill, and I would not say a word now except for some of the remarks of the Senator from New Hampshire, who always expresses himself as he intends, exactly, correctly, and, as I will add, very beautifully. But, sir, he says that I ought to hold that the Johnson governments were illegal.

I have had occasion to express my views upon that subject here somewhat elaborately; and briefly to restate them now, they are about as follows: I do not believe that the people of any State can destroy their State government, because that State government is a part of the Federal Union and organization. The government of the State of Indiana is a portion of the property of the Union, for the reason that in its organization it is a part of the Union. I do not believe that the ordinance of secession of any State could have the legal effect of destroying the State governments. I think the ordinance of secession was simply null and void in a legal point of view. I think that the war did not have the effect to destroy the State governments and separate them from the Union for the reason that the war failed in its purpose. If the war made by the confederacy of the South had been a success, and the government of the South had become established at the close of the war, the question would have been a very different one.

I do not believe that Andrew Johnson possessed any power to establish a State government. I do not understand that he claimed that he had any such power. He claimed that under the Constitution he had the right to aid the people in the southern States in bringing about their practical relations to the Government of the United States. If I understood the doctrine of Mr. Lincoln, as expressed in his proclamations, I occupy about that ground: that the result of the war was to disturb the practical relations of the State governments with the Federal Union, and that all that was to be done at the close of the war was to restore those practical relations. The States were not gone; their organizations were not destroyed; but their practical relations to the Union were disturbed. But those practical relations were to be restored, and that was the purpose of Mr. Lincoln in the proclamations which he drew up; not to make new State governments, but to restore the practical relations of the southern States with the Union. When the people of the South, by voting for delegates and holding conventions, accepted the plan proposed by Mr. Johnson, the act of the people in thus adopting the proposition gave for the first time force and validity to that proposition. I do not believe that President Johnson could make a State constitution—could add to a State constitution or take from a State constitution any more than I do not believe that Congress yesterday had a right to make a State constitution for the State of Alabama against the vote of the people.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the honorable Senator allow me to put him one short question?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I would like to finish what I have to say in reply to the Senator from New Hampshire, and then I will yield the floor.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. Mr. President—

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will yield to the Senator from Michigan if he wishes, of course, or to either Senator; but I prefer to go on.

Mr. HOWARD. I merely wish to put a question to the honorable Senator. Under the doctrine which he now announces to the Senate, how did it happen that Mr. Johnson was clothed with authority to proscribe a large portion of the rebels in the southern States in his North Carolina proclamation by way of defining the right of suffrage? Had he that power under the Constitution, or had he not?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Certainly, I think he has not. I do not think the President has that power any more than Congress has; I do not think either has it. I think the power to regulate the suffrage is given to the people of the States in express terms by the Constitution, and especially in the elections to the most numerous branch of the Legislature, which Congress undertook to regulate by the reconstruction acts. The Senator from New Hampshire, I believe, desired to ask a question. I will hear him before I proceed further.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I rise merely to ask a question in order that the Senator may direct his remarks to the particular question I want answered. He says that President Johnson had a right to aid the people of the South in reorganizing State governments there. Now, I wish to know of him if their meeting in convention and framing a constitution of government established a government there without the people's having adopted that constitution? Was it not necessary that the people of each State should vote upon the constitution and accept or reject it in order to make the action legal? They did act in no one of those States upon their constitutions except in North Carolina, and there they rejected it. Now, I wish to know of him if these governments were legal governments without such action?

Mr. HENDRICKS. In regard to North Carolina I do not understand the facts as stated by the Senator from New Hampshire. That a State constitution ought to be adopted without submission to the people I do not believe. I think that the fundamental law of a State ought to be agreed to by a vote of the people. I think that is the proper policy to be adopted; but that they can, through delegates whom they select, promulgate a constitution there is no doubt. There are States now living under constitutions thus adopted; and I think I recollect that the Senator from Pennsylvania stated that the constitution now in force in the State of Pennsylvania never was voted upon by the people at all, but that it has its force by the declaration of the convention that adopted it.

Mr. President, the Senator from New Hampshire thinks that I did not have the right to criticize the purpose of maintaining the loyal leagues and organization among the people through the instrumentality of the bureau, and he says it is like the organization of the Democratic party. In two respects it is very different. The organization of the Democratic party is a public organization; its action is public; its purposes are proclaimed everywhere; all the people can see all that it does. There are no secret movements in that party; it is a public party, while the loyal leagues, as I understand, though I am not very intimately acquainted with their movements, are secret organizations. In my judgment, although to some extent this may prevail in the parties of the country, it is not defensible. I do not think that the political fortunes of a free country ought ever to be controlled by secret organizations. In respect to that which affects only membership, men may have secret organizations, and I find no fault with them; but inasmuch as the Government, its policy, its system of laws affects me and all the citizens alike, it is right that the consultations of the people in regard to that Government and in regard to its policy should be public. I do not think that a political organization ought to be a secret organization. But, further, if it be right to have political organizations in secret, is it right for Congress to maintain at the popular expense a bureau that there may be agents in each neighborhood to organize these secret political organizations? Conceding that it be right, which I do not concede, to organize the colored people of the South into secret leagues, I deny the right of the Senator from New Hampshire, I deny the right of Congress, out of the public Treasury to defray the expense of an army of political organizers. If political organizations are to be maintained, let the expense be borne by the men that want to maintain them, and not out of the public Treasury.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. Mr. President, I will speak for a moment only to the closing remarks of the Senator from Indiana. He says that these Union leagues are secret associations, and he does not believe in the right of secret associations for political purposes anywhere in any part of the country. Now, sir, I know but very little about these Union leagues; but I believe that they are open to any man who is willing to join them, and if the gentleman is excluded it is because he excludes himself and does not care to vote the ticket which the Union leaguers vote, and that is the only reason why he or anybody else is excluded.

And I presume that the Democratic party is quite as exclusive as this. When the Democratic leaders meet to settle their policy I think they would hardly admit to their secret councils me or any Union Republican. So I think they are quite as secret as these Union leaguers; and if I am not greatly mistaken, their present chief, the President of the United States, is himself a member of one of these leagues.

I agree with the Senator fully in what he says about the acts of secession. I do not suppose that any act of secession can take a State out of the Union; I believe the effort to take the States out by force of arms was an utter failure; but I believe also that the old governments which existed in the rebel States previous to the war ceased actually to have any practical existence. Will the gentleman pretend that the State government of South Carolina which was in existence during the war was a government in this Union? No State government can be a government within the Union without it comes in by the action of Congress. The State government of South Carolina was not in the Union by any action of Congress, but it was in existence in violation of the will of Congress. That government and the leaders of it spurned the flag and spit upon your Constitution and bade defiance to the Government of the Union. The people of South Carolina expelled the courts of the Union, expelled the custom-house officers, and all the authority of the Union from the State; and so in the other States. Now, does the gentleman pretend to say that those State governments, which were the de facto governments in those States, were governments in the Union?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. Certainly.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I say, in the language of Mr. Lincoln, that their practical relations were, for the time being, disturbed. Now, upon the argument of the Senator, I wish to ask him a question. After the ordinance of secession by the State of Virginia, and after war was flagrant and Virginia in the war with all the earnestness that she might command, the Legislature of old Virginia elected two Senators to this body and they were admitted. If secession and war took the State out of the Union, how did those Senators thus elected come to take their seats in this body?

Mr. DRAKE. By the consent of the body.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. Mr. President, I will go back to the point on which I was speaking when the Senator from Indiana interrupted me. He says that neither secession nor war can take a State out of the Union. Very well; but suppose that all the male voting population in South Carolina were to die, where would the government be?

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is rather an exhaustive question. [Laughter.]

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. Very well, I will make it a practical question for the gentleman. Suppose that the whole male voting population of South Carolina go into rebellion and commit treason against this Government; they are politically dead, and are in the same attitude precisely as they would be, so far as the Government is concerned, if they were actually dead. That was their position, and they lost their right to vote by their own action, and not by the action of the Government.

The Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. DOOLITTLE,] the other day went on to say that we had deprived these men of the privilege of voting.

Sir, they deprived themselves of the privilege of voting. He assumed that the pardon of the President rehabilitated them with all their political rights, and he quoted the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States as proof of it. I suppose he understood perfectly well that the Chief Justice of the United States and three of the associate justices in the case referred to took the ground that the pardon of the President did not rehabilitate rebels with the right of suffrage; it only freed them from the penalties due to the violation of the law, the penalties due to treason, and did not rehabilitate them with political rights. If these gentlemen have not the right to vote it is because they deprived themselves of it. Our action has been generous; we have given the right to vote to all the rebels except those who added this violation of oath to their treason, who committed perjury in addition to treason.

Mr. DAVIS addressed the Senate in opposition to the bill. [See Appendix.]

The bill was passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHEON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 929) to provide for an American line of mail and immigrant passenger steamships between New York and one or more European ports.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 929) to provide for an American line of mail and immigrant passenger steamships between New York and one or more European ports was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

The bill (H. R. No. 366) to incorporate the National Hotel Company of Washington city was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

POLITICAL DISABILITIES OF R. R. BUTLER.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move to take up House bill No. 870, to remove political disabilities from Roderick R. Butler, of Tennessee.

Mr. POMEROY. Does the Senator propose to go on with the bill now, or merely to have it taken up that it may be in order for to-morrow?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think it can be passed in a very few minutes.

Mr. POMEROY. Very well.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 870) to remove political disabilities from Roderick R. Butler, of Tennessee, the question being on the amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, to strike out all of the bill after the enacting clause, and also to strike out the preamble, and in lieu of the portion stricken out to insert after the enacting clause of the bill the following words:

That all legal and political disabilities imposed by the United States upon Roderick R. Butler, of Tennessee, in consequence of participation in the recent rebellion, &c., and the same are hereby, removed. And the said Butler, on entering upon the discharge of the duties of any office to which he has been or may be elected or appointed, instead of the oath prescribed by the act of July 2, 1862, shall take and subscribe the following oath: I, Roderick R. Butler, do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion; and that I will faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter, so help me God.

Mr. DAVIS. I move to amend the amendment by inserting after the name of Mr. Butler the words "and all other persons."

Mr. SAULSBURY. I suggest to my friend to use this language: "or any other citizen of the United States."

Mr. DAVIS. I accept that modification. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 5, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Davis, McCreery, Patterson of Tennessee, Saulsbury, and Vickers—5.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Cole, Conness, Cragin, Drake, Edmunds, Fessenden, Frothinghams, Harlan, Howe, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomerooy, Ramsey, Ross, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—28.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Buckalew, Cameron, Chandler, Conkling, Corbett, Dixon, Doolittle, Ferry, Fowler, Grimes, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Johnson, Morton, Norton, Sherman, Sprague, Tip-ton, and Yates—21.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I always try to cultivate feelings of personal kindness, friendship, and charity to every being in the same plane of life. I do not intend to occupy the attention of the Senate to-day; but a voice comes to me from the ages of the past, whispering that we should do those things which look to charity. The high council of the American nation is in session. They are passing upon the acts, past, present, and prospective, of the race to which they belong. The voices are discordant. One voice is for hate and enmity and animosity. Another voice says, "Mingle with your excited feelings the spirit of charity; remember the message which went out from the plains of Bethlehem at midnight, 'Peace on earth, good will to men.'" Senators, representatives of the great thought and feeling of the American heart, you cannot escape the conviction that you are subject to religious influence, religious thought, and religious promptings, and in acting upon bills of this kind bear in mind the injunction, "Do justly, love mercy, walk uprightly."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, during the progress of the impeachment trial, in the morning hour on one occasion I had advanced part of the way through the record of this gentleman as a member of the Legislature of Tennessee under the confederate organization. I was interrupted in my remarks by the expiration of the morning hour, and the bill was subsequently referred back to the Judiciary Committee for the purpose of taking further evidence in the case. The committee did examine Mr. Butler, the gentleman named in the bill, and one of his friends, with regard to his conduct during the war, and particularly with reference to his conduct upon two occasions, on one of which he had made a present of a pair of boots to a man who had killed another, and on another had employed or instigated a particular man to go through the lines into the confederate territory for the purpose of taking the life of another. This evidence was reported to the Senate, and has been printed, and it is all of an exculpatory character. It was taken without cross-examination and without the presence of any person opposed to Mr. Butler. It was, therefore, necessarily ex parte in character, as most of the testimony taken before our committees is. I have read over this evidence, and have compared it with the information which we have in a document published by the House of Representatives when the case was under consideration in that body.

The general conclusion to which my mind has come is that this man was for a period of time a secessionist; that he did render, and did intend to render, aid and comfort to the enemies of the United States; that he changed his intentions, and in the latter months of the war took part on our side, and was concerned in raising a military company, of which he was commanding officer, although he was not in actual service. Now, he is barred an entrance into the lower House of Congress by the iron-clad oath prescribed by the act of July 2, 1862. He cannot be admitted as a member of the House because he cannot take the oath. What surprises me is that in all the documents which are before us, in all the evidence which is produced, he should attempt to deny and to contradict and to overthrow the imputation of his having been identified with the enemies of the United States, a fact of which there is the most abundant proof, so conclusive in its nature that I think no man who peruses the documents with an impartial mind can have any doubt whatever.

My attention was first directed to this case by reason of this circumstance: that a man who went deliberately into the Legislature of Tennessee and took an oath to support the government of the confederate States, who voted to raise and equip a military organization in that State; who made a motion giving the use of the legislative hall to the electoral college who were to count votes for Jefferson Davis; who voted to repudiate the indebtedness of the citizens of that State to northern creditors; who voted to move a bank and its funds from a point where they would be liable to be seized by us or to be diverted to the use of the Federal cause; who voted in favor of resolutions denouncing "the Lincoln despotism," and asserting in the face of the world that Tennessee would never give up the contest against it, and who did many other things the recital of which I shall not now weary the Senate with—that he should appear here, and in both Houses of Congress attempt to make up for himself by parol evidence, by the testimony of witnesses, by the strange, exaggerated statements of men who are politically friendly to him, a first rate loyal character.

I confess that I formed a very unfavorable opinion of him because of this circumstance. I would much rather vote to admit to Congress a man who would frankly acknowledge that he had committed an error and an offense and would appeal to our generosity, to our humanity and forbearance. I would listen to such an appeal as that with some respect, whether I assented to it or not; but upon the face of the record it appeared that this man himself had called witnesses to prove that he had attempted to take human life in violation of the laws of war; that he had employed a man to go through the military lines into the enemy's country and take life independent of any authorized and allowable military operation; and that on another occasion, where life had been taken in an unlawful manner, he made a present (to be sure of only a pair of boots) to the man who had committed the deed.

It is said that there was an extraordinary state of things in Eastern Tennessee; that violence and outrage were the order of the time, and that acts of this kind are to be excused because they were acts of retaliation. Sir, I do not admit this plea. I do not admit that because murders have been committed upon my party, or upon my friends, I am authorized to commit murder in return, or to encourage its commission by others. If retaliation is to be resorted to, it must be done under authority of some officer authorized lawfully to command, and who will proceed upon the stern necessity of the case with strict regard to military rules, and be responsible to his Government and to the world for what he orders to be done.

In this supplementary testimony, taken before the Judiciary Committee, an explanation was given of Mr. Butler's votes in the Legislature, and the explanation was, that whereas certain citizens of Eastern Tennessee had burned bridges for the purpose of aiding the Federal cause, and were for that alleged offense taken to Nashville and confined in prison, it was expedient for Butler to go into the confederate Legislature and vote there like a first-rate confederate against us, and put himself upon the records in the manner I have described. I looked a little into that. As it happened, one man concerned in the destruction of those bridges, a loyal man, according to the parlance of the times, was in Washington city, and I ascertained from him the date of that event. His statement was corroborated by that of others; but it was itself conclusive. He was undoubtedly one of the principal persons engaged in the enterprise. That occurred on the 9th day of November, 1861. This fact disposes of the excuse made for Butler, because the Legislature met early in October, and then he took upon his conscience the oath to support the confederacy, and followed it up from time to time by disloyal votes, staying there openly, in the face of all the people of Tennessee, and of "all the people of the United States," too, as a member of the enemy's law-making power. These bridges were not burned for a month afterward, on the 9th of November, and yet this paltry excuse, that he did all this, that he participated in the proceedings of that Legislature in order to make favor and strengthen himself that he might assist the Union prisoners in Nashville, is presented here for our consideration.

Again, in that supplemental testimony, he states that although he gave a vote upon particular resolutions, (those hostile to peace on any terms,) he afterward, in company with another member, endeavored to change his vote. The natural conclusion to be drawn from the evidence would be, that having given that vote under the pressure of patriotic necessity, as soon as the emergency passed he endeavored to rectify his action and resume his position as a Union man. I have looked at the record of that Legislature. No such motion was made by him at or about that time. He continued to sit in the Legislature down until about the middle of February. It assembled early in October, and continued in session until about the middle of February. These bridges were burned on the 9th of November; and the transaction in regard to the prisoners must have taken place in a month or two afterward. Subsequent to their discharge he continued to serve in the Legislature.

After the fall of Fort Donelson, in a panic, the Legislature adjourned and went to Memphis. What was the state of things then? Our armies were advancing. Triumph was beginning to come to our cause. The state of things were changing in Tennessee. Every loyal heart in that state beat with enthusiasm. But what did Butler do? Withdraw himself from the Legislature? No; he appears upon the record making motions or voting with regard to the adjournment of the Legislature to another place of greater security.

This fugitive Legislature went to Memphis; and what next? He turns up there again as a member of it. He gave votes there on the 18th and 19th days of March. In his testimony he says he did not go to Memphis; he avoided going there until some time in May, when, under a particular state of facts, he just went there and made his obeisance and hurried away as quick as he could. Sir, there was no session, so far as I can discover, in the month of May; but he was there in March, pretty soon after the Legislature transferred its sittings from Nashville to that place; and there his votes were recorded upon the journal, and his name also appears in the roll of the members entitled to pay for faithful attendance.

The State of Tennessee requires an oath of every candidate for Congress similar to that which we require when an applicant for a seat is sworn in. This man went forward and took that oath. He swore that he had not yielded aid and comfort to the enemies of the United States, nor taken any part against us. I am indisposed to admit him into Congress in the face of that fact. If he took that oath truly and justly the House of Representatives can admit him without asking us to assent to the passage of this bill. If he was authorized honorably to take that oath as a candidate under the law of Tennessee he can be admitted into the House of Representatives without question. They can permit him to take it over again, or take an oath substantially the same, and no appeal need be made to us for our assistance to relieve him from any disabilities under existing laws.

Mr. NYE. Will the honorable Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BUCKALEW. Yes, sir.

Mr. NYE. I want the honorable Senator to tell the Senate why he did not object in the case of Mr. PATTERSON, who swears himself that he took the oath of allegiance to that government and swore to execute its laws? I should like to know why the Senator did not make the same objection to letting him in?

Mr. BUCKALEW. I regret that the Senator was not present on a former occasion when I discussed this subject and drew the distinction between the two cases broadly and clearly.

Mr. NYE. One served as a legislator, and the other as a judge and took the oath. I do not see the difference myself.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I am not anxious to put in the Globe a repetition of my former argument upon that very point to show what an essential difference there was in the two cases; and yet in that former case, which appealed to us strongly for indulgence and favor, the House of Representatives refused to pass just such a bill as this when it was sent over to them for their approval. In this case Butler took a political office and acted as a member of the Legislature of Tennessee in all those trying times in the early part of the war when the position of his State was most important. In the case of Senator PATTERSON, he held a judicial office, or rather he continued to hold it.

Mr. NYE. I beg your pardon; he was elected to it.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I say he held it before, and at the instance of the Union men he was reelected and took this oath under duress, accompanying it with a protest at the time.

Mr. NYE. I beg your pardon.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Certainly, it all appears in the record of his case. Now, if the Senator will excuse me, I have heretofore spoken fully on that whole matter, and I do not choose to waste the time of the Senate by going away from the legitimate topics of this debate for the purpose of relieving his mind of difficulty.

Mr. NYE. I want to ask you one more question, and I have done.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I must decline.

Mr. NYE. It is the first time I have ever asked you a question.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I must decline, because I know the Senate is impatient to conclude this subject, and I wish to finish my argument.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania cannot be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Such as I have described it is the case of this applicant. This bill is for his relief from the disabilities imposed upon him by our general legislation; but in my opinion he is entitled to no relief, and the law should not be dispensed with in his favor.

Now, sir, I desire to call attention to another case about which no inquiry is made of me in this debate, and that is the case of a Representative from the State of Kentucky, adjoining Tennessee, upon which we have full information in a printed official document upon our tables, published by order of the House of Representatives. A man named John Young Brown, at a particular period in the war, in the State of Kentucky, when the people of that State took the foolish idea into their heads of maintaining a position of neutrality, made a speech at a public meeting in which he threatened resistance to those, North or South, who should attempt to move Kentucky from the position which it was proposed she should assume. He said that he for one would resist the entrance of Federal troops into that State. It was a declaration of intention, a foolish and improper speech, and doubtless he regrets it as much as other citizens of Kentucky regret their connection with that movement of neutrality, which was temporary and soon died out. It was impossible for the State to hold any such position in the war.

Subsequent to that time John Young Brown, in common with a large part of the people of Kentucky, changed his position entirely, and he was a Union man during the war and has been since. He was elected to the House of Representatives, and appeared there as a claimant for a seat some months since. A report was made to that House, which we had furnished to us, setting forth all these facts. The Committee on Elections reported to the House that that was an unpatriotic speech; that it was calculated to give aid and comfort to the enemies of the United States, pronounced as it was when the war had broken out, or was about breaking out, and when the position of Kentucky was material as between the parties to the struggle. He was rejected by the House. He was sent home. It was urged that he could not take this oath prescribed by the act of July, 1862. He was returned to his constituents, and they are without representation in the Hall of the House. And this took place, without any imputation upon his present political position or political views, so far as regards patriotism, or upon his conduct in the war subsequent to the delivery of his speech.

But here comes a bill from the House to permit his neighbor over the line, in Tennessee, to enter that House in spite of this oath; a man with a record a thousand times worse than his. He never did any act beyond mere speech that can be tortured into unpatriotic conduct, and that was under particular circumstances in Kentucky. No bill for his relief is sent here. No resolution is proposed for our acquiescence to enable him to take the oath under the act of July, 1862. But this man, who sat in the Tennessee Legislature, and whose career was such as I have described it, is to be admitted by our consent and approval in passing the pending bill. Sir, this course of action is odious, unequal, and unjust. Can there be any reason given why different treatment should be extended to these two men who come from adjoining States? If there be any reason in favor of either it is in favor of the candidate for a seat from Kentucky; and yet it is proposed to discriminate in favor of the candidate for admission from Tennessee.

How was it in the late case from Maryland of a claim of membership in the Senate itself—a case where a father had given to his son the sum of $100 when he was going forth from the paternal mansion, as it appeared, to take part in the confederate service. That case was so well balanced, was so dubious in its facts, that the Senate was almost equally divided in regard to it as to whether Mr. Thomas should be admitted to take the oath and to take his seat or not. A small majority of the Senate decided that he should not be permitted to take the oath, and he was turned away from our doors. He was sent back to Maryland rejected, and that State was compelled to select another citizen to represent her in the Senate of the United States. Was any bill proposed for his relief, to remove from him any disability he had incurred under our laws? Was he a man less meritorious than the applicant who is now before us? Was not his offense trifling, slight, insignificant, compared with the offense of taking a seat in a hostile Legislature, and sanctioning by his presence and by his vote the passage of measures to organize his State in hostility to the Union?

Mr. President, I think it will be the part of wisdom, certainly it will be fair, for the Senate to refuse the passage of this bill, and to leave the House of Representatives with regard to the admission of Mr. Butler to stand precisely where it took position in the case of John Young Brown, and precisely where the Senate stood with regard to the admission of a Senator from the State of Maryland. If we pass this bill we will have selected, in my judgment, the worst one of the cases which have arisen during the present session of Congress, in either House, under the oath act of 1862; we will have extended favor and indulgence where we should withhold them.

I have spoken hurriedly and imperfectly; but I have endeavored to present to the Senate the leading and controlling considerations which, in my judgment, should induce us to refuse admission to this man under the bill which has been sent to us by the House. I have refrained from entering into any debate upon the general question of removing in this way the disabilities imposed by general laws. I know that that question will be involved in bills which will come up hereafter, and there will then be opportunity to discuss it.

I shall regret, however, the placing of this case upon the record as a precedent to be used in argument when future cases shall arise. We are entering upon a very troublesome and very doubtful system of legislation. We have general laws which apply to all the inhabitants of the southern States, to men of all parties, of all sorts who were concerned in the rebellion. They all bear that character of uniformity of application which should be borne by all public enactments, except in very peculiar cases.

Now, sir, you are proposing to select out particular individuals, and extend to them favor and exemption. I have no doubt that this scheme of legislation will become extremely odious; that when it comes to be examined by the people of the country, and they see that it cannot be acted upon except with partiality, they will disapprove of it. Besides, we will find ourselves embarrassed in both Houses by these questions of exemption from law. They will be coming up constantly. If our general laws are too strict and rigid, let them be relaxed. If there are classes of men from whom the pressure of our laws should be withdrawn, let us exempt them. If taken in their whole effect those laws are found to be inconvenient and inexpedient, let us repeal them altogether; but let us, in any event, regulate the admission of members into Congress by general laws which shall not be dispensed with in favor of particular applicants while they are left in force to exclude others.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. VICKERS. Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee, is paired off with myself. If he were here he would vote for the bill and I against it.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 23, nays 5; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cattell, Cole, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Drake, Edmunds, Harlan, Howe, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Ross, Stewart, Thayer, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wiley, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Hendricks, McCree, and Wade—5.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Cameron, Chandler, Conkling, Dixon, Doolittle, Ferry, Fessenden, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Henderson, Howard, Johnson, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, Rumsey, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Tipton, and Vickers—26.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. YATES. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 11) to admit the State of Colorado into the Union.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Does the Senator propose to go on with that bill now?

Mr. YATES. No; to leave it as unfinished business.

The question being put, there were, on a division—16 yeas and 9 noes; not a quorum voting.

Mr. CONKLING. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, June 11, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOXTON.

The Clerk commenced the reading of the Journal of yesterday, but before it was concluded,

Mr. CULLOM moved that the further reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

No objection was made.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has now commenced, and the first business in order is the call of committees for reports, commencing with the Committee for the District of Columbia.

NATIONAL HOTEL COMPANY.

Mr. McCULLOUGH, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back, with amendments, House bill No. 366, to incorporate the National Hotel Company of Washington city.

The first amendment reported from the committee was to strike out the word "selling" and to insert after the word "leasing" the words "for the sole purpose of erecting and maintaining a hotel as aforesaid."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment from the committee was to add to the bill the following section:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That each stockholder shall be individually liable for the debts of the corporation to the amount of stock held by each respectively, and Congress hereby reserves the right to amend, alter, or repeal this charter at pleasure.

The amendment was agreed to.

The question was upon ordering the bill, as amended, to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. UPSON. Is this corporation perpetual, or is it limited to any number of years?

Mr. McCULLOUGH. It is not limited; but Congress reserves the right to repeal the charter at pleasure.

Mr. UPSON. The question may come up as to vested rights under the charter.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. McCULLOUGH moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JAMES H. FOSTER.

Mr. BLAINE moved that the Committee on Appropriations be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of James H. Foster, for pay due him for services to the Government, and that the same be referred to the Committee of Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

POST ROUTE IN MISSOURI.

Mr. BENJAMIN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1215) to establish a post route from Rockport to Glasgow, in Missouri; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

R. T. MERRICK.

Mr. MARSHALL. I ask that the Clerk read a paper which I send up to his desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON CITY, May [June] 9, 1868.

MY DEAR SIR: Mr. BUTLER yesterday stated in the course of debate as follows:

"Mr. BUTLER. I will state that I meant to refer to Mr. Merrick, the counsel for the prisoner, and W. W. Warden, the President's short-hand writer. And I want to know of this House if I have the right to refer to these men, when I have got telegram after telegram between these parties?"

The statement is incorrect in so far as it applies to me.

Until the day of Mr. Woolley's arrest I had not met him since the winter of 1863, and to the present time have never communicated with either Mr. Warden or Mr. Woolley by telegram or letter.

I desire, therefore, that the statement made by Mr. BUTLER to the effect that he has "telegram after telegram," or the intimation that he has any telegram whatever passing between either of the gentlemen named and myself, may be corrected.

Very truly, yours,

R. T. MERRICK.

Mr. MARSHALL. I have asked to have this communication read in justice to Mr. Merrick, who felt that injustice had been done him, doubtless through misapprehension. He gave me this communication immediately after the occurrence, but I have had no opportunity to present it before.

NATIONAL ART UNION ASSOCIATION.

Mr. McCULLOUGH, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back, with amendments, House bill No. 864, for the incorporation of the National Art Union Association of the District of Columbia.

The bill was read at length. The first section provides that Albert Bierstadt, Regis Gignoux, and Sanford R. Gifford, artists, of New York; and Charles Knap, Henry Barnard, Frederick B. McGuire, Robert S. Chilton, Francis C. Adams, John W. Magill, and Richard B. Mohun, of Washington, District of Columbia, or any five of them, their associates and successors, shall be created a body corporate and politic, under the name and style of the "National Art Union Association," with full powers as such to have a common seal, to sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, hold real and personal property, and do all acts necessary for the objects of their association.

The second section provides that the objects of this association shall be declared to be the promotion of art, the encouragement of American artists, the establishment of a national gallery of art, and the distribution of works of art, such as paintings, engravings, and chromos, among the people.

The third section provides that the principal office, or place of business of this association, shall be in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, with such branches and agencies elsewhere as the needs of the association may require.

The fourth section provides that the capital stock of this association shall be not less than $50,000 nor more than $100,000, in shares of $100 each. And in all elections by the stockholders each share of stock shall entitle the holder to one vote, either in person or by written proxy.

The fifth section provides that the management of this association shall be vested in a board of five directors, to be elected annually, with power to fill vacancies; and that they shall choose or elect from among themselves a president, and shall have power to appoint and fix the compensation of a secretary, treasurer, and such inferior officers and agents as may, from time to time, be required.

The sixth section provides that the capital stock shall be called in and paid in such installments and at such times as the president and directors for the time being may require; and the neglect or refusal of any stockholder to pay his just proportion of each and every assessment shall make a forfeiture to the association of each share of stock on which one or more assessments shall remain unpaid thirty days after legal demand, and shall further subject the holder to all damages resulting to the association from such refusal or default; provided that no stockholder shall vote at any election or meeting of the association on whose shares any installments or arrearages may be due more than fifteen days previous thereto.

The first amendment reported from the committee was to add to section three the following:

And when any branch or branches may be established in any State it shall be subject to the laws of such State.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment reported from the committee was to add to section six the following:

And Congress hereby reserves the right to amend or repeal this charter at pleasure.

The amendment was agreed to.

The question was upon ordering the bill, as amended, to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. HARDING. I desire to move to strike out the third section of this bill, so as to limit the operations of this company to the District of Columbia. I am opposed to legislating for the country at large, under pretense of making corporations in the city of Washington. I desire to move to strike out the third section, and to insert in lieu thereof a provision that the operations of this company shall be limited to the District of Columbia. Under this bill the company may establish branches in any State of this Union, subject, it is true, to the regulations of the State, but requiring positive legislation for that purpose.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. My colleague [Mr. HARDING] desires, then, to strike out the third section?

Mr. HARDING. Yes, sir.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. And then add a proviso at the end of the bill confining its operation to this District.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Mr. Speaker, in reply to my colleague, I wish to say a word. Companies incorporated by the Legislatures of the various States, such as insurance companies, &c., are always allowed to do business in any part of the United States, subject to the regulations of the States in which they may operate.

Mr. HARDING. I desire to correct my colleague. Companies incorporated by any of the States have no legal right to operate elsewhere than in the State by which they are incorporated.

Mr. INGERSOLL. My colleague is mistaken.

Mr. HARDING. If they operate in other States, it is by permission of those States.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Of course.

Mr. HARDING. This bill proposes to give the company the right to establish branches in other States subject to regulation by those States.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Suppose the regulation of a particular State provides that no foreign company shall do business there at all, can such a company carry on its operations there?

Mr. HARDING. I grant that in such a case the authority given in this bill would be inoperative; but I do not think it proper that we should require a State to forbid by affirmative legislation the operations of any of these companies incorporated by Congress.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Mr. Speaker, I make the assertion that my colleague cannot name a State of the Union which by its law excludes foreign corporations from doing business within its limits under proper regulations. Now, when Congress authorizes a company to do business, why should the company, because organized in this District, be subjected to restrictions which are not imposed upon similar corporations created under State laws? Congress is, of course, the only legislative authority that can create a corporation within this District; and why should not a corporation created by the authority of Congress exercise in the State of Illinois, for instance, the same powers which are exercised there by a company incorporated by the State of Massachusetts or Connecticut?

Mr. McCULLOUGH. Mr. Speaker, I wish to add but one word to what has been said by the chairman of the committee, [Mr. INGERSOLL.] If the objects of this bill are proper, I can see no good reason why the company which it proposes to organize should not have a branch in New York or Philadelphia or Baltimore, or any other city of the Union, in accordance with the laws of the respective States. This is the effect of the amendment which the committee have inserted.

Mr. HARDING. The gentleman will allow me to say that there is nothing to prevent this company from going to Pennsylvania or any other State and obtaining a charter there; but we should not expressly authorize it to operate there, subject only to regulation by the particular State. I hold that our national Government was not constituted for the purpose of creating corporations to operate in the several States.

Mr. McCULLOUGH. I demand the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Has the amendment suggested by my colleague [Mr. HARDING] been received?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Maryland allow that amendment to be offered?

Mr. McCULLOUGH. No, sir; I decline to allow it to be offered. I call for the previous question.

The previous question was not seconded.

Mr. McCULLOUGH. I will consent that the amendment be offered and then renew the demand for the previous question.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I hope we will have no more of these corporation acts reported for the action of the House. I hope this will be recommitted to the committee with instructions to report a general bill.

Mr. McCULLOUGH. Why does not the gentleman report a general bill for the Territories?

Mr. HARDING. I am willing to yield to the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio.

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARDING] is now pending, and the gentleman from Maryland is entitled to the floor.

The amendment was reported as follows:

Strike out the words, "with such branches and agencies elsewhere as the needs of the association may require," and in lieu thereof insert "and the operations of said association shall be confined to said District of Columbia."

Mr. McCULLOUGH. I renew the demand for the previous question.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 41, noes 41; no quorum voting.

The Speaker ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. McCULLOUGH, and Mr. ASHLEY of Ohio.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 58, noes 38.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered to be put.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I move that the bill and amendment be laid on the table.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 60, nays 56, not voting 78; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Delos B. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Boaman, Beatty, Benjamin, Blair, Bromwell, Broomall, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Cornell, Covode, Dawes, Delano, Dodge, Donnelly, Eckley, Eggleston, Ela, Eliot, Ferriss, Fields, Garfield, Gravy, Harding, Chester D. Hubbard, Julian, Kelsey, Ketcham, Laffin, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Morrell, Mullins, Newcomb, O'Neill, Paine, Peters, Pooley, Pomeroy, Price, Raum, Sawyer, Scofield, Spalding, Starkweather, Thaddeus Stevens, Taffe, Taylor, Trowbridge, Van Aernam, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, and Elihu B. Washburne—60.

NAYS—Messrs. Baldwin, Barnes, Beck, Benton, Boyer, Brooks, Buckland, Burr, Calkins, Chanler, Coburn, Cullom, Driggs, Farnsworth, Ferry, Getz, Glossbrenner, Grover, Halsey, Higby, Holman, Hopkins, Hotchkiss, Richard D. Hubbard, Hunter, Ingersoll, Judd, Knott, Koonz, Lincoln, Lynch, Marshall, McClurg, McCullough, Morrissey, Niblack, Nunn, Phelps, Pike, Pile, Randall, Schenck, Aaron F. Stevens, Stewart, Stokes, Taber, Thomas, Lawrence S. Trimble, Upson, Van Auker, Van Trump, William B. Washburn, Welker, William Williams, Windom, and Woodward—56.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Allison, Anderson, Archer, Arnell, Axtell, Bailey, Banks, Barnum, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Butler, Cary, Dixon, Eldridge, Finney, Fox, Golladay, Griswold, Haight, Hawkins, Hill, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Jencks, Johnson, Jones, Kelley, Korr, Kitchen, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Loughridge, Mallory, Marvin, Maynard, McCarthy, McCormick, Moorhead, Mungen, Myers, Nicholson, Orth, Perham, Plants, Poland, Pruyn, Robertson, Robinson, Ross, Selye, Shanks, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Smith, Stone, John Trimble, Twichell, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Henry D. Washburn, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Wood, and Woodbridge—73.

So the bill and amendment were laid on the table.

Mr. COVODE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill and amendment were laid on the table; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. HILL was granted leave of absence for four and Mr. JONES for ten days.

CASE OF REV. JOHN M'MAHON.

Mr. HUNTER. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to yield to me to offer a resolution of inquiry.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will if it gives rise to no debate.

Mr. HUNTER. I offer the following preamble and resolution for reference to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it appears from the Kingston, Canada, West, Daily News and other Canadian daily papers, that Rev. John McMahon, a Catholic priest, and a citizen of the State of Indiana, who was convicted and sentenced to imprisonment in the penitentiary for the period of fifteen years for having exercised his sacerdotal duties toward the Fenian dead and wounded in the Fenian invasion of 1868, has been flogged in the Kingston penitentiary for having in his possession a copy of the Irish American newspaper, published in New York, and because he would not reveal the name of the party whose charity favored him with this glimpse of the outer world; Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs make inquiry as to the facts of the case, and if it be found that such brutal outrage has been inflicted as above stated, that the committee report to this House what steps should be taken in the matter; and the committee further inquire, if such acts of brutality upon American citizens, if not the sentence of penal servitude for a political offense in itself, be not an outrage upon the honor and sovereignty of the United States; and for the above purpose the committee shall have authority to send for persons and papers and report at any time.

The SPEAKER. There is no objection, and the resolution is received.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I should like to have some explanation.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I do not want any explanation, nor does my colleague. He only wants to exhaust the morning hour. [Laughter.]

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope my colleague will preserve his temper. I have a right to ask for explanation, as the resolution is before the House.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I only let the resolution in provided it gave rise to no debate.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. It is not in order to withdraw it; the resolution is before the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] is entitled to the floor to make any motion.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Have I not a right, having yielded the floor only on condition that the resolution should take no time or lead to no debate?

Mr. HUNTER. I call the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I want some information in regard to the matter; but I do not care about arming this committee with power to send for persons and papers, and put the country to expense, without knowing something of the facts.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Illinois states that he yielded to allow the resolution to be offered, upon the condition he states, he can resume the floor to the exclusion of the resolution.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I do so because my colleague objected. Personally I have no objection to the introduction and reference of the resolution if my colleague does not object to it.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I will not allow it to be referred if I can avoid it.

Mr. HUNTER subsequently agreed to strike out that part which relates to sending for persons and papers.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, withdrew his objection.

The resolution was then agreed to.

Mr. HUNTER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ALEXANDRIA CANAL.

Mr. INGERSOLL, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 892) relating to the Alexandria canal, with a substitute therefor.

The substitute was read, as follows:

Whereas by an act of Congress, on the 26th day of May, 1830, the Alexandria Canal Company was incorporated, and authorized and empowered to construct, operate, and maintain a canal from Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, to Alexandria, in the State of Virginia, with an aqueduct across the Potomac river at Georgetown; and whereas by an act of the General Assembly of the State of Virginia, passed on the 16th day of February, 1866, the board of public works was authorized to unite with the corporate authorities of the city of Alexandria in making disposition of the Alexandria canal, in order to repair and make said canal available; and whereas said board of public works did, in pursuance of said authority, so unite with said corporate authorities, and did by their joint vote, and a vote of a majority of the stockholders of said canal company, empower and direct the president and directors of the said canal company to lease the said canal for the period of ninety-nine years; and whereas the said president and directors, in pursuance of said authority, did, on the 16th day of May, 1866, grant, lease, and convey the said canal, its aqueduct, locks, banks, lands, gates, and property of all description to Henry H. Wells, Philip Quigley, and William W. Dungan, the grantees therein named; and whereas afterward, and by an act passed by the General Assembly of the State of Virginia on the 17th day of April, 1867, the said lease was ratified and affirmed, and the lessees were further authorized and empowered to build, operate, and maintain a new aqueduct, and in conjunction therewith a railroad and a road bridge across said piers, and to build, operate, and maintain a railroad from Georgetown to Alexandria; and whereas the said lessees have entered into possession of and repaired the said canal, and have erected a new aqueduct across the said Potomac river upon the said piers connecting the Chesapeake and Ohio canal with the said Alexandria canal; Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the said grant, lease, and conveyance be, and the same is hereby sanctioned, ratified, and confirmed; and the said president and directors of the said canal company are hereby authorized and empowered to execute any and all other leases, agreements, and conveyances that may be necessary to render the said lease valid and effectual. That said aqueduct across the Potomac river from Georgetown to the Virginia shore, and so connecting the said canals, is hereby declared to be a lawful structure in its present position and elevation, anything in any law or laws of the United States or of any State to the contrary notwithstanding.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said lessees, their associates, their heirs, and assigns are hereby authorized and empowered to maintain and operate said aqueduct, and to erect, build, operate, and maintain across the Potomac river from Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, to the Virginia shore, upon and over the stone piers upon which the aqueduct now rests, in conjunction therewith, a bridge of wood, iron, or stone, with one or more ways for the passage of persons, animals, and vehicles, and also with one or more tracks or ways for the passage of engines and cars, with such other conveniences as are usual or necessary for a railroad.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the said lessees, their associates and successors, to lay out, construct, maintain and operate a railroad across said bridge from Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, to the city of Alexandria, in the State of Virginia, and to connect with the Orange and Alexandria railroad, and Alexandria, Loudoun, and Hampshire railroad at Alexandria, or with any other railroad running to said city, or with any railroad running to Georgetown, in the District of Columbia; and it shall be lawful for the said lessees, their associates, their successors, to lay out, build, operate and maintain the said railroad upon the berme bank of said canal, in whole or in part, with power and authority to diverge therefrom when and as often as may be necessary, in order to obtain the best and most direct route between said aqueduct and the city of Alexandria: Provided, however, That said railroad shall not be so laid out, constructed, or operated, as to impede or interfere with the convenient and legitimate use of the said canal or aqueduct as a canal, and for the transportation of persons and property by water.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the said lessees, their associates and successors, to transport passengers, freight, and baggage over said railroad, and to collect fare or tolls for the same; and they may have such other rights and powers, and under such restrictions as at present are provided in the general railroad laws of the State of Virginia: And it is further provided, That in case the Alexandria Canal Company shall elect, as by the terms of said lease they have the right to, to reënter and repossess the said canal, said company shall also have the right at the same time to take possession of the said railroad and bridge, by first paying the lessees and their successors the actual value of the superadded and superimposed works, to be ascertained by referees to be equally chosen by the president and directors of the Alexandria Canal Company, and the lessees and their successors, said referees to choose an umpire, if one should become necessary, in order to agree upon such value; but if the said canal company shall not so elect to reënter and possess said canal and acquire said railroad and bridge, then said bridge and railroad, with all its property, rights, and effects shall be and remain the property of the lessees and their associates, with full power to maintain the same, but they shall repair and be liable for all damages which may at any time be done to the said canal by said railroad, or which may be caused by the use of any of the canal property for the purposes of the railroad; said railroad to be kept on the same footing as postal roads are required to be kept, and the same is hereby declared to be a postal road.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That as soon as the said bridge is so far completed as to be ready, fit, and convenient for the passage of persons, animals, and vehicles, the said lessees, their successors, and their legal representatives may demand, have, and receive, in advance, the following tolls, to wit: for any foot passenger crossing over said bridge, two cents; for any horse, mule, or jack, every ox or other horned cattle, five cents; for every vehicle drawn by one animal, fifteen cents; drawn by two animals, twenty-five cents; drawn by four animals, thirty-five cents; but no extra charge shall be made for the driver of such vehicle; for every hog, sheep, or other live creature, one cent: Provided, however, That it shall be lawful for said lessees to commute these rates to persons requiring yearly passes; which said rates or other lower rates to be by them prescribed from time to time, the said lessees may demand in advance or may sue for, have and receive of and from any person who shall pass over said bridge, or who shall send, ride, or drive any animal or vehicle over the said bridge without first paying said tolls. And any person who shall attempt to injure said bridge, or to pass over the same, or to pass his animals over it without first paying the tolls prescribed herein, or shall attempt to force said bridge, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and be subject to a fine of not less than five dollars nor more than ten dollars for each offense, to be collected in any court having jurisdiction of misdemeanors in the District of Columbia: Provided, however, That a conviction for such misdemeanor shall not in any wise be a bar to any suit brought to recover damages for any injury to said bridge: Provided, however, That said bridge is open and free for the passage of troops and munitions of war by the United States without charge or compensation of any kind.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I now desire to have the original bill read, as I desire to make a point of order upon it.

The SPEAKER. The fifth section is the only one in which the original bill differs from the substitute.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I do not know what the substitute is, as it has not been printed. I desire that the original bill shall be read.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The only difference between the substitute and the original bill is in the fifth section. My colleague demands the reading of the entire original bill just because he has a right to do it, and not because he has any good reason.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The gentleman has no right to say that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURNE] has a right to demand the reading of the original bill.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I know he has, and I have a right to disclose what his motive is.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman might have reported the substitute as an original bill.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Well, sir, I have authority to do that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has, however, reported it otherwise, as a substitute.

The Clerk then proceeded to read the original bill, but before he had concluded the reading the morning hour expired.

The SPEAKER. The bill goes over until the morning hour of Tuesday next.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I ask my colleague to have his substitute printed.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I have no objection to that, if it can be printed before the bill comes up again.

The SPEAKER. The bill will not come up again until Tuesday.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Then it can undoubtedly be printed before that time; and I move that the substitute be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The business before the house is the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 929) to promote American commerce, reported by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ELIOT,] from the Committee on Commerce, on the 27th of May last, and by unanimous consent ordered to be considered yesterday after the morning hour and then postponed until to-day.

MURDERS IN SOUTH CAROLINA.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas information, regarded as reliable, has been received that Solomon Dill, of Camden, South Carolina, late a member of the constitutional convention in said State and a member elect to the Legislature, together with two colored men, citizens of the United States, were brutally murdered on the night of the 6th instant, at the residence of said Dill, for no other reason than their devotion to the Union and the Government; and whereas in pursuance of the same system of organized assassination Mr. W. I. Mixon, school commissioner elect for Barnwell county, South Carolina, was also recently assaulted by armed desperadoes and dangerously, if not mortally, wounded: Therefore,

Resolved, as the sense of this House, that General R. K. Scott, the Governor elect, should at once take the most active measures for the arrest of the said assassins and murderers, and to that end he is requested to offer a reward of $10,000 for their prompt apprehension.

Resolved further, as the sense of this House, that it is the duty of the general commanding of said district to apprehend and place in close custody all well known desperadoes residing in the vicinity where said murders were committed as a measure necessary to aid in revealing the murderers and to check the recurrence of such acts in the future.

Mr. BROOKS. What is it proposed to do with that resolution?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I desire to make a short statement, and then I shall ask a vote on the resolution.

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky. I object to the resolution.

Mr. BROOKS. I hope the gentleman from Kentucky will not object if the gentleman from Ohio will accept an amendment providing that the committee shall also investigate as to the outrages perpetrated on and the murders of Democrats under the government of Tennessee and under the military governments of Alabama and North Carolina.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TRIMBLE] objects to the resolution and it is not before the House.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Then I give notice that I will introduce it on Monday.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is not before the House, the objection of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TRIMBLE] preventing its introduction.

FOREIGN INSURANCE COMPANIES.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House, a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Secretary of State, relative to one of the provisions of a bill now pending before the House, proposing to tax foreign insurance companies three per cent. upon their gross premium receipts; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

RECONSTRUCTION EXPENSES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting estimates by the Paymaster General for deficiencies of appropriations required for reconstruction purposes in the various military districts; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President was communicated to the House by Colonel WILLIAM G. MOORE, his Private Secretary; who also informed the House that the President had approved and signed an act and joint resolutions of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 1083) for the relief of Thomas McLean;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 251) authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish supplies to an exploring expedition;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 284) to provide for the removal of a suit pending in the circuit court of Jefferson county, West Virginia, to the circuit court of the United States; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 287) for the restoration of Captain James F. Armstrong, United States Army, to the active from the retired list.

GREAT AND LITTLE OSAGE INDIANS.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following preamble and resolution for consideration at the present time:

Whereas it is reported that a treaty has recently been concluded with the Great and Little Osage Indians, by which it is proposed to transfer eight million acres of land, located in the State of Kansas, to a railroad corporation; and whereas it is reported that by the provisions of said treaty the people of the United States are excluded from the rights of homestead and preemption settlement; and whereas it is also reported that improper influences have been used to accomplish the framing and signing of said treaty, and that the interests of the Indians and of the people have been grossly and fraudulently neglected; Therefore,

Resolved, That the President is hereby directed to furnish to this House copies of all instructions, records, and correspondence connected with the commission authorized to make the above-named treaty, and copies of all propositions made to said commission from railroad corporations or by individuals; and the President is requested to withhold said treaty from the Senate until a full investigation can be had and report made by the Committee on Indian Affairs of this House.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I object.

STILLWATER AND ST. PAUL RAILROAD.

Mr. DONNELLY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1216) regulating the disposition of the land grant already made for a railroad from Stillwater to St. Paul, Minnesota; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE. I move to reconsider the various votes of reference this morning; and I also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move that the House now proceed to the consideration of business upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I desire to ask my colleague [Mr. FARNSWORTH] for what purpose he desires to proceed to business upon the Speaker's table?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. To dispose of some amendments of the Senate to various bills, some of which have been laying there for two or three weeks.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. By action or reference to committees?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Some by action and some by reference.

The question was then taken upon the motion of Mr. FARNSWORTH, to proceed to the consideration of business upon the Speaker's table; and upon a division there were—ayes 50, noes 35; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. FARNSWORTH and Mr. BURR were appointed.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I desire to inquire of the Chair if the reconstruction bill has come back from the Senate?

The SPEAKER. It has not. The Chair is informed that the bill is now being discussed in the Senate upon a motion to reconsider.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. Then I hope we will not go to business upon the Speaker's table until that bill comes back.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes thirty-seven.

Before the noes were counted,

Mr. FARNSWORTH said: I withdraw the motion to proceed to the consideration of business upon the Speaker's table.

GREAT AND LITTLE OSAGE INDIANS.

The SPEAKER laid before House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:
In reply to the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 1st instant, I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of the Interior in reference to the treaty now being negotiated between the Great and Little Osage Indians and the special Indian commissioners acting on the part of the United States.
ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 10, 1868.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I move that the message of the President, with the accompanying documents, be printed and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, with instructions to investigate the circumstances attending the negotiation of the treaty therein referred to, and with power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. CULLOM. Is that motion in order?

The SPEAKER. It is; but the Chair will first take the question on the first part of the motion, that the message and accompanying papers be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed. If there be no objection, that will be considered as agreed to.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the motion that the Committee on Indian Affairs be instructed to investigate the facts referred to in the documents, with authority to send for persons and papers.

Mr. CHANLER. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas has the right to make the motion, as it grows out of the question now before the House.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas, moved to reconsider the votes just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PROMOTION OF AMERICAN COMMERCE.

THE SPEAKER. The first business in order after the morning hour is the bill (H. R. No. 929) to promote American commerce, on which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] is entitled to the floor.

MR. ELIOT. Mr. Speaker, gentlemen on both sides of the House are desirous that this bill should be postponed for a few days, in order that the tax bill may be proceeded with. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] gave notice yesterday that when this bill from the Committee on Commerce should come before the House he would ask its postponement. I am very anxious that when it shall come up for discussion, it shall have the attention of the House, so that some final decision may be reached. I therefore, at the request of several gentlemen, move that the bill (H. R. No. 929) to promote American commerce, and the emigrant bill which is to be considered in connection with it, be postponed until next Wednesday, after the morning hour, with the same priority that those bills now have; and I will say frankly that if the tax bill shall then be under discussion I shall probably ask that this subject may be still further postponed.

THE SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] will be regarded as agreed to.

There was no objection.

DISPENSING WITH EVENING SESSION.

MR. SCHENCK. I rise for the purpose of moving that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole upon the tax bill.

MR. GARFIELD. I hope my colleague will give way for a motion the object of which I will state. In view of the fact that the House has now been occupied for a number of nights in succession, I desire to move that the session of to-day be continued till half past five o'clock, and that then we adjourn, thus dispensing with the evening session. I think this proposition will be generally acceptable.

MR. CULLOM. I object to it.

MR. GARFIELD. I would like my colleague [Mr. SCHENCK] to say whether he will not consent to the proposition I have made.

MR. SCHENCK. I have been applied to by a great many gentlemen, who complain that to work every night in the week is too much. We have met now three nights in succession, and I would assent to my colleague's proposition if the House would certainly keep a quorum here till half past five o'clock. If that arrangement cannot be made I shall object.

MR. GARFIELD. I have no doubt the House will agree to that.

THE SPEAKER. The Chair will state that a majority of the House can rescind the order for an evening session; but it requires unanimous consent to order that the House or the Committee of the Whole shall remain in session till a particular order, thus precluding a motion that the House adjourn or the committee rise.

MR. SCHENCK. I am aware of that, and hence I ask that there shall be unanimous consent to the arrangement.

MR. MULLINS. I shall not consent. Let us go on as we have done.

MR. SCHENCK. I do not mean to ask that the standing order shall be rescinded except for to-day, so that gentlemen may have one evening's rest.

MR. GARFIELD. My proposition had reference only to to-day.

MR. TROWBRIDGE. I think the gentleman could more readily obtain assent to a proposition for meeting at an earlier hour.

MR. SCHENCK. If I do not get unanimous consent I cannot yield to the suggestion.

MR. MULLINS. I object. I am opposed to making arrangements one day and disarranging them the next.

INTERNAL TAX BILL.

MR. SCHENCK. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the tax bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. (Mr. POMEROY in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 1060) to reduce into one act and to amend the laws relating to internal taxes.

THE CHAIRMAN. The pending paragraph was as follows:

Manufacturers, not otherwise charged with a special tax, shall each pay ten dollars; and all manufacturers whose annual sales exceed $5,000 (except those otherwise provided for, or those on whose products a specific tax is imposed) shall pay two dollars for each additional $1,000 on the amount of their sales in excess of $5,000. Every person who shall manufacture by hand or machinery, in whole or in part, any goods, wares, or merchandise, and whose annual sales of such products shall exceed $5,000, or who shall manufacture or prepare for sale any article or compound on which a specific tax is not imposed, or who shall put up for sale in packages, with his own name or trade-mark thereon, any article or compound on which a specific tax is not imposed, shall be regarded as a manufacturer. But in making the assessment of tax a deduction shall be allowed of all sales included in the return of any manufacturer which shall be shown to have been made by or through any authorized agent of such manufacturer, such agent having included such sales in the return made by him to the assessor or assistant assessor of the district in which he is doing business, and having paid the tax thereon.

The pending amendment, offered by Mr. SCHENCK, was as follows:

Strike out the paragraph, and in lieu thereof insert as follows:

Whose annual sales exceed $5,000 shall each pay ten dollars, and if no specific or stamp tax is imposed on their products shall pay, in addition, two dollars for each $1,000 of sales in excess of $5,000. And manufacturers' returns shall include all sales made in general for the account of the manufacturer. Every person who shall manufacture by hand or machinery, in whole or in part, any goods, wares, or merchandise, or who shall manufacture or prepare for sale any article or compound on which a specific or stamp tax is not imposed, or who shall put up for sale in packages with his own name or trade-mark thereon, any article or compound on which a specific or stamp tax is not imposed, shall be regarded as a manufacturer: Provided, That no person shall be regarded as a manufacturer who simply makes butter and cheese, or either of them, for his own consumption or for market.

The pending amendment to the amendment, submitted by Mr. FERRY, was to insert "except unmanufactured lumber and breadstuffs."

MR. SCHENCK. Mr. Chairman, gentlemen should know how this question now stands. It is thus: the Committee of Ways and Means have proposed a modification of this whole paragraph, so as to make it clear that all manufacturers who sell less than $5,000 a year are released from any tax on sales or any tax whatever. To this an amendment has been offered excepting breadstuffs and lumber.

THE CHAIRMAN. No further amendment is now in order.

The committee divided on Mr. FERRY's amendment; and there were—ayes 28, noes 40; no quorum voting.

THE CHAIRMAN ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. FERRY and Mr. NIBLECK.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 43, noes 48.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

MR. CULLOM. I move to amend the amendment by inserting "except the manufacture of sugar from beets."

MR. CHAIRMAN. I trust the Committee of Ways and Means will accept that amendment. This is an interest which has just been started in the United States. There are only two or three establishments now manufacturing sugar from beets, and, so far as I know, up to this time none of them have made anything, although their sales may be over $5,000 per annum.

MR. SCHENCK. Our idea is to equalize the burdens of taxation, and we have relieved everybody whose sales do not exceed $5,000 a year. If these are small concerns struggling into existence, then they have not reached that amount of sales, and are not taxed at all.

MR. CULLOM. Their sales do exceed $5,000.

MR. SCHENCK. Then they ought to be taxed.

MR. CULLOM. Although their sales may amount to over $5,000 per annum, yet the truth is they have not made one cent. I think it is an interest which ought to be encouraged by the people of the United States.

MR. MAYNARD. I wish to ask the committee, before adopting this amendment, to strike out the words "from beets." If the amendment is to be adopted at all it ought not to be limited to the production of sugar from that specific article. Now, the general sugar interest was much impaired by the war.

MR. PAINE. What is the amendment?

MR. MAYNARD. If the manufacture of sugar be exempted then the entire sugar manufacturing interest of the country should be exempted. It was impaired and almost destroyed by the war. It is desirable to resuscitate this great commercial interest of the country. And if I may be allowed a single moment here by way of digression, to show the great advantage to the country of protecting its own industry over not protecting it, I will cite the instance of two articles, sugar and salt. The southern confederacy, as long as the sugar interest was protected by legislation, continued to have an abundance of that article—more than they wanted. But in regard to salt, which never had been protected, although it might have been produced there, it was, in point of fact, not produced, and the people were driven almost to the point where they fished for the want of it. There could be no instance illustrating more fully the general policy of protecting our own interests by legislation than the experience respecting those two articles in the southern confederacy. If the manufacture of sugar is excepted at all, I hope it will embrace generally the sugar manufacture.

MR. SCHENCK. This bill lets off, as we did on the 1st of March last, all sugar from a tax of one cent a pound, which is more than one fifth of one per cent.

MR. CULLOM. I do not think it is fair to include the manufacture of sugar from cane, or those substances which have been recognized as elements for making sugar time out of mind. The manufacture of sugar from beets is an experiment which has never been fairly tested in this country. If it were not for the fact that this business is struggling into existence, and it is yet to be tested whether it will prove successful, I would not ask this exception at all. But not having yet been tested, I think we ought to relieve it from this special tax.

The amendment of Mr. CULLOM was disagreed to.

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. SCHENCK, as amended by the adoption of the amendment of Mr. SPALDING.

MR. TROWBRIDGE. I move to amend the amendment by adding at the close of the paragraph the following:

Provided, That manufacturers who have paid a tax as dealers, shall be permitted to sell their products without additional tax.

I do not know but this is provided for.

MR. SCHENCK. It is all provided for.

MR. TROWBRIDGE. I made the amendment in order to make the inquiry. I now withdraw it.

MR. FLANDERS. I move to amend by inserting in line seven hundred and seventy-seven, after the word "dollars," the following:

Provided, That the value of the lumber shall be estimated at the mill where it is manufactured.

I offer this for the purpose of inquiring of the chairman of the committee if lumber manufactured at Puget sound, for instance, and sold in San Francisco, after having paid a freight of eight dollars per thousand feet, is to be taxed at San Francisco. Many of the manufacturers of lumber at Puget sound reside in San Francisco, and sell their lumber there after paying the freight. Now, will they have to pay the tax on the additional freight, or will it be assessed at the place where the lumber is manufactured?

Mr. SCHENCK. We have endeavored to make this perfectly equal. It is a tax on the sales made of his own production by the manufacturer, provided the sales in any year amount to more than $5,000. He himself chooses where that tax shall be assessed. Wherever he chooses to sell, wherever he puts his wares on the market, there he pays the tax.

Mr. FLANDERS. There are something like one hundred million feet of lumber manufactured at Puget sound which is sold at San Francisco. The owners of the mills have their offices in San Francisco, and ship the lumber in their own vessels, and it costs them on the average about eight dollars per thousand feet for freight. Now, it will be observed that on the lumber thus shipped they will not only pay a tax on the manufacture, but a tax on the freight that they pay. I think, therefore, that to make it perfectly clear and fair my amendment ought to prevail.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not know that this needs further explanation; it must be obvious. I admit that if a man makes lumber far up on the Pacific coast, on the edge of our great country, and sells it there, he will get a less price and will pay a less tax. But if he chooses to carry the lumber to another market and sell it there, he will get a higher price, and of course will pay a higher tax. It is true that a part of that higher price is made up of the cost of transportation. So it is in regard to the price of anything. The manufacturer chooses his market, and in choosing his market he adds to the cost of his article somewhat, but he does it in the hope of getting in greater proportion a price for it. A manufacturer chooses his own market.

Mr. FLANDERS. I do not think the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means should press this additional tax. There is no consistency or propriety in charging the manufacturer, in addition to the cost of his lumber at the point where he manufactures it, a tax on the freight he pays to get it to the place where he sells it.

The question was taken on Mr. FLANDERS's amendment; and it was disagreed to.

Mr. BLAINE. I am under the impression that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FERRY] was lost on account of lumber being in it. I am going to test the sense of the committee, without debate, on taxing breadstuffs. I do not want the United States to be the only country in the world that taxes bread. I move, therefore, to add to the amendment the following proviso:

Provided, That breadstuffs shall not be taxed as manufactures.

The question was taken; and the amendment was disagreed to—ayes thirty-three, noes not counted.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move to amend the amendment by adding to it the words "within the United States." I ask the attention of the committee to this amendment. It will be recollected that the amendment offered by my colleague on the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. SCHENCK] was amended by a proviso exempting the manufacture of butter and cheese for the benefit of the manufacturer or for the market. I propose to add after the word "market" the words "within the United States." I do it for the reason that there is a large manufacture of cheese that is expressly for the foreign market, and which, of course, ought not to be exempt from taxation.

Mr. SCHENCK. There is no objection to that.

The amendment to the amendment offered by Mr. MAYNARD was agreed to.

The question recurred on the amendment reported by Mr. SCHENCK from the Committee of Ways and Means, as amended; and being put, the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the next section, as follows:

SEC. 88. And be it further enacted, That in all cases where more than one of the pursuits, employments, or occupations hereinafter described, shall be engaged in or prosecuted by the same person at the same time, except as hereinafter provided, the tax shall be paid in each according to the rates severally prescribed; and that any number of persons doing business in copartnership at any one place shall be required to pay but one special tax for such copartnership, except lawyers, conveyancers, claim and patent agents, physicians, surgeons, dentists, cattle-brokers, dealers in horses, peddlers, foreign commercial brokers, custom-house brokers, pawnbrokers, patent-right dealers, dealers in lottery tickets, and cigar-makers, who shall each be separately taxed; and that any auctioneer may sell by auction any goods or commodities for or on behalf of any person who has paid the special tax as a wholesale or retail dealer on the premises of such person; and any auctioneer who shall sell goods or commodities otherwise than by auction shall pay a special tax as a retail or wholesale dealer, as the case may be.

Mr. CAKE. I move to amend that section by inserting after the word "prescribed," in line six, the words, "provided that where the roasting of coffee is combined with the manufacture of bread no additional tax shall be paid." I have no remarks to make. I submit the amendment for a vote of the committee.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. There is no tax assessed anywhere here on the roasting of coffee that I am aware of. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. CAKE. I do not believe myself that a tax is assessed on roasting coffee, but in order to make it plain I offer the amendment, which can do no harm.

The question was taken on the amendment; and it was disagreed to.

Mr. CHURCHILL. I move to amend this section by striking out the words "and cigar-makers," and inserting the word "and" before the words "dealers in lottery tickets."

Mr. SCHENCK. That is in accordance with the action of the Committee of the Whole last night. I have no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

No further amendment was offered.

The next section was read, as follows:

SEC. 89. And be it further enacted, That the receipt for the payment of any special tax shall specify the trade, business, or profession for which such tax is paid, the name, residence, and place of business of the person paying the same, and the time for which payment is made; except that no statement of a special place of business shall be required of or included in the receipt given to any auctioneer, peddler, patent-right dealer, commercial, produce, cattle or insurance broker, insurance agent, horse dealer, photographer, juggler, or proprietor or manager of a show or amusement, who proposes to pursue his business from place to place. The payment of the special tax herein imposed shall not exempt from an additional special tax any person who shall have, or provide himself with an office, warehouse, or other establishment for doing business in any other place than that stated in his receipt. But nothing herein contained shall require a special tax for storing goods, wares, or merchandise elsewhere than at the place of business.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend this section in the first sentence by striking out the words "cattle or insurance broker," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "or cattle broker."

The amendment was agreed to.

No further amendment was offered.

The next section was read, as follows:

SEC. 90. And be it further enacted, That every person engaged in or prosecuting any trade, business, or profession, or doing any act for which a special tax is imposed, shall, on demand of any officer of internal revenue, exhibit the receipt for payment of such tax, and unless he shall do so may be deemed not to have paid the same. And in case any person not required to have a special place of business, but who pursues his business from place to place, shall fail or refuse to exhibit the proper receipt when so demanded, said officer may seize any property in the possession of such person, and which is in any way used in his business, and report such seizure to the assessor of the district in which such seizure is made; and the said assessor shall give ten days' notice by publication in any newspaper in the district, or by personal service, or by copy left at the residence of the person so offending, requiring him to show cause why such property so seized shall not be forfeited; and in case no sufficient cause be shown the assessor shall declare such property forfeited, and shall issue an order to the collector of the district for the sale thereof, and the proceeds of such sale, after deducting and paying therefrom the expenses of the proceedings, shall be paid to the collector of the district for the use of the United States.

No amendment was offered.

The next section was read, as follows:

SEC. 91. And be it further enacted, That any person who shall engage in or prosecute any trade, business, or profession, or do any act hereinafter mentioned, for which a special tax is imposed by law, without the payment of said tax, as in that behalf required, shall, for every such offense, beside being liable for the payment of the tax, be subject to a penalty of not less than fifty dollars nor more than $1,000. And if such person so offending shall be a manufacturer of tobacco, snuff, or cigars, distiller, rectifier, wholesale liquor dealer, compounder of liquors, manufacturer of stills, or brewer, he shall also, on conviction thereof, be fined not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, and be imprisoned not less than three months nor more than two years.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend the first sentence of this section by striking out the word "hereinafter mentioned."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move further to amend this section by striking out of the second sentence the words "snuff or cigars, distiller, rectifier, wholesale liquor dealer, compounder of liquors, manufacturer of stills, or" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "or cigars, or a," so that that sentence will read:

And if such person so offending shall be a manufacturer of tobacco or cigars, or a brewer, he shall also, on conviction thereof, be fined not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, and be imprisoned not less than three months nor more than two years.

The amendment was agreed to.

No further amendment was offered.

The next section was read, as follows:

SEC. 92. And be it further enacted, That upon the death of any person during the year for which he has paid the special tax on his trade, business, or profession, it shall be lawful for the executors or administrators, or the legal representatives of such deceased person, to engage in or prosecute in like manner, for the residue of the term for which the tax shall have been paid, such trade, business, or profession without payment of any additional tax. And any person may remove to any other place to carry on the trade, business, or profession specified in the tax receipt without payment of any additional tax; and any change in the persons constituting a firm or company which has paid said special tax shall not be considered as rendering said firm or company liable for the additional tax: Provided, That all cases of death, removal, or change as aforesaid, shall be reported to the assistant assessor and registered with the assessor and collector of the district, under regulations to be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Mr. PRICE. I move to amend this section by inserting just before the proviso the following:

But any transfer in any business upon which the special tax has been paid shall not subject the party to whom the transfer is made to the payment of an additional tax.

That is what I spoke of the other day as necessary.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope the gentleman will give some reason for his amendment. I do not think it is necessary.

Mr. PRICE. The reason for it is this: if a firm doing business, under the section as it now stands, shall change the firm, then no additional tax shall be paid. But if that firm sells out the business to another firm, then this section does not prevent another tax being required. Now, I propose that the party to whom the business is transferred shall not pay the special tax, which has already been paid for the year.

Mr. SCHENCK. In reply to the gentleman I will assign the reason why I think the amendment of the gentleman is not founded upon a correct principle. This is not a tax upon things, as a tax upon land or other property; but it is a tax upon persons who are employing capital in a particular way. If you tax a man for any pursuit in which he is engaged, and give him leave to sell out his business with the privilege of the paid tax, you may have a dozen changes in the course of a year; and the assessor and collector will find difficulty in following around and ascertaining whom he is to deal with. And in this way a number of persons will go through these old clothes, transmitted from one to another.

The only exception that we have thought it prudent to make is where by death or some unavoidable casualty there shall be a dissolution of the firm, and the business is still continued by a regular legitimate successor, made such by the law, or in the family; then the tax may be considered as still attaching to the business.

Mr. PRICE. I have no doubt the committee intended to cover the whole ground, but they have not done so; that is the only point I wish to make. The section as it now stands provides that any change in the persons constituting a firm or company which has paid a special tax, shall not be considered as rendering the new firm liable for an additional tax. For instance, John Smith and Tom Jones constitute a firm which has paid the tax for a year. Jones sells out to Brown, but under this provision no new tax is required. But if Smith and Jones sell out to Roe and Doe, they will have to pay a special tax. I propose to provide that the effect shall be the same whether the whole or only a part of the firm be changed.

Mr. SCHENCK. I think the gentleman is mistaken in his proposition. I was about to add when he interrupted me, that this provision of the bill is a part of the present law.

Mr. WELKER. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. PRICE,] by adding to it the following:

Provided, That the business is carried on at the same place of business.

Mr. PRICE. I accept that as a modification of my amendment.

Mr. PAINE. I should be glad to inquire of the chairman of the committee whether this bill in any of its provisions imposes a personal tax upon a firm as such? Is not the tax imposed on each of the members of the firm? So far as I have observed, this personal tax imposed upon individuals for carrying on different trades, occupations, or professions, is imposed upon firms. I believe that in this bill the word "person" is always used; and I suppose as regards this class of taxes, if there should be half a dozen members of a firm, this tax would be imposed on each of the members. There is, of course, a class of taxes imposed upon firms as such, as, for instance, the tax upon sales. But where "persons" are taxed for carrying on a specific business, then of course, if we follow the literal phraseology of the bill, each member of the firm must pay that tax. I suppose this is the case with the tax provided for in this section. Hence I can see no reason for or propriety in the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa. On the contrary, it seems to me that we should strike out the whole of the following words:

And any change in the persons constituting a firm or company which has paid said special tax shall not be considered as rendering said firm or company liable for the additional tax.

Mr. PRICE. I think, Mr. Chairman, I understand what the English language means when it is written as plainly as it is in this section. If this section does not tax business then it does not do anything. The language is—

That upon the death of any person during the year for which he has paid the special tax—

On what? On his trade, business, or profession. If two men are selling boots and shoes and one of those men sells out to another party, then, under the section as it now stands, no additional tax is to be paid; but if both sell out to another man or several others, the latter must pay the tax. That is what I propose to avoid. The matter is as plain as the nose on a man's face.

Mr. ELA. I move to amend the amendment so as to insert after the words "additional tax" in line eleven, the following:

And when ceasing to do business for which he has paid special tax, he may authorize his successor in business or any other person to conduct the same business during the time for which he has paid such tax by making assignment of his special tax receipt.

The CHAIRMAN. This amendment is not in order. It is not properly an amendment to the pending amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move pro forma to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. I desire to say that, as I understand this tax, it is in the nature of a special tax imposed upon persons or individuals engaged in different branches of business. But in case of a firm, the change of one member of the firm is not to be regarded as such a change of the firm as to require a new payment of tax. When, however, the whole firm or association sells out to another party the case is different. I suppose we do not want to do what the proposition of the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. ELA] would accomplish—make these special licences transferable without restriction, so that a dealer in boots and shoes may pass over his receipt, with all his rights under it, to a man in an entirely different kind of business, or that a disreputable firm may, without the payment of a tax, succeed to the rights of a reputable firm. The design is, as I understand, that the rights conferred by the payment of the tax shall be in the nature of a grant to individuals; and when the whole firm is changed in its individual capacity, then, I take it, the special grant ought to cease. I hope the amendment will not be made.

Mr. PRICE. I do not desire to continue this debate, but I wish to attract the gentleman's attention for a single moment. This is a personal tax, and is transferred from person to person. Now, how does the gentleman explain this? On the death of any person during the year that he has paid a tax it may be transferred to the executor. The dead man can transfer the tax to his successor. This tax upon persons, if it means anything at all means a tax on the business. It provides that if a man dies his executor may carry on his business without tax. I only provide, in accordance with the spirit of the section, for exactly the same thing when the entire firm changes as when only a part of it dies.

Mr. GARFIELD. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. I renew the amendment for the purpose of making, as clearly as I can, an explanation of what we intend by this section and the reasons on which it is founded. These are special taxes, in the strict sense of the term. They are not intended to be general taxes. They are special as to persons. They are taxes upon particular persons employed in the use of capital or of their wits in a particular way. If gentlemen will turn to page 356 and to section two hundred and eighty-eight they will find something in this connection which helps my explanation. We found in this law, running all through it, "every person, corporation, body politic, or association," and so on. In order to get rid of that we have a general section, in which it is provided that where not otherwise distinctly expressed or manifestly incompatible with the intent thereof, the word "person," as used in this act, shall be construed to mean and include a firm, partnership, association, company, or corporation, as well as a natural person. We have used throughout the bill the word "person."

The law as it now stands we have not interfered with, that is, where parties engaged in one business enter partnerships, either in trade or manufactures or a profession, they shall be counted as one person, and pay a special tax accordingly, with this exception, to be found on page 125, which we have passed over this morning; and, as it seems, without notice on the part of any of these gentlemen, and that is this:

And that any number of persons doing business in copartnership at any one place shall be required to pay but one special tax for such copartnership, except lawyers, conveyancers, claim and patent agents, physicians, surgeons, dentists, cattle brokers, dealers in horses, peddlers, foreign commercial brokers, custom-house brokers, pawnbrokers, patent-right dealers, dealers in lottery tickets, and cigar-makers, who shall each be separately taxed.

The reason for that is this: this is peculiarly a personal business in every one of these cases. The provision is for special tax upon persons engaged in business. The law does not think it good policy, nor do the committee think it good policy in that respect, to permit half a dozen lawyers to come together and pay one tax for all, and then to scatter, and each sell out his license to somebody else.

Mr. PRICE. Let me ask the gentleman a question. If a lawyer dies and his executor happens to be a farmer, who knows no more about law than I do about Greek, can he carry on the business?

Mr. SCHENCK. We have provided in reference to everything that will cover the case of the death of a party in business. In the event of the death of a party engaged in business the law steps in and saves the succession. Where a partnership has paid a special tax and they change the business, but keep up the firm, the special tax goes on. The question arises, how far will we make exception? We agree by law to make an exception in the case of death.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ELA. I move pro forma to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] by striking out the last word. There is a manifest injustice in not allowing this transfer of special tax to be made to the successor in any business. Under the old license law they were transferable. Now, in some cases you provide that a special tax shall amount to $5,000, and yet after a man has paid this tax and has conducted his business for one month if he finds it for his interest to sell out and close up his business, he loses the whole amount except such benefit as he may have derived from it during the single month that he had conducted the business. That is a gross injustice. Then the amendment, which the gentleman has accepted, limits the business to the place where it is carried on, which is manifestly unjust in a case where the business is carried on in different places, as in selling by samples. The same objection applies to peddlers. The old system of license provided for transfers of the special taxes, the same privilege of assigning the business ought to be allowed in this bill.

Mr. MAYNARD. If the gentleman from New Hampshire will listen to a suggestion, I think it will relieve him of the difficulty that seems to press upon him. These persons pay in proportion to their sales and no more. A man may sell $1,000,000 worth of merchandise in three months and he pays his tax to that extent. He then sells out to B, who carries on the business for three months longer. B only pays for what he sells. Then B sells out to C, who pays only for what he sells, and not for what was sold by his predecessor.

Mr. ELA. That does not meet the case where a man pays $5,000 for a license before he commences business.

Mr. MAYNARD. That is a class of persons in regard to whom the object is to prevent their doing business in that particular way.

Mr. ELA. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move pro forma to strike out the last line of the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa. There are some very good reasons for a modification of this section, as proposed by the gentleman from New Hampshire and by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. PRICE.] I think the gentleman is correct in his assumption in regard to the intention of the committee as manifested in this section. It is a tax on the business and not on the person. I want to call the attention of the chairman of the committee and of the House to this state of facts: They require a special tax on the business of a hotel-keeper, we will say, for an illustration. It may be $500. Within a week a man who has paid for the license—for it is only a change of name to call it a special tax—may, for some reason, desire to sell out. He finds a purchaser and makes the transfer. The purchaser is required to pay for a new license $500. In a month that person sells out, and the purchaser is required by this section to pay $500. And so, no matter how many may be engaged in the same business in the same place successively, each one has to pay this special tax. Now, this bill ought to be so modified as to permit the same business to be conducted in the same place for one year under one special tax. That is no more than fair. It is not fair to impose a new tax on every change made in a firm or in the ownership of the business so long as they continue in the same place and in the same building.

Now, sir, as I understand it, the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, as modified, includes the proposition which I am debating, that one tax is all that the Government should require upon the same business conducted for one year in the same place without reference to the parties who carry that business on.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Chairman, I shall repeat my opposition to this amendment, for it is one of a sort of Protean character, which keeps appearing and reappearing in pretended different shapes, but always the same thing, and when I have expressed my opposition to it I shall request that debate on this paragraph may cease.

Now, we propose no new thing. What we propose is simply a continuance, so far as this matter is concerned, of the present law. By these special taxes we impose upon persons engaged or employing their capital in a particular way what we considered fair as their contribution to the support of the Government. This may operate in certain cases, where by no fault of their own or by force of circumstances a change is necessary, a hardship, and for three classes of those occurrences that may happen to a man in business we have provided. We have provided that in case of his death the law will step in and make an exception and provide relief so far as to permit his legal representatives or family to have the benefit of the tax he has paid. We have provided that where by force of circumstances a man has to remove from the place where he commenced business he may continue his business at another place to which he may go. And we have provided that where a partnership or firm is still kept up, but circumstances have occurred which induce a change in the individual persons composing that firm or partnership, the partnership shall still have the benefit of the tax which it has paid.

In all these cases, however, we have thought it proper to guard it, as the law now guards it, by providing that in any such case of death, change, or removal, the fact shall be registered with the assistant assessor and with the collector, together with the name or names of the person or persons deceased, or making such change or removal under regulations to be prescribed. The object of that is to keep the run in the different districts of the persons who thus are permitted to have the benefit of these exceptions.

[Here the hammer fell.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

At this point the committee rose informally, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message was received from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, announcing that the Senate had passed bills and a joint resolution of the following titles; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

A bill (S. No. 307) for the relief of certain Government contractors;

A bill (S. No. 353) to authorize the accounting officers of the Treasury to adjust the accounts of Ezra Carter, jr., late collector of the customs at Portland, Maine; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 93) granting permission to officers and soldiers to wear the badges of the corps in which they served during the rebellion.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed the bill (H. R. No. 1058) to admit the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, and Alabama to representation in Congress, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

INTERNAL TAX BILL.

The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union then resumed its session.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

The question recurred on Mr. PRICE's amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask unanimous consent that all debate may be closed on this section. There was no objection; and it was so ordered.

The question was taken on Mr. PRICE's amendment; and there were—ayes 33, noes 21; no quorum voting.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I hope the Committee of Ways and Means will agree to consider this amendment as agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. Oh, no.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I cannot agree to that. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs PRICE, and HOOPER of Massachusetts, were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 49, noes 38; no quorum voting.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I withdraw the call for a division, with the understanding that we shall have a vote on the amendment in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the amendment will be regarded as agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. Was there a quorum voting?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts stated that he waived a further count on the understanding that there should be a vote in the House.

Mr. PRICE. There must be a vote in the House.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am willing that the gentleman shall have an opportunity of renewing the amendment in the House.

Mr. PRICE. Oh, no; we do not propose when we have the victory to give up our advantage.

The CHAIRMAN. No quorum voted, and if the gentleman from Ohio insists on it the roll will be called.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman shall have an opportunity of renewing the amendment in the House. I hope he will agree to that rather than break up the committee.

Mr. PRICE. No, sir.

Mr. SCHENCK. Very well: I do not object to the call. Let it appear on the record who is here to attend to the business of the House.

Mr. PRICE. I am quite willing. I am always here.

Mr. SCHENCK. It is about time we had a call of the House.

Mr. PRICE. There is a majority in favor of the amendment, and I do not propose to waive any rights I have acquired.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOOPER] called for tellers, which were ordered. After the result of the count had been announced, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOOPER] said he would withdraw his call for a further count, and allow the amendment to be adopted, as a vote could be taken upon it in the House.

Mr. SCHENCK. Very well. I am willing to be bound by what has been done by my colleague on the committee.

No further amendment was offered.

The next section was read, as follows:

SEC. 93. And be it further enacted, That in every case where it becomes necessary to ascertain the amount of annual or monthly sales made by any person on whom a special tax is imposed, or to ascertain the excess of such sales above a given amount, such amounts and excesses shall be ascertained and returned under such regulations and in such form as shall be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue; and in any case where the amount of the tax has been increased by law above the amount before paid by any person in that behalf, such person shall be again assessed and pay the amount of such increase from the taking effect of this act; and in any case where the amount of sales or receipts has been understated or underestimated by any person, such person shall be again assessed for such deficiency, and shall be required to pay the same, with any penalty or penalties that may by law have accrued or be chargeable thereon.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend this section by striking out the following clause:

And in any case where the amount of the tax has been increased by law above the amount before paid by any person in that behalf, such person shall be again assessed and pay the amount of such increase from the taking effect of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PETERS. I desire to suggest a verbal amendment to this section. I think the words "if done fraudulently" should be inserted in the last clause of this section. I am not familiar enough with the bill to be able to tell what the penalty may be. But it strikes me that unless a person acts dishonestly he should not be liable to the penalty.

Mr. SCHENCK. There is a provision in the portion of the bill already passed which enables a person making a mistake to be relieved from the penalty.

Mr. PETERS. As the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means seems to be so certain that the amendment I have suggested is not necessary, I will withdraw it.

No further amendment was offered.

The next section was read, as follows:

SEC. 94. And be it further enacted, That in all cases where it is provided that the special tax imposed on any person engaged in manufacturing or prosecuting any business shall be increased by imposing an additional tax estimated on the excess of sales beyond the amount of sales specified as the maximum for which the annual special tax is imposed, the amount of all sales shall be returned monthly; but it shall be held and considered that the annual payment of the special tax due on the 1st day of May in each year shall be for the tax on the sales in that year until they amount to such maximum; and no addition to any special tax shall be assessed and collected on any sales reported in any monthly or other periodical return or statement required by this act until the sales in that year exceed the amount specified as the maximum for which the annual special tax was paid, and such addition shall be assessed and imposed only on the excess beyond the maximum amount so specified.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend the first clause of this section by striking out the words "the amount of all sales" before the words "shall be returned monthly," and inserting in lieu thereof the words, "or on the amount of receipts for such business, the amount of such sales and receipts."

The amendment was agreed to.

No further amendment was offered.

The next section was read, as follows:

SEC. 95. And be it further enacted, That nothing contained in this act shall be construed to impose a special tax upon any person who sells wine made from grapes or other products of his own growth, at the place where the same is made; nor shall any farmer be taxed as a manufacturer or dealer for making and selling butter or cheese, with milk from his own cows, manufactured on his own farm, nor for producing or selling any other farm product.

Mr. BARNES. I move to amend the last clause of this section by striking out the word "farmer," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "person." There are a great many persons in this country not farmers who produce these articles.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend the last clause of this amendment by inserting before the words "butter or cheese," the words "sugar or molasses manufactured from sorghum, the product of his own growth, or." I am not certain but what this provision is already in this bill; I have not noticed the amendments which have been made. But if a provision of this kind is not now in this bill, then I think my amendment ought to be adopted, so as to encourage a new industry of this character. It seems to me this article can bear taxation much less readily than almost any other; I think it should be particularly encouraged. In the main this manufacture is now carried on by small proprietors, men who raise an acre or two acres of sorghum and manufacture it themselves. I hope there will be no objection to the amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. I shall not oppose the amendment.

The amendment of Mr. HOLMAN was then agreed to.

Mr. SPALDING. In order to make this provision consistent with what we have already passed, I move to strike out of this section all that relates to butter and cheese, because we have provided for that in a previous part of the bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. I oppose that amendment, and I hope these words will be kept in this section. If we send this bill to the Senate with two provisions in it relating to butter and cheese, the Senate will choose between the two, and probably will strike out what has been inserted upon the gentleman's motion. I desire to give notice that hereafter I shall ask that all amendments be reduced to writing and announced from the Clerk's desk. A few moments ago an amendment was adopted which I and others around me did not hear the Clerk announce, though probably he did so.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will enforce the rule whenever any gentleman insists upon it.

Mr. MULLINS. I shall insist upon it.

The amendment of Mr. SPALDING was not agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move to amend by striking out near the close of this section the words "manufactured on his own farm;" so that the clause will read:

Nor shall any person be taxed as a manufacturer or dealer for making and selling butter or cheese with milk from his own cows, nor for producing or selling any other farm product.

I do not see why this exemption should not extend to persons hiring a farm for the purpose of making or selling butter or cheese. I think there would be propriety, also, in striking out the words "from his own cows;" for persons may carry on this business upon shares, owning neither the cows nor the farm; and I do not think such persons should be taxed more than those carrying on the same business, but owning the farm and the cows.

A MEMBER. That is provided for.

Mr. ROBINSON. If this section is intended to have the construction which I designed to express by my amendment, I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. BARNES. I move to amend the section by striking out in line seven the word "farm" and inserting "premises;" so as to make the last clause read:

Nor shall any person be taxed as a manufacturer or dealer for making and selling butter or cheese, with milk from his own cows, manufactured on his own premises, nor for producing or selling any other farm product.

This will make the section harmonize with the action we have already taken.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this amendment. The Committee of Ways and Means have very carefully endeavored to guard this bill in such a way that when a farmer, from the milk of his own cows and on his own farm, makes butter and cheese, he shall not be regarded as a manufacturer, but that the making of those articles shall be regarded as one of the incidents of his operations as a farmer. Gentlemen know perfectly well—and none better than my neighbors in the Western Reserve of Ohio—that this business of cheese-making is sometimes a very extensive and profitable business. Gentlemen here begin by getting in an amendment to strike out in this section the word "farmer" and insert "person," so that nobody who follows this business shall be regarded as a manufacturer or dealer. By an inadvertence or misunderstanding that amendment was permitted to pass. And now it is proposed to go one step further by striking out "farm" and inserting "premises." The latter term is broad enough to include one of those infernal places in New York where hundreds of cows are kept steaming and sweating over swill-tubs to give milk which, whether in the shape of the liquid itself or in the form of butter and cheese, is poisonous to those who use it.

Mr. BARNES. That kind of milk does not produce butter.

Mr. SCHENCK. No, it does not make butter, I believe, but makes some sort of curd. Whether in its liquid or its solid shape, I believe it to be poisonous. I assume that the object is of some gentleman here to permit this whole manufacturing business to creep in step by step by means of these changes. By the time this process shall have been completed this branch of manufacturing industry will be entirely exempt from its share of the burdens of the country; so that instead of relieving the farmer from taxation upon that which is incident, in a greater or less degree, to his occupation, we shall have released a whole branch of business for the benefit of those who may invest their capital in that way.

Mr. SPALDING. I wish to reply to my colleague.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted. The question was taken on Mr. BARNES's amendment; and it was rejected.

Mr. SPALDING. I move to strike out the words "with milk from his own cows." The gentleman says I know something about this.

Mr. SCHENCK. I know you do.

Mr. SPALDING. I know that farmers do not always make butter from milk of their own cows. A custom has grown up among farmers of exchanging milk with each other and of making butter and cheese out of borrowed milk. It is considered as the product of their own farms. Now, my friend, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means has urged more than once that it was wise to place the burden of taxation upon the false tastes of men for liquor, tobacco, &c. I take it that he drew milk from his mother's breast and acquired a taste for it in that way. It is, therefore, a natural taste; and according to his reasoning this matter should escape all taxation. I appeal to him to follow out his own reasoning, and I ask him in good faith to have these words stricken out, because our farmers make butter and cheese from milk they have received in exchange as from milk of their own cows.

Mr. MULLINS. I hope the amendment will be rejected; and as I am up I will give you my idea of this matter. I must give vent to my thoughts on the moving of this amendment about butter and cheese. Having gone over the material points of the bill, and now having come to this place where little farmers are interested, as to the partnership of farmers for the purpose of exchanging milk and making butter and cheese, then, lo! when before all was serene as a summer morning, we have a terrible wrangle and a great clamor raised. I know what this means. If we allow this borrowing and exchanging of milk, as the gentleman suggests, then there may be an association of parties who will supply all the butter and cheese and run the little farmers out of the market entirely. That is what it means.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. SPALDING; and it was disagreed to.

No further amendment being offered, the Clerk read the next section, as follows:

SEC. 96. And be it further enacted, That the payment of any special tax imposed by this act shall not be held or construed to exempt any person carrying on any trade, business, or profession from any penalty or punishment therefor provided by the laws of any State; nor to authorize the commencement or continuance of any such trade, business, or profession contrary to the laws of any State, nor in places prohibited by municipal law; nor shall the payment of any such tax be held or construed to prohibit or prevent any State from placing a duty or tax on the same trade, business, or profession for State or other purposes.

No amendment being offered, the Clerk read as follows:

STAMPS.

SEC. 97. And be it further enacted, That all internal revenue stamps of every kind and denomination on hand with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, or under his control, together with all such stamps as may be in the possession of or charged to any collector or other officer, agent, or person at the time this act takes effect, shall be accounted for by said Commissioner to the Treasury Department; and to this end he shall render a full and detailed report thereof, in duplicate, one report to be delivered to the Treasurer of the United States and the other to be delivered to the First Comptroller of the Treasury; and it shall be the duties of those officers severally to take account of the stamps thus reported, their numbers, kinds, and denominate values, and to charge the same to the respective accounts of the Commissioner, collectors, agents, or other officers or persons entitled by law to the possession of the same, and with whom they may appear to be severally deposited.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to strike out the word, "duties," and insert in lieu thereof "duty."

The amendment was agreed to.

No further amendment being offered, the Clerk read the next paragraph, as follows:

SEC. 98. And be it further enacted, That whenever any internal revenue stamps shall be prepared on the requirement of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and shall be ready for delivery, the said Commissioner shall issue a warrant therefor in favor of the Treasurer or some Assistant Treasurer of the United States, addressed to the person or persons, or company, by whom the same shall have been so prepared, specifying therein the several denominations and the number of each denomination, and shall deliver a copy of said warrant to the First Comptroller of the Treasury. And it shall be the duty of the Treasurer or the Assistant Treasurer forthwith to present such warrant to the party to whom the same shall be addressed, and to receive the stamps therein described, and to transmit to the Commissioner and to the First Comptroller each a certificate of the fact. And the Secretary of the Treasury may make such regulations as to him may seem proper for the interests of the United States and the convenience of the public, for the transfer of stamps by the Treasurer to an Assistant Treasurer, and from one Assistant Treasurer to another, or to the Treasurer; and he may also make regulations for the custody and disposal of stamps by designated depositaries. And for the safe-keeping and disposal of stamps agreeably to law, the said Treasurer and each Assistant Treasurer and designated depositary, respectively, shall, with their respective sureties on their official bonds, be held bound and liable to the United States for the par money value of such stamps, in the same manner and to the same extent as for the safe-keeping and disposal of the moneys of the United States. And whenever application shall be made to purchase stamps the Commissioner shall issue a warrant therefor on the Treasurer, or proper Assistant Treasurer, stating therein the number of each denomination of stamps to be delivered, and the sum to be paid therefor; but in no case shall a warrant be issued for less amount than fifty dollars of the denominate value of stamps. And upon the presentation of such warrant to the Treasurer or proper Assistant Treasurer, and the deposit with the said Treasurer or Assistant Treasurer of the sum designated, the described stamps shall be delivered to the holder of the warrant and a receipt taken therefor; but the Commissioner may require a deposit of the purchase money before issuing a warrant for the delivery of stamps, and where by law the delivery of stamps to collectors of internal revenue without prepayment of the value thereof may be authorized, such deliveries shall be made in the manner and with the forms prescribed in this section. Provided, That the Commissioner and the Secretary of the Treasury may together authorize some officer of the United States, appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and having his office in San Francisco, to draw warrants for stamps on the Assistant Treasurer at San Francisco; and such officer, in addition to transmitting a copy of each warrant to the First Comptroller, as required of the Commissioner, shall make such reports of his transaction as may be required by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Commissioner. The Treasurer, each Assistant Treasurer, and designated depositary, to whom stamps shall be delivered, shall, at the expiration of each quarter, or oftener if required, render and transmit to the Fifth Auditor of the Treasury an account of the stamps received by him, in which he shall be charged with all stamps on hand at the beginning of the quarter, and with all stamps received by him during the greater or lesser period of time, at the denominate value of such stamps; and he shall be credited at like value with all stamps delivered by him upon warrants, as herein provided, upon the production of the warrants, duly receipted, by the parties respectively to whom the deliveries may have been made; and he shall accompany each account with schedules of the denominations and numbers and character of the stamps charged; of those delivered upon warrants and of those yet remaining on hand. Each collector of internal revenue to whom stamps may be delivered for sale shall in like manner render and transmit to the Fifth Auditor an account and schedule of stamps received by him, stamps sold and stamps remaining on hand, separate from his other accounts, in which he shall be charged with all stamps on hand at the beginning of the quarter, and with all stamps received during the period embraced in the account at the denominate value thereof, and he shall be credited with all moneys deposited by him on account of sales of stamps, with the commission on such deposits authorized by law and the regulations of the Commissioner, and with such stamps as he may have, under the regulations of the Commissioner, returned to the Treasurer, an Assistant Treasurer, or designated depositary. And in case of the failure of the Treasurer, an Assistant Treasurer, designated depositary, or collector of internal revenue to pay over moneys received for stamps, or otherwise properly to account for the stamps received by him, he shall be liable to the United States for the full denominate value of such stamps, without deductions for commissions or other charges. And all moneys received from the sale of stamps shall be paid into the Treasury separate and distinct from other public moneys. And the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to make rules and regulations for the safe-keeping and transmission of stamps, and to provide, by contract or otherwise, for the manufacture of them, in such numbers and kinds, and of such descriptions, denominations, and devices, as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may require.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend, in line twenty-seven, by striking out the words "par money" and inserting the word "denominate."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move further to strike out the following words:

In which he shall be charged with all stamps on hand at the beginning of the quarter, and with all stamps received during the period embraced in the account at the denominate value thereof, and he shall be credited with all moneys deposited by him on account of sales of stamps, with the commissions on such deposits authorized by law and the regulations of the Commissioner, and with such.

And by inserting in lieu thereof, the following:

Charging in the account all stamps on hand at the commencement of, and all stamps received during the period embraced in, the account, at the denominated value thereof, and crediting all moneys deposited by him on account of sales of stamps, including commissions authorized by law and the regulations of the Commissioner on such sales, and with the amount of such.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 99. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is authorized, at his discretion, to supply collectors with all the stamps required by them in their several districts, to be charged to and accounted for by said collectors severally, as provided by law; and he may sell to any person, in an aggregate amount of not less than fifty dollars, any stamps, except stamps for the taxes on distilled spirits, fermented liquors, and tobacco, snuff, and cigars, to be paid for to the Treasurer of the United States in the manner provided in this act, allowing to the person so purchasing a discount of five per cent. on any amount so sold; but the purchaser, in cases where such stamps are represented by stamped paper, parchment, or vellum, shall be required to pay the full cost of the paper, parchment, or vellum. And any proprietor of articles named in schedule C, who shall furnish his own die or design for stamps to be used exclusively for his own articles, shall be allowed a discount of ten per cent. on any amount exceeding $500 purchased at one time. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue may make general regulations respecting allowances to be made for stamps issued under the provisions of this act, which may have been spoiled, destroyed, or rendered useless or unfit for the purpose intended, or for which the owner may have no use, or where the taxes represented thereby have been paid in error and remitted; and such allowances shall be made, either by giving other stamps in lieu of the stamps so allowed for, or by repaying the amount thereof, after deducting therefrom the amount of any discount that may have been allowed to the owner thereof; but no allowance shall be made in any case until the stamps so spoiled, or rendered useless, shall have been returned to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, or until satisfactory proof has been made showing the reason why said stamps cannot be so returned.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to strike out the word "all" in the third line.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move further to strike out, in line sixteen, the words, "exclusively for his own articles," and insert the words, "only upon those articles which he owns or of which he has the exclusive control."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move further to amend by striking out the word "useless" in line twenty-two and inserting the word "absolute."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BEAMAN. I desire to offer the following amendment to come in at the end of the section:

Provided, That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may, from time to time furnish, supply, and deliver to any manufacturer of friction or other matches, cigar-lights, or wax tapers, a suitable quantity of adhesive or other stamps, such as may be prescribed for use in such cases, without prepayment therefor, on a credit not exceeding sixty days requiring in advance such security as he may judge necessary to secure payment therefor to the Treasurer of the United States within the time prescribed for such payment. And upon all bonds or other securities taken by said Commissioner under the provision of this act, suits may be maintained by said Treasurer in the circuit or district court of the United States in the several districts where any of the persons giving said bonds or other securities reside or may be found in any appropriate form or action.

This amendment is copied from the law as it now stands.

Mr. ALLISON. We have made a similar provision. I do not know whether it is in exactly the same words. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the amendment until it can be compared with the provision that we have reported.

Mr. BEAMAN. I withdraw it.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 100. And be it further enacted, That in any collection district where, in the judgment of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, the facilities for the procurement and distribution of stamps are insufficient, he may supply any postmaster in such district without prepayment therefor with stamps not exceeding $200 in the aggregate amount at any one time, and not including stamps for distilled spirits, fermented liquors, tobacco, snuff, or cigars, requiring from such postmaster a bond, with sufficient sureties, to be approved by said commissioner, in an amount equal to double the value of the stamps so furnished, conditioned for the faithful return, whenever required, of all such stamps undisposed of, and for the payment monthly of all money received for those sold, which bond shall be deposited with the First Comptroller of the Treasury; and in the adjustment of the account of such postmaster for stamps so furnished to and sold by him he shall be allowed a commission of five per cent. for his services.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am requested by the managers to ask that the committee may rise for the purpose of making an order of the House to discharge Mr. Woolley from custody immediately. I understand he has been examined, and the committee are ready to discharge him.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and Mr. DAWES, as Speaker pro tempore, having taken the chair, Mr. POMEROY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 1060) to reduce into one act and to amend the laws relating to internal taxes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

DISCHARGE OF RECUSANT WITNESS.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the committee of investigation to report the following resolution:

Resolved, That Charles W. Woolley, having appeared before the committee of investigation and answered all questions put to him by the committee or its order, and thus purged himself of his contempt of the House in that regard, be discharged from arrest and held only to appear and make further answer if required according to his summons.

I desire only to say that the witness has answered fully and distinctly all questions that have been put to him; and there seems, in the judgment of the committee, no further reason for holding him under arrest, and any further attendance will be under the summons. On that resolution I move the previous question.

Mr. ROBINSON. I wish to ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. What was the gentleman's last remark?

Mr. BUTLER. The last remark was that there was no further occasion to hold him except under the summons.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly; I will yield for a question—that is all?

Mr. ROBINSON. I want to ask if it is true that Mr. Woolley was originally arrested by order of the committee, or any part of the committee, without the order of this House?

Mr. BUTLER. It is not. He never was ordered to be arrested by the committee.

Mr. ROBINSON. It is so stated by Mr. Woolley.

Mr. BUTLER. I insist on the previous question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore proceeded to put the question on seconding the previous question.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I understand the gentleman from New York to have asked the gentleman from Massachusetts a question which involves a fact— [Cries of "Order!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House is dividing and no debate is in order.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I merely desire to ask a question of the gentleman from Massachusetts. [Cries of "Order!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That cannot be done except by unanimous consent. [Loud cries of "Object!"]

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I supposed that it could be done by the consent of the gentleman from Massachusetts. [Cries of "Order!"]

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. LAWRENCE] asks leave of absence for one week. If there be no objection it will be granted. The Chair hears none.

Mr. SCHENCK. What was that? Another leave of absence?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. LAWRENCE] asks leave of absence for one week. The Chair so stated and heard no objection.

Mr. SCHENCK. I object unless there is some special reason for it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks the objection comes too late.

A MEMBER. Mr. LAWRENCE has already left the city.

Mr. SCHENCK. Well, I do not press the objection, but I desire to give notice, and I do it in no spirit inimical to anybody, that hereafter when a gentleman goes away first and then asks leave of absence of the House, I shall object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The leave of absence has been granted.

INTERNAL TAX BILL.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the tax bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 1060) to reduce into one act and to amend the laws relating to internal taxes.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 101. And be it further enacted, That if any person having the custody of any plate, die, or other instrument from which any stamp, or any part thereof, mentioned in this act, shall have been printed, or which shall have been prepared for the purpose of printing any such stamp, or any part thereof, shall use such plate, die, or other instrument, or knowingly permit the same to be used for the purpose of printing any stamp, or any part thereof, except such as shall be printed for the use of the United States, by order of the proper officer thereof; or if any person shall make or engrave, or cause or procure to be made or engraved, or shall aid in making or engraving, any plate, die, or other instrument in the likeness or similitude of any plate, die, or other instrument designed for the printing of any such stamp, or any part thereof; or shall vend, or sell, or buy any such plate, die, or other instrument; or shall bring into the United States from any foreign place any such plate, die, or other instrument, with any other intent, or for any other purpose, in either case, than that such plate, die, or other instrument shall be used for printing such stamp, or some part or parts thereof, for the use of the United States; or if any person shall have in his custody or possession any plate, die, or other instrument, engraved after the similitude of any plate, die, or other instrument, from which any such stamp, or any part or parts thereof, shall have been printed, with intent to use any such plate, die, or other instrument, or cause or suffer the same to be used in forging or counterfeiting any such stamp, or any part or parts thereof, issued or to be issued as aforesaid; or shall have in his custody or possession any stamp engraved and printed after the similitude of any such stamp issued as aforesaid, with intent to sell, or otherwise use the same, or with intent to defraud the United States of any of the taxes imposed by law, or any part thereof; or if any person shall forge or counterfeit, or cause or procure to be forged or counterfeited, any stamp, die, plate, or other instrument, or any part of any stamp, die, plate, or other instrument which shall have been provided, or may hereafter be provided, made, or used in pursuance of this act, or shall forge, counterfeit, or imitate, or cause or procure to be forged, counterfeited, or imitated, the impression, or any part of the impression, of any such stamp, die, plate, or other instrument as aforesaid, upon any vellum, parchment, or paper; or shall stamp or mark, or cause or procure to be stamped or marked, any vellum, parchment or paper, article or thing, with any such forged or counterfeited stamp, die, plate, or other instrument, or part of any stamp, die, plate, or other instrument, as aforesaid, with intent to defraud the United States of any of the taxes hereby imposed, or any part thereof; or if any person shall have in possession, or shall utter or sell or buy or offer to sell or offer to buy any vellum, parchment, paper, article, or thing, having thereupon the impression of any such counterfeited stamp, die, plate, or other instrument, or any part of any stamp, die, plate, or other instrument, or any such forged, counterfeited or imitated impression or part of impression, as aforesaid, knowing the same to be forged, counterfeited or imitated; or if any person shall knowingly use or permit the use of any stamp, die, plate, or other instrument, which shall have been so provided, made, or used as aforesaid, with intent to defraud the United States; or if any person shall fraudulently cut, tear, or remove or cause or procure to be cut, torn, or removed, the impression of any stamp, die, plate, or other instrument which shall have been provided, made, or used in pursuance of this act from any vellum, parchment, or paper or any instrument or writing charged or chargeable with any of the taxes imposed by law; or if any person shall fraudulently use, join, fix, or place or cause to be used, joined, fixed, or placed, to, with, or upon any vellum, parchment, paper, or any instrument or writing charged or chargeable with any of the taxes hereby imposed, any adhesive stamp, or the impression of any stamp, die, plate, or other instrument, which shall have been provided, made, or used in pursuance of law, and which shall have been cut, torn, or removed from any other vellum, parchment, or paper or any instrument or writing charged or chargeable with any of the taxes imposed by law; or if any person shall willfully remove or cause to be removed, alter or cause to be altered, the canceling or defacing marks on any adhesive stamp, with intent to use the same or to cause the use of the same after it shall have been once used, or shall knowingly or willfully sell or buy such washed or restored stamps, or offer the same for sale, or give or expose the same to any person for use, or knowingly use the same, or prepare the same with intent for the further use thereof; or if any person shall knowingly and without lawful excuse (the proof whereof shall lie on the person accused) have in his possession any washed, restored, or altered stamps, which have been removed from any vellum, parchment, paper, instrument, or writing; then, and in every such case, every person so offending, and every person knowingly and willfully aiding, abetting, or assisting in committing any such offense as aforesaid, shall, on conviction, be fined not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, and imprisoned for not less than one year nor more than five years; and all articles to which such forged, counterfeited, washed, restored, or altered stamps have been affixed shall be forfeited to the United States; and all such stamps, plates, dies, and other instruments shall be destroyed by the marshal under the direction of the court.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to amend this section, by adding to it the following:

Provided, That the presence upon any stamp of a cancellation mark shall be prima facie evidence that such stamp has been cut, torn or removed from some writing or instrument charged or chargeable with a tax, unless said stamp shall be affixed to an instrument or writing, and the cancellation mark be that which is appropriate to such instrument or writing.

Mr. GARFIELD. I would call the attention of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] to this fact: his amendment says "unless said stamp shall be affixed to an instrument or writing." Are there not a great many articles upon which stamps are to be used, which cannot be so described?

Mr. ALLISON. This section applies to the cutting or tearing off stamps from "any parchment, vellum, paper, instrument, or writing."

Mr. GARFIELD. Are not stamps applied to other articles not so described?

Mr. ALLISON. They are; but the proviso I have moved relates only to the articles described in this section.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move to amend this section by striking out the following clause:

Or if any person shall knowingly and without lawful excuse (the proof whereof shall lie on the person accused) have in his possession any washed, restored, or altered stamps, which have been removed from any vellum, parchment, paper, instrument, or writing.

I see no reason at all for this very severe provision of the law. Persons might have stamps in their possession without any illegal purpose. But that to which I principally object are the words included in the parentheses, "the proof whereof shall lie on the person accused." And wherever I meet with any such provision in this bill, I intend to oppose it as something tyrannical, unjust, and wrong in every way. It is wrong to have such a provision as this in the law, by which the mere possession of a couple of stamps of the value of two cents, shall be regarded as evidence of guilt, throwing the burden of proof of innocence upon the person having possession of the stamps. And if there is any use at all in any portion of this clause, I can see no excuse for the words embraced in the parentheses.

I will modify my amendment, and move to strike out the words in the parentheses, "the proof whereof shall lie on the person accused."

Mr. ALLISON. There can be no possible honest reason for a person having in his possession "washed, restored, or altered stamps."

Mr. ROBINSON. I have a few in my pocket now, and have had for more than a twelve-month.

Mr. ALLISON. Or if there is any honest reason it can be easily shown. In the large cities there is a very large traffic in these washed and restored canceled stamps. The object of this provision is to impose a punishment upon a class of people who indulge in this sort of traffic. I think it is a very just and proper provision, and that no honest man will be troubled by it.

Mr. VAN AUKEN. Suppose a deed is drawn up and a stamp affixed to it, and before the deed is delivered the party changes his intention so as to require the drawing up of a new deed.

Mr. ALLISON. This provision applies to persons having these restored, washed, or canceled stamps in their possession without any legal excuse therefor. If a man has an honest legal reason for having such stamps in his possession it will be very easy for him to show that reason. I do not think much of that objection to this provision.

Mr. BARNES. Will the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] allow me to ask him a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on this amendment.

On agreeing to the amendment of Mr. ROBINSON there were—ayes 28, noes 43; no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] insist on a further count?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes, sir; I feel justified in making every effort in my power to have this abominable provision struck out.

Mr. MAYNARD. I think I can suggest to the gentleman from New York a modification of his amendment which would be acceptable.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted. No quorum having voted,

The CHAIRMAN, under the rule, ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. ROBINSON and Mr. ALLISON.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 25, noes 72.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. PAINE. I move to amend the proviso which has been added to this section on motion of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON,] by inserting after the word "instrument" the words "or article."

Mr. ALLISON. There is no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move to amend the section by striking out the following:

Or if any person shall knowingly and without lawful excuse (the proof whereof shall lie on the person accused) have in his possession any washed, restored, or altered stamps, which have been removed from any vellum, parchment, paper, instrument, or writing.

Mr. Chairman, I trust the committee will not understand me as trifling with its time by bringing up this question again. I believe that no gentleman who will carefully examine the provision which I move to strike out, can say that there is any necessity for it. Its adoption will simply place upon our statute book a cruel, unnecessary, and unconstitutional enactment, which can only be defended by those who expect severity to do what severity can never accomplish. I trust, therefore, that this provision will be stricken out.

How would such an enactment operate? Any gentleman having upon his person as mere curiosities two stamps of the value of one cent each, may be arrested by any one of the many thousands of inspectors, runners, &c., scattered all over the country, may be brought before a magistrate or commissioner, and there compelled to call witnesses to prove that he has those stamps in his possession for an innocent and lawful purpose. I say, take all the oppressive laws that have ever been denounced for their injustice and severity, and you will not find upon the statute-book of any nation so unjust, severe, and unnecessary a provision as that upon which I am now commenting. It would seem as if it had been framed to outbid and out-Hector all previous forms of tyranny, putting into the hands of these revenue officials more power than was ever before put into the hands of magistrates of any kind.

Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to my colleague, [Mr. BARNES.]

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Chairman, I fully indorse the views which have just been expressed by my colleague. I am astonished that gentlemen should propose to incorporate a provision of this kind into a bill intended to be just. Let me illustrate how such a provision would operate. On a recent visit to my own establishment in the city of New York I found that in consequence of some jealousy (the cause of which I do not know) between two of my employes, one of them had put into the pockets of the other articles of merchandise and had him arrested and taken to the Tombs for the supposed theft. Now, we all know that malice is a more powerful incentive of human action than avarice or revenge or any other passion. Under the influence of this passion children or even adults may place these canceled stamps upon the person of any one whom they wish to injure, and subject him to a sort of inquisition which we all understand is unjust. It seems to me whatever object is designed by the committee to gain a great revenue, some other means ought to be ascertained for the purpose of accomplishing it.

Mr. SCHENCK. If these two gentlemen were better lawyers they would not be as good orators. We should not have heard from one that this is the first instance in which we out-Hector and outbid every other form of tyranny. There is no new principle of law whatever involved in it. What is it we propose? To make it a penal offense to be found in the possession of altered, washed, or restored stamps. Not canceled stamps, for you may have as many canceled stamps in your pocket as you please; but if you are found with stamps canceled, and the cancellation partially removed so as to restore them, wash them and put them upon the market, you are like any other person found in possession of counterfeited or altered notes, and it is a prima facie case against any one charged with that offense to say he has been found in possession of these altered or counterfeit notes.

Mr. BARNES. Could I not take those stamps and manipulate them in that way, and place them upon the person of a second party, so as to work to his own injury under this bill?

Mr. SCHENCK. I could get counterfeit notes, and, if I were willing to do it, could sneak up and put them into the pocket of my friend from New York, but if I did it would be easy to inquire into and explain the matter. It is rather a violent presumption for the gentleman to make.

All through the statute-books of every State of the Union are provisions precisely similar to this, that it shall be held to be penal, not merely to counterfeit and forge, but to be found in possession of forged and counterfeit notes. That is all there is of it. This provision, "if any person shall knowingly," "Knowingly"—that will meet the gentleman's case. The language is:

Or if any person shall knowingly and without lawful excuse (the proof whereof shall lie on the person accused) have in his possession any washed, restored, or altered stamps, which have been removed from any vellum, parchment, instrument, or writing, then, and in every such case, every person so offending, and every person knowingly and willfully aiding, abetting, or assisting in committing any such offense as aforesaid, shall, on conviction, be fined not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, and imprisoned for not less than one year nor more than five years.

The amendment was disagreed to.

No further amendment being offered, the Clerk read, as follows:

SEC. 102. And be it further enacted, That there shall be levied, collected, and paid as taxes, for and in respect of the several instruments, matters, and things mentioned and described in the schedule (marked B) hereto annexed, or for or in respect of the vellum, parchment, or paper upon which such instruments, matters, or things, or any of them, shall be written or printed, by any person or persons, or party who shall make, sign, or issue the same, or for whose use or benefit the same shall be made, signed, or issued, the several amounts of money set down in figures against the same, respectively or otherwise specified or set forth in the said schedule; the payment of which amounts shall be indicated and proved by adhesive stamps to be affixed to such instruments, matters, and things, and canceled in the manner and form prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the remaining paragraphs of section one hundred and two will be considered as separate sections.

There was no objection; and it was ordered accordingly.

The Clerk then read as follows:

Schedule B.

Agreement or contract, other than domestic and inland bills of lading, and those specified in this schedule; any appraisement of value or damage, or for any other purpose; for every sheet or piece of paper upon which either of the same shall be written, five cents: Provided, That if more than one appraisement, agreement, or contract shall be written upon one sheet or piece of paper, five cents for each and every additional appraisement, agreement, or contract.

Mr. BLAIR. I move to strike out the paragraph just read.

Mr. Chairman, I think it is hardly necessary to levy this tax. This tax and the one that follows it are both of the same character. The amount is not so material as the trouble occasioned by it. I presume that gentlemen who have been acquainted with the business of the courts of the country will have observed that there is a vast amount of litigation constantly growing out of this little five cent stamp which is required to be applied to contracts. Most generally they are drawn up by persons who are not skilled in the art of drawing contracts and have not much knowledge of the law. In a great many instances they do not put on the stamps as they are required to do by law; in others they put them on wrongly. Now, the object of my amendment is simply to see whether the committee think upon the whole it is best to retain such a tax. I make the motion in accordance with my own judgment on this subject that these petty, annoying, and troublesome taxes which do not produce a great deal of revenue, had better be dropped out of our internal revenue system. My experience has been that this is one of that kind. And the same objection applies to the stamp tax in the next paragraph, required to be put on receipts and various documents which are used in the common course of business among persons who are not skilled in these transactions. They are a matter of a great deal of annoyance, and I believe that the amount which is received from this source is not a compensation for the annoyance they occasion.

Mr. SCHENCK. I wish the millenium had come, Mr. Chairman, so that we could do without any tax altogether. But I do not think it can be done yet. While I recognize the force of the remark made by the gentleman from Michigan, that the stamp tax is a troublesome one, I recognize in a little stronger degree the absolute necessity of having the $18,000,000 which we derive from stamps as a part of the revenue which has helped us hitherto, and upon which we count now in order to be able to carry on the operations of the Government. Unwilling to extend this system of stamps, and hoping for a day not many years distant, as I trust, when we may be able to dispense not only with this but with the tax on incomes, legacies, and many other things, provided Congress and the people will sustain us in the attempt to make up from distilled spirits, tobacco, and other articles what we need for the support of the Government, we have thought it best not to make any change in the law now. We have not extended it in any degree whatever. And I take this occasion to say here that this schedule B is reported back with some sections ameliorating, in some respects, some of the hardships that occur. Those provisions will be found at the close of the pending schedule, but so far as the schedule itself is concerned it is without alterations. I therefore consider it a sort of test question, when this objection is made, to be submitted as such to the committee at the threshold whether we are going to sustain the stamp system at all.

Mr. CULLOM. What amount of tax is now collected on these stamps?

Mr. SCHENCK. We cannot separate these from some others which are sold to be applied to the articles contained in schedule C; but taking them altogether, the amount of stamps sold in the last year was $16,094,000.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. How much of that was for stamps of the denomination of five cents?

Mr. SCHENCK. I cannot tell. They are not given separately in the report of the Commissioner. We have endeavored to get the separate amounts of the different items, but it seems to be impossible to obtain them with any degree of approximate certainty even. One of the most numerous sold stamps is the two cent stamps. The sales of that alone, as I understand, amounted to about $2,000,000. Of the five cent stamps, however, I understand, that not so large an amount in the aggregate has been sold.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The amendment of Mr. BLAIR was disagreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Bank check, draft, or order for the payment of any sum of money whatsoever, drawn upon any bank, banker, or trust company; and for any sum exceeding ten dollars drawn upon any other person or persons, companies, or corporations, at sight or on demand, two cents.

Mr. WELKER. I move to strike out ten dollars and insert twenty dollars.

I want to make this clause correspond with an amendment which I shall propose in the next paragraph and make it twenty dollars instead of ten dollars. I think that is small enough.

The amendment was disagreed to.

No further amendments being offered, the Clerk read the next paragraph, as follows:

Bill of exchange, (inland,) draft, or order for the payment of any sum of money not exceeding $100, otherwise than at sight or on demand, or any promissory note, (except bank notes issued for circulation, and checks made and intended to be forthwith presented, and which shall be presented to a bank or banker for payment,) or any memorandum, check, receipt, or other written or printed evidence of an amount of money to be paid on demand, or at a time designated, for a sum not exceeding $100, five cents.

Mr. WELKER. I move to amend that paragraph by inserting after the word "money" in line thirty-four; the words "above the sum of twenty dollars and," so that it will read: "bill of exchange, (inland,) draft, or order for the payment of any sum of money above the sum of twenty dollars and not exceeding $100, otherwise than at sight or on demand," &c. I propose to exempt from this stamp tax all notes, checks, &c., for a less sum than twenty dollars. Now, I feel the force of the remark made by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. BLAIR,] that a stamp tax on these small commercial papers is a very annoying and troublesome tax. I see the necessity of a preservation of the stamp tax on some classes of papers, but on the execution of little promissory notes and receipts and checks for a less sum than twenty dollars, it strikes me that we can very well get rid of the tax. These stamps are not very easily procured at a distance from the county seats where the collectors reside. Take my own county, for example, many of the business men are situated ten, twelve, or fifteen miles from the county seat and a stamp is required for every little note for the sale of a cow and every small business transaction. This tax amounts in the aggregate to but very little. I can see a necessity for keeping the stamp tax on some classes of papers, but I hope the committee will be willing to exonerate these small notes from the operation of the stamp duty.

Mr. HIGBY. Would it not be possible for a man owing a sum of $500 to give small notes for the amount and thus escape the tax?

Mr. WELKER. I do not think the tax would be very likely to be evaded in that way.

Mr. PHELPS. I suggest to the gentleman that he had better propose the same amendment in line forty-two.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope this amendment will not be adopted. This is only a tax of five cents on notes, &c., for a less amount than $100. It has existed for several years in this schedule, and the people understand it very well, and it is very useful to the Government.

Mr. CULLOM. Is not this a change from the old law?

Mr. ALLISON. I think not. This paragraph is in relation to promissory notes.

Mr. CULLOM. And checks. I think it is a change from the existing law.

Mr. ALLISON. It is precisely the existing law with reference to promissory notes and checks. The committee were very careful to make no changes in this schedule for the reason that the people of the country thoroughly understand the schedule now. Every insurance company has published this schedule on its cards, and nearly every business man and the people are familiar with it. It is a very small tax in detail, but a very large sum to the Government in the aggregate. I hope my friend will not insist on his amendment. We have a provision in this bill which will obviate one of the objections he makes; it authorizes every postmaster in the country on certain conditions to sell stamps, so that a good deal of the difficulty now experienced in obtaining stamps will be obviated.

Mr. PHELPS. I move to amend the amendment by inserting after the word "sum," in line forty-two, the words, "exceeding twenty dollars and."

The CHAIRMAN. That is not an amendment to the pending amendment.

The question was taken on Mr. WELKER's amendment; and it was disagreed to.

Mr. WELKER. I now move to insert on page 42, after the word "sum," the words "above twenty dollars and;" so that it will read:

Or any promissory note, (except bank notes issued for circulation, and checks made and intended to be forthwith presented, and which shall be presented to a bank or banker for payment,) or any memorandum, check, receipt, or other written or printed evidence of an amount of money to be paid on demand, or at a time designated, for a sum above twenty dollars and not exceeding $100, five cents.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. MILLER. I move to insert the words "over ten dollars and." At present a man is charged five cents on every small matter of a dollar or two.

Mr. ALLISON. Nobody gives a note for one dollar.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move to add to the paragraph the following proviso:

Provided, That promissory notes for less than $100 not drawn by or upon any bank, banker, trust company, or any company or corporation, shall not be required to have a stamp affixed.

I propose this amendment for the purpose of avoiding a great deal of trouble to which the people in the country are now put in drawing promissory notes, &c. As has been remarked here, the people in the country, especially in the West, have not these stamps on hand all the time. The income from this source is but a small matter compared to the inconveniences and trouble to which such a provision subjects the people.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the amendment will not prevail. I think it will be far better for us to retain this whole stamp section as it now is until we can relieve the country entirely or nearly so from this stamp duty; and to undertake to relieve it only in so small a part as this would be of no particular advantage to the people.

The amendment of Mr. LOUGHRIDGE was not agreed to.

Mr. NICHOLSON. I move to amend the clause last read by striking out the words "and checks made and intended to be forthwith presented, and which shall be presented to a bank or banker for payment." I offer this amendment for the purpose of asking some member of the Committee of Ways and Means if that is not a change in the law as it now exists, and if it does not materially conflict with the preceding clause?

Mr. ALLISON. This change is necessary, as it relates to time drafts, while other checks and drafts are subjected to a stamp duty of two cents each.

Mr. NICHOLSON. I withdraw my amendment.

No further amendment was offered.

The following clauses were read:

And for every additional $100, or fractional part thereof, in excess of $100, five cents.

Bill of exchange, (foreign,) or letter of credit, drawn in but payable out of the United States, if drawn singly, or otherwise than according to the custom of merchants and bankers, in a set of three or more, shall pay the same rates of duty as inland bills of exchange or promissory notes.

If drawn in sets of three or more: For every bill of each set where the sum made payable shall not exceed $100, or the equivalent thereof, in any foreign currency in which such bills may be expressed, according to the standard of value fixed by the United States, two cents.

And for every additional $100, or fractional part thereof, in excess of $100, two cents.

Bill of lading or receipt (other than charter-party) for any goods, merchandise, or effects to be exported from a port or place in the United States to any foreign port or place, ten cents.

Bill of sale by which any ship or vessel, or any part thereof, shall be conveyed to or vested in any other person or persons, when the consideration shall not exceed $500, fifty cents.

Exceeding $500 and not exceeding $1,000, one dollar.

Exceeding $1,000 for every additional amount of $500, or fractional part thereof, fifty cents.

Bond. For indemnifying any person for the payment of any sum of money, where the money ultimately recoverable thereupon is $1,000 or less, fifty cents.

Mr. PETERS. I move to amend the clause last read by striking out the words "money ultimately recoverable thereon" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "penal sum." I have found in practice a great deal of difficulty resulting from the construction of similar phrases in the revenue laws. How can a person tell in advance what may be ultimately recoverable upon a bond?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not object to that amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. That is right.

Mr. PETERS. I think such an amendment is necessary.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. We will all agree to it if you will not say anything more.

Mr. PETERS. Very well; I will not say another word.

The amendment was agreed to.

No further amendment was offered.

The next clause was read, as follows:

Where the money ultimately recoverable thereupon exceed $1,000, for every additional $1,000, or fractional part thereof in excess of $1,000, fifty cents.

Mr. ALLISON. I move the same amendment to this clause that was adopted to the one next preceding, to strike out the words, "money ultimately recoverable thereupon," and insert in lieu thereof the words, "penal sum."

Mr. HOLMAN. I object to the amendment. I think the language now used in the law is fully understood by the people. I do not think it is necessary to make these changes, for every change produces confusion. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. MAYNARD. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope we will adopt the entire schedule as it is in the present law.

The question was then taken upon the amendment of Mr. ALLISON; and it was agreed to.

No further amendment was offered.

The following clauses were read:

Bond for the due execution or performance of the duties of any office, one dollar.

Bond of any description, other than such as may be required in legal proceedings, or used in connection with mortgage deeds, and not otherwise charged in this schedule, twenty-five cents.

Certificate of stock in any incorporated company, twenty-five cents.

Certificate of profits, or any certificate or memo-random showing an interest in the property or accumulations of any incorporated company, if for a sum not less than ten dollars and not exceeding fifty dollars, ten cents.

Exceeding $1,000, for every additional $1,000, or fractional part thereof, twenty-five cents.

Certificate of deposit of any sum of money in any bank or trust company, or with any banker or person acting as such—

If for a sum not exceeding $100, two cents.

For a sum exceeding $100, five cents.

Certificate of any other description than those specified, five cents.

Charter-party. Contract or agreement for the charter of any ship or vessel or steamer, or any letter, memorandum, or other writing between the captain, master, or owner, or person acting as agent of any ship or vessel or steamer, and any other person or persons, for or relating to the charter of such ship or vessel or steamer, or any renewal or transfer thereof, if the registered tonnage of such ship or vessel or steamer does not exceed one hundred and fifty tons, one dollar.

Exceeding one hundred and fifty tons and not exceeding three hundred tons, three dollars.

Exceeding three hundred tons and not exceeding six hundred tons, five dollars.

Exceeding six hundred tons, ten dollars.

Contract. Broker's note or memorandum of sale of any goods or merchandise, real estate, or property of any kind or description, issued by brokers or persons acting as such, for each note or memorandum of sale, ten cents.

Bill or memorandum of the sale or contract for the sale of stocks, bonds, gold or silver bullion, coin, promissory notes, or other securities, shall pay a stamp tax at the rate provided in section —.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to amend the last clause just read by striking out "section —," and inserting "this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

No further amendment was offered.

The following clauses were read:

Conveyance, deed, instrument, or writing, whereby any lands, tenements, or other realty shall be granted, assigned, transferred, or otherwise conveyed to, or vested in, the purchaser or purchasers, or any other person or persons, by his, her, or their direction, when the consideration or value does not exceed $500, fifty cents.

And for every additional $500, or fractional part thereof, in excess of $1,000, fifty cents.

Exceeding ten and not exceeding fifty dollars, twenty-five cents.

Exceeding fifty dollars, fifty cents.

Where the rent or rental value exceeds the sum of $300 per annum, for each additional $200, or fractional part thereof, in excess of $300, fifty cents.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to amend the clause last read by adding to it "When executed in duplicate the stamp shall be required only on the instrument held by the lessee."

The amendment was agreed to.

No further amendment was offered.

The following clauses were read:

Manifest for custom-house entry or clearance of the cargo of any ship, vessel, or steamer for a foreign port—

If the registered tonnage of such ship, vessel, or steamer does not exceed three hundred tons, one dollar.

Exceeding three hundred tons and not exceeding six hundred tons, three dollars.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to amend by adding at the end of the clause last read the following:

Except an assignment or transfer to a trustee as successor to one resigning the trust.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS, of New Hampshire. I move to amend by striking out near the beginning of the clause last read the words "the same stamp tax upon the amount remaining unpaid thereon as is herein imposed upon a mortgage for the same amount," and inserting in lieu thereof "twenty-five cents." I desire, Mr. Chairman, to make the tax upon the assignment or transfer of a mortgage uniform. I suppose it is well understood that in many of the States, perhaps in all them, it is judicially held that the formal assignment of a mortgage is not necessary to the transfer of the mortgage interest, that an assignment of the mortgage note carries with it as an incident the transfer of the mortgage security. In view of this construction of the law, these assignments in many States are seldom made formally by the transfer of the mortgage, the mere assignment of the mortgage note being relied on as sufficient. In this way the Government loses in its revenue a considerable amount which it would receive were the tax on assignments of mortgages fixed at a small uniform sum. I think there would be a decided advantage in placing upon these assignments a uniform tax of reasonable amount. Hence, I hope my amendment will meet the approval of the committee.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. Chairman, I presume the law as stated by the gentleman from New Hampshire is the same in nearly all the States; it is so far as I know. But this paragraph corresponds with the provision of the present law, according to which, if a note is stamped, the mortgage need not be, provided the stamp upon the note is for the amount which would be required upon the mortgage. I think it better to leave this clause as it is rather than change it, thereby creating confusion. I do not think the amendment proposed would tend to increase the revenue.

Mr. STEVENS, of New Hampshire. The gentleman will allow me to say that I think he misapprehends the point I made, that the mere indorsement and transfer of the note is all that is necessary to transfer the mortgage.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand that perfectly.

Mr. STEVENS, of New Hampshire. Hence, while required to pay upon the assignment of a mortgage a tax graduated in accordance with the amount of the mortgage, persons will not make the formal transfer, but will merely assign the mortgage notes; while, if the stamp-tax were reduced to twenty-five cents, many persons would prefer, by paying this small amount, to make their title appear properly on the record; and thereby the revenues of the Government would be increased.

Mr. ALLISON. I think we shall get more revenue by retaining the present provision than by adopting the one the gentleman proposes.

Mr. HOLMAN. For the sake of making a single suggestion on this subject, I move to
